PREFACE

TO THE

REVISED AND ENLARGED EDITION

OF

THE CENTURY DICTIONARY

IN the preface to the first edition of THE CENTURY DICTIONARY, Prof. William Dwight Whitney, the editor-in-chief, wrote: The plan of THE CENTURY DICTIONARY includes three things: the construction of a general dictionary of the English language which shall be serviceable for every literary and practical use; a more complete collection of the technical terms of the various sciences, arts, trades, and professions than has yet been attempted; and the addition to the definitions proper of such related encyclopedic matter, with pictorial illustrations, as shall constitute a convenient book of general reference. The attempt to accomplish these ends, and at the same time to produce a harmonious whole, has determined both the general character of the work and its details.

The instant acceptance of the work, as the leading authority of its kind, both by the scholarly class and the general public, wherever the English language prevails, and its widespread sale, proved the success of the plan upon which THE CENTURY DICTIONARY was built. From time to time, as its numerous impressions have appeared, THE CENTURY has been amended to meet the more obvious requirements of the day, but the limits of this periodical revision have been somewhat narrowly drawn. In the present new edition, which embodies both a comprehensive revision and an extensive enlargement, the attempt has been made to meet all the demands which the advance of the time has raised.

The most evident of these demands is the inclusion, with a high degree of completeness, of the new words and senses which have come into existence—or into notice—since the dictionary was first issued. The great extent of its vocabulary—a vocabulary larger by upward of one hundred and twenty thousand words than that of any then existing general English dictionary—was a notable feature of the first edition. The opportunity, in the future, for further collection and the importance of such additions to the users of the book were, however, sufficiently obvious, even at that time, and the search for this new material has, accordingly, never been remitted. Its results were published in 1909 in the form of two supplementary volumes comprising one thousand four hundred and sixty-seven pages—more than one-fifth of the number of pages in the first edition. The contents of this supplement, with revision and further additions, have been incorporated in the present edition, being distributed among the several volumes in accordance with the part of the alphabet comprised in each.

This supplementary material consists of new words, new senses of words defined in the original pages, definitions of new 'phrases,' and extensions of old definitions, often of encyclopedic length. To find at once what may be wanted in all of this original and supplementary matter will involve no difficulty. As regards the new words, it is obvious that if one who consults the dictionary does not find a particular word in the main part of the volume to which he turns, he will naturally, without prompting, turn to the supplementary pages at the back, where it will be found. Accordingly, no mark has been inserted in the original pages to indicate the presence of a new word in the supplement. As regards new senses, new 'phrases,' and extensions of old definitions, however, it is clear that the user who does not find what he wants in the main part of the volume will not quite so naturally and inevitably expect to find it in the supplementary part. In these cases, therefore (and in these only), a star has been placed in the original pages, just above (rarely just below) the initial letter of the word an addition to the article on which—such as a new or extended sense or a group of new phrases—will be found in the supplementary pages. This star, whether it is found, as just described, in the main part of the volume, or in its supplementary part (in the definitions or cross-references), refers in all cases to something that will be found in the supplementary matter.

KEY TO PRONUNCIATION.

a as in fat, man, pang.
ā as in fate, mane, dale.
ä as in far, father, guard.
á as in fall, talk, naught.
à as in ask, fast, ant.
ã as in fare, hair, bear.

e as in met, pen, bless.
ē as in mete, meet, meat.
ė as in her, fern, heard.

i as in pin, it, biscuit.
ī as in pine, fight, file.

o as in not, on, frog.
ō as in note, poke, floor.
ö as in move, spoon, room.
ô as in nor, song, off.

u as in tub, son, blood.
ū as in mute, acute, few (also new, tube, duty).
u̇ as in pull, book, could.
ü German ü, French u.

oi as in oil, joint, boy.
ou as in pound, proud, now.

A single dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates its abbreviation and lightening, without absolute loss of its distinctive quality. Thus:

ạ as in prelate, courage, captain.
ẹ as in ablegate, episcopal.
ọ as in abrogate, eulogy, democrat.
ụ as in singular, education.

A double dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates that, even in the mouths of the best speakers, its sound is variable to, and in ordinary utterance actually becomes, the short u-sound (of but, pun, etc.). Thus:

a̤ as in errant, republican.
e̤ as in prudent, difference.
i̤ as in charity, density.
o̤ as in valor, actor, idiot.

ä̤ as in Persia, peninsula.
ē̤ as in the book.
ṳ̄ as in nature, feature.

A mark (⌣) under the consonants t, d, s, z indicates that they in like manner are variable to ch, j, sh, zh. Thus:

t̰ as in nature, adventure.
d̰ as in arduous, education.
s̰ as in pressure.
z̰ as in seizure.

th as in thin.
ŦH as in then.
ċh as in German ach, Scotch loch.
ṅ French nasalizing n, as in ton, en.
ly (in French words) French liquid (mouillé) l.
′ denotes a primary, ″ a secondary accent. (A secondary accent is not marked if at its regular interval of two syllables from the primary, or from another secondary.)

SIGNS.

〈 read from; i. e., derived from.
〉 read whence; i. e., from which is derived.
+ read and; i. e., compounded with, or with suffix.
= read cognate with; i. e., etymologically parallel with.
√ read root.
* read theoretical or alleged; i. e., theoretically assumed, or asserted but unverified, form.
† read obsolete.
★ refers, in all cases, to material which will be found in the supplementary pages. It is used in the cross-references, and is also placed above (rarely below) the initial letter of a word, when an addition to its definitions will be found in the supplementary pages at the end of one or another of the various volumes.

SPECIAL EXPLANATIONS.

A superior figure placed after a title-word indicates that the word so marked is distinct etymologically from other words, following or preceding it, spelled in the same manner and marked with different numbers. Thus:

back[1] (bak), n. The posterior part, etc.
back[1] (bak), a. Lying or being behind, etc.
back[1] (bak), v. To furnish with a back, etc.
back[1] (bak), adv. Behind, etc.
back[2]† (bak), n. The earlier form of bat[2].
back[3] (bak), n. A large flat-bottomed boat, etc.

Various abbreviations have been used in the credits to the quotations, as "No." for number, "st." for stanza, "p." for page, "l." for line, ¶ for paragraph, "fol." for folio. The method used in indicating the subdivisions of books will be understood by reference to the following plan:

Section only	§ 5.
Chapter only	xiv.
Canto only	xiv.
Book only	iii.
Book and chapter Part and chapter Book and line Book and page Act and scene Chapter and verse No. and page	iii. 10.
Volume and page	II. 34.
Volume and chapter	IV. iv.
Part, book, and chapter	II. iv. 12.
Part, canto, and stanza	II. iv. 12.
Chapter and section or ¶	vii. § or ¶ 3.
Volume, part, and section or ¶	I. i. § or ¶ 6.
Book, chapter, and section or ¶	I. i. § or ¶ 6.

Different grammatical phases of the same word are grouped under one head, and distinguished by the Roman numerals I., II., III., etc. This applies to transitive and intransitive uses of the same verb, to adjectives used also as nouns, to nouns used also as adjectives, to adverbs used also as prepositions or conjunctions, etc.

The capitalizing and italicizing of certain or all of the words in a synonym-list indicates that the words so distinguished are discriminated in the text immediately following, or under the title referred to.

The figures by which the synonym-lists are sometimes divided indicate the senses or definitions with which they are connected.

The titlewords begin with a small (lower-case) letter, or with a capital, according to usage. When usage differs, in this matter, with the different senses of a word, the abbreviations [ap.] for "capital" and [l. c.] for "lower-case" are used to indicate this variation.

The difference observed in regard to the capitalizing of the second element in zoölogical and botanical terms is in accordance with the existing usage in the two sciences. Thus, in zoölogy, in a scientific name consisting of two words the second of which is derived from a proper name, only the first would be capitalized. But a name of similar derivation in botany would have the second element also capitalized.

The names of zoölogical and botanical classes, orders, families, genera, etc., have been uniformly italicized, in accordance with the present usage of scientific writers.

A

1. The first letter in the English alphabet, as also generally in the other alphabets which, like the English, come ultimately from the Phenician. Our letters are the same as those used by the Romans; the Roman or Latin alphabet is one of several Italian alphabets derived from the Greek; and the Greek alphabet is, with a few adaptations and additions, formed from the Phenician. As to the origin of the Phenician alphabet, opinions are by no means agreed. A view which is still widely current is that put forth in 1859 and 1874 by the French Egyptologist Emanuel de Rougé: namely, that the Phenician characters are derived from the early Egyptian hieratic characters, or abbreviated forms of written hieroglyphs. Under each letter will be given in this work the Phenician character from which it comes, along with an early form or two of the Greek and Latin derived characters (especially intended to show the change of direction of the letter consequent upon the change of direction of writing, since the Phenician was always written from right to left); and to these will be added the hieratic and hieroglyphic characters from which the Phenician is held to originate, according to De Rougé's theory. It is to be noticed that our ordinary capitals are the original forms of our letters; the lower-case, Italic, and written letters are all derived from the capitals. Our A corresponds to the Phenician letter called aleph; and this name, signifying "ox," is also the original of the Greek name of the same letter, alpha. The comparative scheme for A is as follows:

Egyptian. Hieroglyphic. | Hieratic. | Phenician. | Early Greek and Latin.

The Phenician aleph was not a proper vowel-sign, but rather a quasi-consonantal one, to which an initial vowel-sound, of whatever kind, attached itself; since the fundamental plan of that alphabet assumed that every syllable should begin with a consonant. But the Greeks, in adapting the borrowed alphabet to their own use, made the sign represent a single vowel-sound: that, namely, which we usually call the "Italian" or "Continental" a (ä), as heard in far, father. This was its value in the Latin also, and in the various alphabets founded on the Latin, including that of our own ancestors, the speakers and writers of earliest English or Anglo-Saxon; and it is mainly retained to the present time in the languages of continental Europe. In consequence, however, of the gradual and pervading change of utterance of English words, without corresponding change in the mode of writing them, it has come to have in our use a variety of values. The sound of a in far is the purest and most fundamental of vowel-sounds, being that which is naturally sent forth by the human organs of utterance when the mouth and throat are widely opened, and the tone from the larynx suffered to come out with least modifying interference by the parts of the mouth. On the other hand, in the production of the i-sound of machine or pique and the u-sound of rule (or double o of pool), the organs are brought quite nearly together: in the case of i, the flat of the tongue and the roof of the mouth; in the case of u, the rounded lips. Hence these vowels approach a consonantal character, and pass with little or no alteration into y and w respectively. Then e and o (as in they and note) are intermediate respectively between a (ä) and i and a (ä) and u; and the sounds in fat and fall are still less removed in either direction from a (ä). The pure or original sound of a (far) is more prevalent in earlier stages of language, and tends to be closened or otherwise differentiated into the less open or less sonorous vowel-sounds; and this process has gone on in English on a larger scale than in almost any other known language. Hence the a-sound (as in far) has become relatively rare in present English, except in unstressed syllables, where it is generally weak or obscure (as in abide, alone, polar, vital, wizard, sofa, etc.). In the stressed position its short sound has been generally flattened into that in fat, and its long sound into that in fate (sounds still called, now inappropriately, "short a" and "long a"). On the other hand, it has in many words been broadened or rounded into the sound heard in fall. The most usual sounds of English stressed a are now, in the order of their frequency, those in fat, fate, fall, far; there are also a few cases like the a in what and was (after a w-sound, nearly a corresponding short to the a of all), many (a "short e"), and others yet more sporadic. In syllables of least stress and distinctness, to o, as in the first and third syllables of abundant and abundance, it is universally uttered with the "short u" sound of but. The "long a" of fate is not strictly one sound, but ends with a vanishing sound of "long e": i. e., it is a slide from the e-sound of they down to the i-sound of pique. From this vanish the a of fare and bare and their like is free, while it has also an opener sound, and is even, in the mouths of many speakers, indistinguishable in quality from the "short a" of fat; hence the a-sound of fare is in the respellings of this work written with ă, to distinguish it from the sound in fate. There is also a class of words, like ask, fast, ant, in which some pronounce the vowel simply as "short a," while some give it the full open sound of a in far, and yet others make it something intermediate between the two: such an a is represented in this work by å. A occurs as final only in a very few proper English words; and it is never doubled in such words.—2. As a symbol, a denotes the first of an actual or possible series. Specifically—(a) In music, the name of the sixth note of the natural diatonic scale of C, or the first note of the relative minor scale; the la of Italian, French, and Spanish musicians. It is the note sounded by the open second string of the violin, and to it as given by a fixed-toned instrument (as the oboe or organ) all the instruments of an orchestra are tuned. (b) In the mnemonic words of logic, the universal affirmative proposition, as, all men are mortal. Similarly, I stands for the particular affirmative, as, some men are mortal; E for the universal negative, as, no men are mortal; O for the particular negative, as, some men are not mortal. The use of these symbols dates from the thirteenth century; they appear to be arbitrary applications of the vowels a, e, i, o, but are usually supposed to have been taken from the Latin AffIrmo, I affirm, and nEgO, I deny. But some authorities maintain that their use in Greek is much older. (c) In math.: In algebra, a, b, c, etc., the first letters of the alphabet, stand for known quantities, while x, y, z, the last letters, stand for unknown quantities; in geometry, A, B, C, etc., are used to name points, lines, and figures. (d) In abstract reasoning, suppositions, etc., A, B, C, etc., denote each a particular person or thing in relation to the others of a series or group. (e) In writing and printing, a, b, c, etc., are used instead of or in addition to the Arabic figures in marking paragraphs or other divisions, or in making references. (f) In naut. lang., A1, A2, etc., are symbols used by various associations engaged in the business of examining and classifying vessels for insurance to denote the character and quality of vessels classed by them. In Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, the characters 100 A1, 95 A1, 90 A1, 85 A1, 80 A1, and 75 A1 are used to designate vessels built of iron or steel according to the rules in force since 1869, the first indicating a vessel of the highest class. A1 designates an iron or steel vessel built for a special purpose and A1, A1 (in red), Æ1, designate wooden or composite vessels. The figure 1 affixed to a character signifies that the vessel is well and sufficiently equipped and a line after the character (thus A—) that the equipment is deficient under the rules. In the Record of American and Foreign Shipping, the character assigned to vessels is expressed by numbers from 1 to 3, A1 standing for the highest, and A3 for the lowest grade. Vessels classed as A1, A1½, are regarded as fit for the carriage of all kinds of cargoes on all sorts of voyages. Those classed as A1¾, A2, are fit to carry cargoes, not liable to damage by sea-water, on Atlantic voyages, and, in exceptional cases, on long voyages.—Hence, in commerce, A1 is used to denote the highest mercantile credit; and colloquially A1, or in the United States A No. 1, is an adjective of commendation, like first-class, first-rate: as, an A1 speaker.

> "He must be a first-rater," said Sam. "A 1," replied Mr. Roker. Dickens, Pickwick Papers.
> An A number one cook, and no mistake. Mrs. Stowe, Dred.

3. As an abbreviation, a stands, according to context, for acre, acting, adjective, answer, are (in the metric system), argent (in her.), anal (anal fin, in ichth.), anechinoplacid (in echinoderms), etc.; in com., for approved, for accepted, and for Latin ad (commonly written @), "at" or "to": as, 500 shares L. I. preferred @ 67½; 25 @ 30 cents per yard.—4. Attrib., having the form of the capital A, as a tent.

> The common or A tent, for the use of enlisted men. Wilhelm, Mil. Dict.

a[2] (ạ or ā), indef. art. [< ME. a (before consonants), earlier an, orig. with long vowel, < AS. ān, one, an: see an[1].] The form of an used before consonants and words beginning with a consonant-sound: as, a man, a woman, a year, a union, a eulogy, a oneness, a hope. An, however, was formerly often used before the sounds of h and initial long u and eu even in accented syllables (as, an hospital, an union), and is still retained by some before those sounds in unaccented syllables (as, an historian, an united whole, an euphonious sound). The form a first appeared about the beginning of the thirteenth century. It is placed before nouns of the singular number, and also before plural nouns when few or great many is interposed. [Few was originally singular as well as plural, and the article was singular (ME. a) or plural (ME. ane) to agree with it. In the phrase a great many, the article agrees with many, which is properly a noun (AS. menigu: see many[1], n.); the following plural

a[3] (ạ or ā), prep. [< ME. and late AS. a, reduced form of an, on, on, in: see on.] A reduced form of the preposition on, formerly common in all the uses of on, but now restricted to certain constructions in which the preposition is more or less disguised, being usually written as one word with the following noun. (a) Of place: On, in, upon, unto, into; the preposition and the following noun being usually written as one word, sometimes with, but commonly without, a hyphen, and regarded as an adverb or a predicate adjective, but best treated as a prepositional phrase. In such phrases a denotes—(1) Position: as, to lie abed; to be afoot; to ride a horseback; to stand a-tiptoe. (2) Motion: as, to go ashore; "how jocund did they drive their team a-field," Gray. (3) Direction: as, to go ahead; to turn aside; to draw aback (modern, to draw back). (4) Partition: as, to take apart; to burst asunder. Similarly—(b) Of state: On, in, etc.: as, to be alive [AS. on līfe]; to be asleep [AS. on slǽpe]; to set afire; to be afloat; to set adrift. In this use now applicable to any verb (but chiefly to monosyllables and dissyllables) taken as a noun: as, to be aglow with excitement; to be a-swim; to be all a-tremble. (c) Of time: On, in, at, by, etc., remaining in some colloquial expressions: as, to stay out a nights (often written o' nights); to go fishing a Sunday; now a days (generally written nowadays). Common with adverbs of repetition: as, twice a day [< ME. twies a dai, < AS. twiwa on dæg], once a week [< ME. anes a wike, < AS. ǽne on wucan], three times a year [cf. ME. thre sithes a yer, < AS. thrīm sīthum on gedre], etc.: a day being a reduced form of on day (cf. to-day), equivalent to F. par jour, L. per diem; a year, of on year, equivalent to F. par an, L. per annum, etc. But in this construction the preposition a is now usually regarded as the indefinite article (varying to an before a vowel), "four miles an hour," "ten cents a yard," etc., being explained as elliptical for "four miles in an hour," "ten cents for a yard," etc. (d) Of process: In course of, with a verbal noun in -ing, taken passively: as, the house is a building; "while the ark was a preparing" (1 Pet. iii. 20); while these things were a doing. The prepositional use is clearly seen in the alternative construction with in: as, "Forty and six years was this temple in building," John ii. 20. In modern use the preposition is omitted, and the verbal noun is treated as a present participle taken passively: as, the house is building. But none of these forms of expression has become thoroughly popular, the popular instinct being shown in the recent development of the desired "progressive passive participle": as, the house is being built, the work is being done, etc. This construction, though condemned by logicians and purists, is well established in popular speech, and will probably pass into correct literary usage. (e) Of action: In, to, into; with a verbal noun in -ing, taken actively. (1) With be: as, to be a coming; to be a doing; to be a fighting. Now only colloquial or provincial, literary usage omitting the preposition, and treating the verbal noun as a present participle: as, to be coming; to be doing. (2) With verbs of motion: as, to go a fishing; to go a wooing; to go a begging; to fall a crying; to set a going. The preposition is often joined to the noun by a hyphen, as, to go a-fishing, or sometimes omitted, as, to go fishing, to set going, etc. For other examples of the uses of a[3], prep., see the prepositional phrases abed, aboard, ahead, etc., or the simple nouns.

a[4]. [Another spelling of o, now written o', a reduced form of of, the f being dropped before a consonant, and the vowel obscured. Cf. a[7], a-[3], a-[4].] A reduced form of of, now generally written o', as in man-o'-war, six *o'*clock, etc.

The name of John a Gaunt. Shak., Rich. II., i. 3.

It's sixe a clocke.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humor, i. 4.

a[5] (ạ), pron. [E. dial., corruption of I, being the first element, obscured, of the diphthong äi.] A modern provincial corruption of the pronoun I.

a[6] (ạ), pron. [E. dial., < ME. dial. a, corruptly for he, he, heo, she, ke, it, heo, hi, they.] An old (and modern provincial) corruption of all genders and both numbers of the third personal pronoun, he, she, it, they. So quotha, that is, quoth he.

A babbled of green fields. Shak., Hen. V., ii. 3.

a[7] (ạ), v. [E. dial., < ME. a, ha, reduced form of have, the v being dropped as in a[4] or o' for of (ov).] An old (and modern provincial) corruption of have as an auxiliary verb, unaccented, and formerly also as a principal verb.

I had not thought my body could a yielded. Beau. and Fl.

a[8] (ȧ). [Sc., usually written a', = E. all, like Sc. ca' = E. call, fa' = fall, ha' = hall, etc.] All.

For a' that, an' a' that,
His riband, star, an' a' that,
The man o' independent mind,
He looks an' laughs at a' that.
Burns, For A' That.

a[9] (ạ or ā), interj. [See ah and O.] The early form of ah, preserved, archaically, before a leader's or chieftain's name, as a war-cry (but now treated and pronounced as the indefinite article).

The Border slogan rent the sky,
A Home! a Gordon! was the cry.
Scott, Marmion.

a[10]. [L. ā, the usual form of ab, from, of, before consonants: see ab-.] A Latin preposition, meaning of, off, away from, etc. It occurs in certain phrases: as, a priori, a posteriori, a mensa et thoro, etc.; also in certain personal names of medieval or modern origin: as, Thomas à Kempis, that is, Thomas of Kempen, the school-name given to Thomas Hammerken, born at Kempen near Düsseldorf; Abraham a Sancta Clara, that is, Abraham of St. Clare, the name assumed by Ulrich Megerle. The true name of Thomas a Becket (written also A' Becket, and, in un-English fashion, à Becket, A Becket) was simply Thomas Becket or Beket; the a appears to be a later insertion, though supported by such late Middle English names as Wydo del Beck't, John de Beckote, William atte Beck, etc., that is, of or at the brook [becket*, not found as a common noun, being appar. a dim. of beck, a brook, or perhaps < OF. becquet, bequet, a pike (fish), dim. of bec, beak].

a-. A prefix or an initial and generally inseparable particle. It is a relic of various Teutonic and classical particles, as follows:

a-[1]. [< ME. a-, < AS. ā- (= OS. a- = OHG. ar-, ir-, ur-, MHG. ir-, er-, G. er- = Goth. us-, before a vowel uz-, before r ur-), a common unaccented prefix of verbs, meaning 'away, out, up, on,' often merely intensive, in mod. E. usually without assignable force. It appears as an independent prep. in OHG. ur, Goth. us, out, and as an accented prefix of nouns and adjectives in OHG. MHG. G. ur-, D. oor-, AS. or-, E. or- in ordeal and ort, q. v. In nouns from verbs in AS. ā- the accent fell upon the prefix, which then retained its length, and has in one word, namely, E. oakum, < AS. ā-cumba, entered mod. E. with the reg. change of AS. ā- under accent, losing all semblance of a prefix.] An unaccented inseparable prefix of verbs, and of nouns and adjectives thence derived, originally implying motion away, but in earlier English merely intensive, or, as in modern English, without assignable force, as in abide, abode, arise, awake, ago = agone, etc. The difference between abide, arise, awake, etc., and the simple verbs bide, rise, wake, etc., is chiefly syllabic or rhythmic. In a few verbs this prefix has taken in spelling a Latin semblance, as in accurse, affright, allay, for a-curse, a-fright, a-lay.

a-[2]. [< ME. a-, usually and prop. written separately, a, < late AS. a, a reduced form of ME. and AS. an, on: see a[3], prep., and on.] An apparent prefix, properly a preposition, the same as a[3], prep. When used before a substantive it forms what is really a prepositional phrase, which is now generally written as one word, with or without a hyphen, and regarded as an adverb or as a predicate adjective: as, to lie abed, to be asleep, to be all a-tremble, etc. With verbal nouns in -ing it forms what is regarded as a present participle, either active, as, they are a-coming (colloq.), or passive, as, the house was a-building. In the latter uses the a is usually, and in all it would be properly, written separately, as a preposition. See a[3], prep., where the uses are explained.

a-[3]. [< ME. a-, or separately, a, < AS. ā (only in ādūn, ādūne, a reduced form of of dūne), a reduced form of of, E. of, off: see of, off, and cf. a-[4].] A prefix, being a reduced form of Anglo-Saxon of, prep., English off, from, as in adown (which see), or of later English of, as in anew, afresh, akin, etc. (which see).

a-[4]. [< ME. a-, a reduced form of of-, < AS. of-, an intensive prefix, orig. the same as of, prep.: see a-[3] and of.] A prefix, being a reduced form of Anglo-Saxon of-, an intensive prefix, as in athirst, ahungered (which see).

a-[5]. [< ME. a-, a reduced form of and-, q. v.] A prefix, being a reduced form of and- (which see), as in along[1] (which see).

a-[6]. [< ME. a-, var. of i-, y-, e-, reduced forms of ge, AS. ge-: see i-.] A prefix, being one of the reduced forms of the Anglo-Saxon prefix ge- (see i-), as in along[2] [< AS. gelang], aware [< AS. ge-wær], aford, now spelled afford, simulating the Latin prefix af- [< AS. ge-forthian], among [< AS. ge-mang, mixed with on-ge-mang and on-mang], etc. The same prefix is otherwise spelled in enough, iwis, yclept, etc.

a-[7]. [< ME. a-, reduced form of at-, < AS. æt- in æt-foran, mixed in later E. with on-foran, afore: see afore.] A prefix, being a reduced form of at-, mixed with a- for on-, in afore (which see).

a-[8]. [< ME. a-, a reduced form of at in north. E., after Icel. at, to, as a sign of the infin., like E. to: see at.] A prefix, in ado, originally at do, northern English infinitive, equivalent to English to do. See ado.

a-[9]. [A mere syllable.] A quasi-prefix, a mere opening syllable, in the interjections aha, ahoy. In aha, and as well in ahoy, it may be considered as ah.

a-[10]. [A reduced form of D. houd. Cf. a-[9].] A quasi-prefix, a mere opening syllable, in avast, where a-, however, represents historically Dutch houd in the original Dutch expression houd vast = English hold fast.

a-[11]. [< ME. a-, OF. a-, < L. ad-, or assimilated ab-, ac-, af-, etc.: see ad-.] A prefix, being a reduced form of the Latin prefix ad-. In Old French and Middle English regularly a-, and so properly in modern French and English, as in avouch [ult. < L. advocare], amount [ult. < L. ad montem], avalanche [ult. < L. ad vallem], abet, ameliorate, etc.; but in later Old French and Middle English a- took in spelling a Latin semblance, ad-, ac-, af-, etc., and so in modern English, as in address, account, affect, aggrieve, etc., where the doubled consonant is unetymological. See ad-.

a-[12]. [< L. a-, a later and parallel form of ad- before sc-, sp-, st-, and gn-.] A prefix, being a reduced form (in Latin, and so in English, etc.) of the Latin prefix ad- before sc-, sp-, st-, and gn-, as in ascend, aspire, aspect, astringent, agnate, etc.

a-[13]. [< ME. a-, < OF. a-, < L. ab-: see ab-.] A prefix, being a reduced form (in Middle English, etc.) of Latin ab-, as in abate (which see). In a few verbs this a- has taken a Latin semblance, as in abs-tain (treated as ab-stain), as-soil. See these words.

a-[14]. [< L. a- for ab- before v: see ab-.] A prefix, being a reduced form (in Latin, and so in English, etc.) of the Latin prefix ab-, from, as in avert (which see).

a-[15]. [< ME. a-, < OF. a- for reg. OF. e-, es-, < L. ex-, out: see e- and ex-.] A prefix, being an altered form of e-, reduced form of Latin ex-, as in amend, abash, etc., aforce, afray (now afforce, affray), etc. (which see).

a-[16]. [< ME. a-, reduced form of an- for en-, < OF. en-: see en-[1].] A prefix, being a reduced form of an- for en-, in some words now obsolete or spelled in semblance of the Latin, or restored, as in acloy, acumber, apair, etc., later accloy, accumber, modern encumber, impair, etc.

a-[17]. [Ult. < L. ah, interj.] A quasi-prefix, representing original Latin ah, interj., in alas (which see).

a-[18]. [< Gr. ἀ-, before a vowel ἀν-, inseparable negative prefix, known as alpha privative (Gr. ἀ-στερητικόν), = L. in- = Goth. AS. E., etc., un-: see un-[1].] A prefix of Greek origin, called alpha privative, the same as English un-, meaning not, without, -less, used not only in words taken directly or through Latin from the Greek, as abyss, adamant, acatalectic, etc., but also as a naturalized English prefix in new formations, as achromatic, asexual, etc., especially in scientific terms, English or New Latin, as Apteryx, Asiphonata, etc.

a-[19]. [< Gr. ἀ- copulative (ἀ- ἀθροιστικόν), commonly without, but sometimes and prop. with, the aspirate, ἁ-, orig. σα-* = Skt. sa-, sam-. Cf. Gr. ἅμα, together, = E. same, q. v.] A prefix of Greek origin, occurring unfelt in English acolyte, adelphous, etc.

a-[20]. [< Gr. ἀ- intensive (ἀ- ἐπιτατικόν), prob. orig. the same as ἀ- copulative: see a-[19].] A prefix of Greek origin, occurring unfelt in atlas, amaurosis, etc.

a-[21]. [Ult. < Ar. al, the.] A prefix of Arabic origin, occurring unfelt in apricot, azimuth, hazard (for azard*), etc., commonly in the full form al-. See al-[2].

-a[1]. [L. -a (pl. -æ), It. -a (pl. -e), Sp. Pg. -a (pl. -as), Gr. -α, -η (pl. -αι, L. spelling -æ), = AS. -u, -e, or lost; in E. lost, or represented unfelt by silent final e.] A suffix characteristic of feminine nouns and adjectives of Greek or Latin origin or semblance, many of which have been adopted in English without change. Examples are: (a) Greek (first declension—in Latin spelling), idea, coma, basilica, mania, etc.; (b) Latin (first declension), area, arena, formula, copula, nebula, vertebra, etc., whence (c), in Italian, opera, piazza, stanza, etc.; (d) Spanish, armada, flotilla, mantilla, etc.; (e) Portuguese, madeira; (f) New Latin, chiefly in scientific terms, alumina, soda, silica, etc.; dahlia, fuchsia, camellia, wistaria, etc., amœba, branta, etc.; common in geographical names derived from or formed according to Latin or Greek, as Asia, Africa, America, Polynesia, Arabia, Florida, etc. In English this suffix marks sex only in personal names, as in Cornelia, Julia, Maria, Anna, etc. (some having a corresponding masculine, as Cornelius, Julius, etc.), and in a few feminine terms from the Italian, Spanish, etc., having a corresponding masculine, as donna, doña, duenna, signora, señora, sultana, inamorata, etc., corresponding to masculine don, signor, señor, sultan, inamorato, etc.

-a[2]. [L. -a, pl. to -um, = Gr. -α, pl. to -ον, 2d declension; L. -a, -i-a, pl. to -um, -e, = Gr. -α.

neut. pl., 3d declension; lost in AS. and E., as in head, deer, sheep, etc., pl., without suffix.] A suffix, the nominative neuter plural ending of nouns and adjectives of the second and third declensions in Greek or Latin, some of which have been adopted in English without change of ending. Examples are: (a) in Greek, phenomena, plural of phenomenon, miasmata, plural of miasma(t-), etc.; (b) in Latin, strata, plural of stratum, data, plural of datum, genera, plural of genus, etc. Some of these words have also an English plural, as automatons, criterions, dogmas, memorandums, mediums, besides the Greek or Latin plurals, automata, criteria, dogmata, memoranda, media, etc. This suffix is common in New Latin names of classes of animals, as in Mammalia, Amphibia, Crustacea, Protozoa, etc., these being properly adjectives, agreeing with animalia understood.

-a[3]. [Sometimes written, and treated in dictionaries, as a separate syllable, but prop. written as a suffix, being prob. a relic of the ME. inflexive -e, which in poetry was pronounced (e. g., ME. stil-e, mil-e: see quot.) whenever the meter required it, long after it had ceased to be pronounced in prose.] An unmeaning syllable, used in old ballads and songs to fill out a line.

> Jog on, jog on, the footpath way,
> And merrily hent the stile-a;
> A merry heart goes all the day,
> Your sad tires in a mile-a.
> Quoted by Shak., W. T., iv. 2.

Aaronite (ar′ọn-īt or ā′rọn-īt), n. [< Aaron + -ite[2].] A descendant of Aaron, the brother of Moses. The Aaronites were hereditary priests in the Jewish church, and next to the high priest in dignity.

Aaronitic (ar-ọn-it′ik), a. [< Aaronite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Aaronites.

> The assumption that the representations in regard to the origin of the Aaronitic priesthood are essentially false cannot well be sustained, unless it can be proved that Hebrew literature did not arise until about the eighth century B. C., as the critics claim.
> Schaff-Herzog, Encyc., p. 1923.

Aaron's-beard (ar′ọnz- or ā′rọnz-bērd), n. [See Ps. cxxxiii. 2.] 1. A dwarf evergreen shrub, Hypericum calycinum, with large flowers (the largest of the genus) and numerous stamens, a native of southeastern Europe, and sometimes found in cultivation; St.-John's-wort: so called from the conspicuous hair-like stamens. — 2. The smoke-tree, Cotinus Cotinus. — 3. A species of saxifrage (Saxifraga sarmentosa) found in cultivation; Chinese saxifrage.

Aaron's-rod (ar′ọnz- or ā′rọnz-rod), n. [See Ex. vii. 10; Num. xvii. 8.] 1. In arch., an ornament consisting of a straight rod from which pointed leaves sprout on either side. The term is also applied to an ornament consisting of a rod with one serpent entwined about it, as distinguished from a caduceus, which has two serpents.

2. A popular name of several plants with tall flowering stems, as the goldenrod, the hag-taper, etc.

Ab (ab), n. [Heb. 'āb, < Bab. and Assyr. abu.] The eleventh month of the Jewish civil year, and fifth of the ecclesiastical year, answering to a part of July and a part of August. In the Syriac calendar Ab is the last summer month.

ab-. [L. ab-, prep. ab, older form ap = Etrur. av = Gr. ἀπό = Skt. apa = Goth. af = OHG. aba, MHG. G. ab = AS. of (rarely, as a prefix, æf-), E. of, off: see of, off, apo, and a-[13], a-[14].] A prefix of Latin origin, denoting disjunction, separation, or departure, off, from, away, etc., as in abduct, abjure, etc. Before c and t, ab becomes (in Latin, and so in English, etc.) abs, as in abscond, abstain, etc.; before v and m, it becomes a, as in avert, amentia, etc. — In abbacinate and abbreviate, the prefix (reduced to a- in abridge, which see) is rather an assimilation of ad-.

A. B. 1. An abbreviation of the Middle and New Latin Artium Baccalaureus, Bachelor of Arts. In England it is more commonly written B. A. See bachelor. — 2. An abbreviation of able-bodied, placed after the name of a seaman on a ship's papers.

aba[1] (ab′ä), n. [< Ar. 'abā.] 1. A coarse woolen stuff, woven of goats' or camels' or other hair or wool in Syria, Arabia, and neighboring countries. It is generally striped, sometimes in plain bars of black and white or blue and white, sometimes in more elaborate patterns.

2. (a) An outer garment made of the above, very simple in form, worn by the Arabs of the desert. The illustration shows such an aba, made of two breadths of stuff sewed together to make an oblong about four by nine feet. This is then folded at the lines a b, a b, the top edges are sewed together at a c, a c, and armholes are cut at a f, a f. A little simple embroidery in abacus (ab′a-kus), n.; pl. abaci (-sī). [L. abacus, LL. also abax, a sideboard, counting-table, etc., < Gr. ἄβαξ, a reckoning-board, sideboard, etc.; said to be from Phen. abaq,* Heb. 'ābāq, dust, the name alluding to the ancient tables covered with sand on which to make figures and diagrams.] 1. A tray strewn with dust or sand, used in ancient times for calculating. — 2. A contrivance for calculating, consisting of beads or balls strung on wires or rods set in a frame. The abacus was used, with some variations in form, by the Greeks and Romans, and is still in every-day use in many eastern countries, from Russia to Japan, for even the most complex calculations. The sand-strewn tray is supposed to have been introduced from Babylon into Greece by Pythagoras, who taught both arithmetic and geometry upon it; hence this form is sometimes called abacus Pythagoricus. In the form with movable balls, these are used simply as counters to record the successive stages of a mental operation. The sum shown in the annexed engraving of a Chinese abacus (called swanpan, or "reckoning-board") is 5,196,301.

Chinese Abacus, for calculating.

3. In arch.: (a) The slab or plinth which forms the upper member of the capital of a column or pillar, and upon which rests, in classic styles, the lower surface of the architrave. In the Greek Doric it is thick and square, without sculptured decoration; in the Ionic order it is thinner, and ornamented with moldings on the sides; in the Corinthian also it is ornamented, and has concave sides and truncated corners. In medieval architecture the entablature was abandoned and the arch placed directly on the column or pillar; the abacus, however, was retained until the decline of the style. In Byzantine work it is often a deep block affiliated with classic examples. In western styles every variety of size, shape, and ornamentation occurs. The general use of a polygonal or round abacus, as more consonant with neighboring forms than the square shape, is one of the distinctive features of perfected Pointed architecture. (b) Any rectangular slab or piece; especially, a stone or marble tablet serving as a sideboard, shelf, or credence. —4. In Rom. antiq., a board divided into compartments, for use in a game of the nature of draughts, etc. —5. The mystic staff carried by the grand master of the Templars. —Abacus harmonicus. (a) In anc. music, a diagram of the notes with their names. 2. Given up, as to vice, especially to the indulgence of vicious appetites or passions; shamelessly and recklessly wicked; profligate.

> Where our abandoned youth she sees, > Shipwrecked in luxury and lost in ease. Prior, Ode.

= Syn. 1. Forsaken, deserted, given up, relinquished, discarded, rejected, destitute, forlorn. —2. Profligate, Abandoned, Reprobate, depraved, corrupt, vicious, wicked, unprincipled, hardened, dead to honor, incorrigible, irreclaimable. Profligate, abandoned, reprobate express extreme wickedness that has cast off moral restraint. Profligate is applied to one who throws away means and character in the pursuit of vice, and especially denotes depravity exhibited outwardly and conspicuously in conduct; hence it may be used to characterize political conduct: as, a profligate administration. Abandoned is applied to one who has given himself wholly up to the gratification of vicious propensities; it is stronger than profligate and weaker than reprobate. Reprobate is applied to one who has become insensible to reproof and is past hope; from its use in the Bible it has become the theological term for hopeless alienation from virtue or piety. (For comparison with depraved, etc., see criminal, a.)

> Next age will see
> A race more profligate than we. Roscommon.

> To be negligent of what any one thinks of you, does not only show you arrogant but abandoned. J. Hughes.

> In works they deny him, being abominable, and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate. Tit. i. 16.

abandonedly (ą-ban′dọnd-li), adv. In an abandoned manner; without moral restraint.

abandonee (ą-ban-dọ-nē′), n. [< abandon, v., + -ee[1], as if < F. abandonné: see abandoned.] In law, one to whom anything is abandoned.

abandoner (ą-ban′dọn-ėr), n. [< abandon, v., + -er[1].] One who abandons.

> Abandoner of revells, mute, contemplatiue.
> Beau. and Fl., Two Noble Kinsmen.

abandonment (ą-ban′dọn-ment), n. [< F. abandonnement, < abandonner, give up (see abandon, v.), + -ment.] 1. The act of abandoning, or the state of being abandoned; absolute relinquishment; total desertion.

> The ablest men in the Christian community vied with one another in inculcating as the highest form of duty the abandonment of social ties and the mortification of domestic affections. Lecky, Europ. Morals, II. 140.

2. Abandon; enthusiasm; freedom from constraint.

> There can be no greatness without abandonment.
> Emerson, Works and Days.

> In eloquence the great triumphs of the art are, when the orator is lifted above himself. . . . Hence the term abandonment, to describe the self-surrender of the orator. Emerson, Art.

3. In law: (a) The relinquishment of a possession, privilege, or claim. (b) The voluntary leaving of a person to whom one is bound by a relationship of obligation, as a wife, husband, or child; desertion. —4. In maritime law, the surrender of a ship and freight by the owner to one who has become his creditor through contracts made by the latter with the master of the ship. In effect such an abandonment may release the owner from further responsibility. —5. In marine insurance, the relinquishing to underwriters of all the property saved from loss by shipwreck, capture, or other peril provided against in the policy, in order that the insured may be entitled to indemnification for a total loss. —6. In the customs, the giving up of an article by the importer to avoid payment of the duty. —Abandonment for wrongs, in civil law, the relinquishment of a slave or an animal that had committed a trespass to the person injured, in discharge of the owner's liability for the trespass. —Abandonment of railways, in Eng. law, the title of a statute under which any scheme for making a railway may be abandoned and the company dissolved by warrant of the Board of Trade and consent of three fifths of the stock. —Abandonment of an action, in Scots law, the act by which the pursuer abandons the cause. When this is done, the pursuer must pay costs, but may bring a new action. Abandonment of the action is equivalent to the English discontinuance, nonsuit, or nolle prosequi. —Abandonment to the secular arm, in old eccles. law, the handing over of an offender by the church to the civil authorities for punishment such as could not be administered by the ecclesiastical tribunals.

abandum† (ą-ban′dum), n. [ML., also abandonum and abandonnium, formed in imitation of F. abandon: see abandon.] In old law, anything forfeited or confiscated.

abanet (ab′ą-net), n. See abnet.

abanga (a-bang′gä), n. [Native name.] The fruit of a species of palm found in the island of St. Thomas, West Indies, which is said to be useful in pulmonary diseases.

abannition†, abannation† (ab-ą-nish′on, -nā′-shon), n. [< ML. abannitio(n-), abannatio(n-), < abannire*, -are, after E. aban(ne) or ban, F. ban- nir, banish: see aban.] In old law, banishment for a year, as a penalty for manslaughter.

abaptiston (a-bap-tis'ton), n.; pl. abaptista (-tä). [ML., < Gr. ἀβάπτιστον, neut. of ἀβάπτιστος, that will not sink, < ἀ- priv. + βαπτίζειν, dip, sink: see baptize.] In surg., an old form of trepan, the crown of which was made conical, or provided with a ring, collar, or other contrivance, to prevent it from penetrating the cranium too far.

abarthrosis (ab-är-thrō'sis), n. [NL., < L. ab, away, from, + NL. arthrosis, q. v.] Same as diarthrosis.

abarticulation (ab-är-tik-ū-lā'shon), n. [< L. ab, from, + articulatio(n-), a jointing.] In anat., a term sometimes used for diarthrosis, and also for synarthrosis. Also called dearticulation.

abas, n. See abbas, 1.

a bas (ä bä'). [F., down: à (< L. ad), to; bas, low: see base[1].] A French phrase, down! down with! as, à bas les aristocrates! down with the aristocrats: opposed to vive, live, in vive le roi! long live the king, and similar phrases.

abase (a-bās'), v. t.; pret. and pp. abased, ppr. abasing. [< ME. abesse (Gower), < OF. abaissier, etc. (F. abaisser), < ML. abassare, < L. ad + ML. bassare, lower, < LL. bassus, low: see base[1] and bass[1]. The ME. abasen, abaisen, with its many variants, appears always to have the sense of abash, q. v.] 1. To lower or depress, as a thing; bring down. [Rare.]

> When suddeinly that Warriour gan abace
> His threatned speare. Spenser, F. Q., II. i. 26.
>
> And will she yet abase her eyes on me?
> Shak., Rich. III., i. 2.

2. To reduce or lower, as in rank, estimation, office, and the like; depress; humble; degrade. = Syn. 2. Abase, Debase, Degrade, Humiliate, Humble, Disgrace, depress, bring low, dishonor, cast down. Abase, to bring down in feelings or condition; it is less often used than humiliate or humble. Debase, to lower morally or in quality: as, a debased nature; debased coinage. Degrade, literally, to bring down a step, to lower in rank, often used as an official or military term, but figuratively used of lowering morally: as, intemperance degrades its victims; a degrading employment. Humiliate, to reduce in the estimation of one's self or of others; it includes abasement of feeling or loss of self-respect. Humble, to abase, generally without ignominy; induce humility in; reflexively, to become humble, restrain one's pride, act humbly. Disgrace, literally, to put out of favor, but always with ignominy; bring shame upon.

> Those that walk in pride he is able to abase. Dan. iv. 37.
> It is a kind of taking of God's name in vain to debase religion with such frivolous disputes. Hooker.
>
> Every one is degraded, whether aware of it or not, when other people, without consulting him, take upon themselves unlimited power to regulate his destiny.
> J. S. Mill, Rep. Govt., viii.
> Me they seized and me they tortured, me they lash'd and humiliated. Tennyson, Boadicea.
>
> He that humbleth himself shall be exalted. Luke xiv. 11.
>
> Do not disgrace the throne of thy glory. Jer. xiv. 21.

abased (a-bāst'), p. a. In her., the same as abaissé.

abasement (a-bās'ment), n. [< abase + -ment, after F. abaissement, lowering, depression, humiliation.] The act of abasing, humbling, or bringing low; a state of depression, degradation, or humiliation.

abash (a-bash'), v. [< ME. abashen, abassen, abasen, abaisen, etc., < AF. abaiss-, OF. eba(h)iss-, extended stem of aba(h)ir, eba(h)ir, earlier esbahir (> F. s'ébahir), be astonished (= Walloon esbawi = It. sbaire, be astonished), < es- (< L. ex, out: see ex-) + bahir, bair, express astonishment, prob. < bah, interjection expressing astonishment. The D. verbazen, astonish, may be a derivative of OF. esbahir.] I. trans. To confuse or confound, as by suddenly exciting a consciousness of guilt, error, inferiority, etc.; destroy the self-possession of; make ashamed or dispirited; put to confusion. = Syn. Abash, Confuse, Confound, discompose, disconcert, put out of countenance, daunt, overawe. (See list under confuse.) Abash is a stronger word than confuse, but not so strong as confound. We are abashed in the presence of superiors or when detected in vice or misconduct. When we are confused we lose in some degree the control of our faculties, the speech falters, and the thoughts lose their coherence. When we are confounded the reason is overpowered — a condition produced by the force of argument, testimony, or detection, or by disastrous or awe-inspiring events.

> Abashed the devil stood,
> And felt how awful goodness is. Milton, P. L., iv. 846.
>
> Sudden he view'd, in spite of all her art,
> An earthly lover lurking at her heart.
> Amazed, confused, he found his power expired.
> Pope, R. of L., iii. 145.
> Confounded, that her Maker's eyes
> Should look so near upon her foul deformities.
> Milton, Nativity, ii. 43.

II.† reflex. and intrans. To stand or be confounded; lose self-possession.

> Abashe you not for thys derkenes.
> Caxton, Paris and Vienne, p. 62.
>
> For she . . . never abashed.
> Holinshed, Chron., III. 1098.

abashment (a-bash'ment), n. [< ME. abashement, after OF. abaissement: see abash.] The act of abashing, or the state of being abashed; confusion from shame; consternation; fear.

> Which manner of abashment became her not ill.
> Skelton, Poems.
> And all her senses with abashment quite were quayld.
> Spenser, F. Q., III. viii. 34.

abasset†, v. i. Obsolete form of abash. Chaucer.

abassi, abassis (a-bas'i, -is), n. See abbasi.

abastardize† (a-bas'tär-dīz), v. t. [< OF. abastardir (> F. abâtardir), < a- (< L. ad, to) + bastard: see bastard and bastardize.] To bastardize; render illegitimate or base.

> Being ourselves > Corrupted and abastardized thus.
> Daniel, Queen's Arcadia.

Abastor (a-bas'tor), n. [NL. (Gray, 1849).] A North American genus of ordinary harmless serpents of the family Colubridæ. A. erythrogrammus is the hoop-snake, an abundant species in damp marshy places in the southern United States.

abatable (a-bā'ta-bl), a. [< abate + -able.] Capable of being abated: as, an abatable writ or nuisance.

abatamentum† (ab'a-ta-men'tum), n. [ML., after abatement, q. v.] In old Eng. law, the ouster or disseizin of an heir, effected by the wrongful entry of a stranger after the ancestor's death and before the heir had taken possession.

abate (a-bāt'), v.; pret. and pp. abated, ppr. abating. [< ME. abaten, < OF. abatre (F. abattre), < LL. abbatere, < ab + batere, battere, for L. batuere, beat. In the legal sense, abate had orig. a diff. prefix, en-, OF. enbatre, thrust (one's self) into, < en, in, + batre, beat. See batter[1], v., and bate[1].] I. trans. 1†. To beat down; pull or batter down.

> The king of Scots . . . sore abated the walls [of the castle of Norham]. Hall, Chronicles, Hen. VIII., an. 5.

2. To deduct; subtract; withdraw from consideration.

> Nine thousand parishes, abating the odd hundreds.
> Fuller.

3. To lessen; diminish; moderate: as, to abate a demand or a tax.

> Tully was the first who observed that friendship improves happiness and abates misery, by the doubling of our joy and dividing of our grief.
> Addison, Spectator, No. 68.

4†. To deject; depress.

> For miserie doth bravest mindes abate.
> Spenser, Mother Hub. Tale, l. 256.

5. To deprive; curtail.

> She hath abated me of half my train. Shak., Lear, ii. 4.

6†. To deprive of; take away from.

> I would abate her nothing. Shak., Cymbeline, i. 5.

7. In law: (a) To cause to fail; extinguish: as, a cause of action for damages for a personal tort is abated by the death of either party. (b) To suspend or stop the progress of: as, where the cause of action survives the death of a party, the action may be abated until an executor or administrator can be appointed and substituted. (c) To reduce: as, a legacy is abated if the assets, after satisfying the debts, are not sufficient to pay it in full. (d) To destroy or remove; put an end to (a nuisance). A nuisance may be abated either by a public officer pursuant to the judgment of a court, or by an aggrieved person exercising his common-law right.

8. In metal., to reduce to a lower temper.— 9. To steep in an alkaline solution: usually shortened to bate. See bate[5].— Abated arms, weapons whose edge or point is blunted for the tournament.— Abating process, a process by which skins are rendered soft and porous by putting them into a weak solution of ammoniacal salt.

II. intrans. 1. To decrease or become less in strength or violence: as, pain abates; the storm has abated.

> The very mind which admits your evidence to be unanswerable will swing back to its old position the instant that the pressure of evidence abates.
> G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, I. 6.

2. In law: (a) To fail; come to a premature end; stop progress or diminish: as, an action or cause of action may abate by the death or marriage of a party. (b) To enter into a freehold after the death of the last possessor, and before the heir or devisee takes possession. Blackstone.— 3. In the manège, to perform well a downward motion. A horse is said to abate, or take down his curvets, when, working upon curvets, he puts both his hind feet to the ground at once, and observes the same exactness of time in all the motions.

4†. In falconry, to flutter; beat with the wings. See bate[1].= Syn. 1. To Abate, Subside, Intermit, decrease, decline, diminish, lessen, wane, ebb, fall away, moderate, calm. Abate, to diminish in force or intensity: as, the storm abated; "my wonder abated," Addison. Subside, to cease from agitation or commotion; become less in quantity or amount: as, the waves subside; the excitement of the people subsided. Abate is not so complete in its effect as subside. Intermit, to abate, subside, or cease for a time.

> Nor will the raging fever's fire abate
> With golden canopies and beds of state.
> Dryden, tr. of Lucretius, ii. 38.
> A slight temporary fermentation allowed to subside, we should see crystallizations more pure and of more various beauty. Marg. Fuller, Woman in 19th Cent., p. 37.
> A spring which intermits as often as every three minutes. Nichols, Fireside Science, p. 11.

abate† (a-bāt'), n. [< abate, v.] Abatement or decrease.

> The abate of scruples or dragmes. Sir T. Browne.

abate (ä-bā'te), n. See abbate.

abated (a-bā'ted), p. a. [< abate, v.] In decorative art, lowered, beaten down, or cut away, as the background of an ornamental pattern in relief. Used specifically of stone-cutting; also of metal when the pattern or inscription is to show bright on dark, and the ground is therefore worked out with the graving-tool and left rough or hatched in lines.

abatement (a-bāt'ment), n. [< OF. abatement, < abatre, beat down: see abate, v.] 1. The act of abating, or the state of being abated; diminution, decrease, reduction, or mitigation: as, abatement of grief or pain.

> The spirit of accumulation . . . requires abatement rather than increase. J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., I. xiii. § 2.
> Such sad abatement in the goal attained.
> Lowell, Voyage to Vinland.

2. The amount, quantity, or sum by which anything is abated or reduced; deduction; decrease. Specifically, a discount allowed for the prompt payment of a debt, for damage, for overcharge, or for any similar reason; rebate.

> Would the Council of Regency consent to an abatement of three thousand pounds?
> Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xxii.

3. In her., a mark annexed to coat-armor, in order to denote some dishonorable act of the person bearing the coat of arms, or his illegitimate descent. Nine marks for the former purpose are mentioned by heralds, but no instance of their actual use is on record. The bendlet or baton sinister (which see), a mark of illegitimacy, is of the nature of an abatement; but the paternal shield, although charged with the baton sinister, would generally be the most honorable bearing within reach of the illegitimate son. Abatements generally must be regarded as false heraldry, and are very modern in their origin. The word is also used to denote the turning upside down of the whole shield, which was common in the degrading of a knight. Also called rebatement.

> Throwing down the stars [the nobles and senators] to the ground; putting dishonourable abatements into the fairest coats of arms. J. Spencer, Righteous Ruler.

4. In law: (a) Removal or destruction, as of a nuisance. (b) Failure; premature end; suspension or diminution, as of an action or of a legacy. See abate. (c) The act of intruding on a freehold vacated by the death of its former owner, and not yet entered on by the heir or devisee. (d) In revenue law: (1) A deduction from or refunding of duties on goods damaged during importation or in store. (2) A deduction from the amount of a tax. The mode of abatement is prescribed by statute.— 5†. In carp., the waste of a piece of stuff caused by working it into shape.— Plea in abatement, in law, a defense on some ground that serves to suspend or defeat the particular action, and thus distinguished from a plea in bar, which goes to the merits of the claim. Thus, a plea that the defendant is now insane would be only a plea in abatement, because, if sustained, it would at most only suspend the action while his insanity continued; but a plea that he was insane at the time of the transactions alleged would be a plea in bar, as showing that he never incurred any liability whatever. = Syn. 1. Decrease, decline, diminution, subsidence, intermission, waning, ebb.— 2. Rebate, allowance, deduction, discount, mitigation.

abater (a-bā'tėr), n. [See abator.] One who or that which abates. See abator.

abatis[1]† (ab'a-tis), n. [ML.; lit., of the measures: L. ā, ab, from, of; LL. batus, < Gr. βάτος, < Heb. bath, a liquid measure: see bath[2].] In the middle ages, an officer of the stables who had the care of measuring out the provender; an avenor.

abatis[2], abattis (a-ba-tē' or ab'a-tis), n. [< F. abatis, demolition, felling, < OF. abateis, < ML. abbaticius*, < abbatere, beat down, fell: see abate, v.] 1. In fort., a barricade made of felled trees denuded of their smaller branches, with the butt-ends of the trunks embedded in the earth or secured by pickets, and the sharpened ends of the branches directed upward and outward toward an advancing enemy, for the purpose of obstructing his progress. In field-fortifications the abatis is usually constructed in front of the ditch. See fortification.

Abatis.

2. In coal-mining, walls of cord-wood piled up crosswise to keep the underground roads open so as to secure ventilation. [Leicestershire, Eng.]

abatised, abattised (ab'a-tist), p. a. Provided with an abatis.

abat-jour (a-bä'zhör), n. [F., any contrivance or apparatus to admit light, or to throw it in a desired direction, as a lamp-shade; < abattre, throw down (see abate), + jour, day, daylight: see journal.] 1. A skylight, or any beveled aperture made in the wall of an apartment or in a roof, for the better admission of light from above. — 2. A sloping, box-like structure, flaring upward and open at the top, attached to a window on the outside, to prevent those within from seeing objects below, or for the purpose of directing light downward into the window.

abator (a-bā'tor), n. [Also abater; < abate + -er[1], -or[2].] One who or that which abates. Specifically, in law: (a) A person who without right enters into a freehold, on the death of the last possessor, before the heir or devisee. (b) An agent or cause by which an abatement is procured. (c) One who removes a nuisance. See abate, abatement.

abattis, n. See abatis[2].

abattoir (a-bat-wor'), n. [F., < abatt-re, knock down, slaughter, + -oir (< L. -ōrium), indicating place.] A public slaughter-house. In Europe and in the United States abattoirs of great size have been erected and provided with elaborate machinery for the humane and rapid slaughter of large numbers of animals, and for the proper commercial and sanitary disposal of the waste material.

Abat-vent, 13th century.

a battuta (ä bät-tö'tä). [It.: see bate[1], batter[1].] With the beat. In music, a direction to resume strict time after the free declamation of a singer: chiefly used in recitatives. It is equivalent to a tempo. Grove.

abature (ab'a-tūr), n. [< OF. abatture, a throwing down, pl. abattures, underbrush trampled down, < abatre, beat down: see abate, v.] The mark or track of a beast of the chase on the grass; foiling.

abat-vent (a-bä'von), n. [F., < abattre, throw down (see abate), + vent, wind: see vent.] 1. A vertical series of sloping roofs or broad slats, inclined outward and downward, forming the filling of a belfry-light, and designed to admit ventilation to the timber frame while protecting the interior from rain and wind, and to direct downward the sound of the bells. — 2. A sloping roof, as that of a penthouse: so named because the slope neutralizes the force of the wind. — 3. Any contrivance designed to act as a shelter or protection from the wind. Specifically, a revolving metallic cap carrying a vane, attached to the top of a chimney to keep the wind from blowing directly down its throat.

Abat-voix, pulpit of Trinity Church, New York.

abat-voix (a-bä'vwo), n. [F., < abattre (see abate, v.) + voix, voice: see voice.] A sounding-board over a pulpit or rostrum, designed to reflect the speaker's voice downward toward the audience, or in any desired direction.

abawe†, v. t. [< ME. abawen, abauen, < OF. abaubir, astonish, < a- + baubir, baubier, stammer, < L. balbutire, stammer, < balbus (OF. baube), stammering: see booby and balbuties. The ME. form and sense seem to have been affected by OF. abahir, ebahir, esbahir, be astonished, for which see abash.] To abash; dazzle; astonish.

I was abawed for marveile. Rom. of Rose, l. 3646.

abaxial (ab-ak'si-al), a. Same as abaxile.

abaxile (ab-ak'sil), a. [< L. ab, away from, + axis: see axile.] Not in the axis. Specifically, in bot., applied to an embryo placed out of the axis of the seed. Another form is abaxial.

abb (ab), n. [< ME. abbe, < AS. āb, short for āweb, woof, < āwefan (= OHG. arweban, G. erweben), weave, < ā- + wefan, weave: see a-[1] and weave, web. From another form of āweb, namely, ōweb, ōwef, comes E. woof, q. v.] 1. Yarn for the warp in weaving. — 2. In wool-sorting, one of two qualities of wool known as coarse abb and fine abb respectively.

abba[1] (ab'ä), n. [LL. abba, < Gr. ἀββᾶ, < Aramaic 'abbā, 'O father,' 'my father'; Semitic ab, father.] Father. It is used in the New Testament three times (Mark xiv. 36, Rom. viii. 15, Gal. iv. 6), in each instance accompanied by its translation, "Abba, Father," as an invocation of the Deity, expressing close filial relation. Either through its liturgical use in the Judeo-Christian church or through its employment by the Syriac monks, the word passed into general ecclesiastical language in the form represented by abbot (which see).

abba[2], n. See ābā[1].

abbacinate (a-bas'i-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. abbacinated, ppr. abbacinating. [< ML. abacinatus, pp. of abacinare (It. abbacinare = OF. abaciner), < a- for ad-, to, + bacinus, basin: see basin.] To deprive of sight by placing a red-hot copper basin close to the eyes: a mode of punishment employed in the middle ages. Also spelled abacinate.

abbacination (a-bas-i-nā'shon), n. [< abbacinate.] The act or process of blinding a person by placing a red-hot copper basin close to the eyes. Also spelled abacination.

abbacy (ab'a-si), n.; pl. abbacies (-siz). [Earlier abbatie, < LL. abbatia: see abbey[1].] 1. The office of an abbot; an abbot's dignity, rights, privileges, and jurisdiction.

According to Felinus, an abbacy is the dignity itself, since abbot is a term or word of dignity, and not of office. Ayliffe, Parergon.

Owing to the vast wealth of the church, the chief offices in it, and especially the bishoprics and the great abbacies, had become positions of great worldly power and dignity. Stillé, Stud. Med. Hist., p. 286.

2. An abbatial establishment; an abbey with all that pertains to it.

The abbot was elected by the monks of the monastery, at least in the greater part of abbacies. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, v. 1.

Also called abbotcy.

abbandonatamente (ab-bän-dō-nä-tä-men'te), adv. [It., < abbandonata, fem. pp. of abbandonare (see abandon), + adv. suffix -mente, orig. L. mente, abl. of mens, mind: see mental.] In music, with abandonment; so as to make the time subordinate to the expression.

abbast, n. [Pers.] 1. An Eastern weight for pearls, said to be 2¼ grains troy. Also spelled abas. — 2. Same as abbasi, 1.

abbasi (a-bas'i), n. [Persian abāsī: from the Persian ruler Shah Abbas II.] 1. The name of a silver coin formerly current in Persia. It is not certain to what particular coin the term was applied; according to Marsden, various pieces coined in 1684, 1700, and 1701, and weighing about 4 dwt. 17 gr., are abbasis, and are worth about 29 cents. 2. The 20-copeck silver piece circulating in Russia, weighing about 61 grains, .500 fine, and worth about 8¼ cents.

Also written abassi, abassis.

abbat† (ab'at), n. Same as abbot.

abbate (ab-bä'te), n.; pl. abbati (-ti). [It., also abate, < L. abbātem, acc. of abbas: see abbot.] A title of honor, now given to ecclesiastics in Italy not otherwise designated, but formerly applied to all in any way connected with clerical affairs, tribunals, etc., and wearing the ecclesiastical dress. Also spelled abate.

An old Abate meek and mild,
My friend and teacher when a child.
Longfellow, Wayside Inn, 3d Inter.

abbatesse†, n. See abbotess.

abbatial (a-bā'shial), a. [< ML. abbatialis, < LL. abbatia: see abbacy.] Pertaining to an abbot or abbey: as, an abbatial benediction; abbatial lands.

abbatical† (a-bat'i-kal), a. Same as abbatial.

abbaye†, abbayet, n. Middle English forms of abbey[1].

They carried him into the next abbay. Chaucer, Prior's Tale.

They would rend this abbaye's massy nave. Scott, L. of L. M., ii. 14.

abbé (a-bā'), n. [F., < L. abbatem, acc. of abbas: see abbot.] In France, an abbot. (a) More generally, and especially before the French revolution: (1) Any secular person, whether ecclesiastic or layman, holding an abbey in commendam, that is, enjoying a portion, generally about one third, of its revenues, with certain honors, but, except by privilege from the pope, having no jurisdiction over the monks, and not bound to residence. Such persons were styled abbés commendataires, and were required to be in orders, though a dispensation from this requirement was not uncommonly obtained. (2) A title assumed, either in the hope of obtaining an abbey or for the sake of distinction, by a numerous class of men who had studied theology, practised celibacy, and adopted a peculiar dress, but who had only a formal connection with the church, and were for the most part employed as tutors in the families of the nobility, or engaged in literary pursuits. (b) In recent usage, a title assumed, like the Italian title abbate (which see), by a class of unbeneficed secular clerks.

abbess (ab'es), n. [< ME. abbesse, abbes, < OF. abbesse, abesse = Pr. abadessa, < L. abbatissa, fem. of abbas: see abbot, and cf. abbotess.] 1. A female superior of a convent of nuns, regularly in the same religious orders in which the monks are governed by an abbot; also, a superior of canonesses. An abbess is, in general, elected by the nuns, and is subject to the bishop of the diocese, by whom she is invested according to a special rite called the benediction of an abbess. She must be at least forty years of age, and must have been for eight years a nun in the same monastery. She has the government of the convent, with the administration of the goods of the community, but cannot, on account of her sex, exercise any of the spiritual functions pertaining to the priesthood. Sometimes civil or feudal rights have been attached to the office of abbess, as also jurisdiction over other subordinate convents.

2. A title retained in Hanover, Würtemberg, Brunswick, and Schleswig-Holstein by the lady superiors of the Protestant seminaries and sisterhoods to which the property of certain convents was transferred at the Reformation.

abbey[1] (ab'e), n. [< ME. abbeye, abbaye, etc., < OF. abeie, abaie, < LL. abbatia, an abbey, < L. abbas, an abbot: see abbot.] 1. A monastery or convent of persons of either sex devoted to religion and celibacy, and governed by an abbot or abbess (which see). Royal and imperial abbeys were dependent on the supreme civil authority in their temporal administration; others were episcopal, etc. In exempt abbeys, the abbot or abbess is subject not to the bishop of the diocese, but directly to the pope.

Plan of the Abbey of St. Germain-des-Prés, Paris, in the 13th century.

A, church; B, cloister; C, city gate; D, country gate, or Porte Papale; E, chapter-house, with dormitories above; F, Chapel of the Virgin; G, refectory; H, cellars and presses; I, abbot's lodging; K, ditches; L, gardens; M, various dependencies.

2. The buildings of a monastery or convent; sometimes, in particular, the house set apart for the residence of the abbot or abbess. After the suppression of the English monasteries by Henry VIII. many of the abbatial buildings were converted into private dwellings, to which the name abbey is still applied, as, for example, Newstead Abbey, the residence of Lord Byron. 3. A church now or formerly attached to a monastery or convent: as, Westminster Abbey. — 4. In Scotland, the sanctuary formerly afforded by the abbey of Holyrood Palace, as having been a royal residence.

abbey[2] (ab'e), n. [Prob. a modification of abele, q. v., in simulation of abbey[1].] A name sometimes given to the white poplar, Populus alba. [Eng.]

Obverse. Reverse.

Abbey-counter, in the British Museum.

abbey-counter (ab′e-koun″ter), n. [< abbey[1] + counter[1].] A kind of medal, stamped with sacred emblems, the arms of an abbey, or other device, given to a pilgrim as a token of his having visited the shrine; a kind of pilgrim's sign (which see, under pilgrim).

abbey-laird (ab′e-lārd), n. [< abbey[1] (in ref. to the abbey of Holyrood) + laird, proprietor.] In Scotland, a name humorously applied to an insolvent debtor who escaped his creditors by taking refuge within the legal sanctuary formerly constituted by the precincts of Holyrood Abbey.

abbey-land (ab′e-land), n. [< abbey[1] + land.] An estate in land annexed to an abbey.

abbey-lubber (ab′e-lub″ėr), n. [< abbey[1] + lubber.] An old term of contempt for an able-bodied idler who grew sleek and fat upon the charity of religious houses: also sometimes applied to monks.

> This is no huge, overgrown abbey-lubber.
> Dryden, Spanish Friar, iii. 3.

abbot (ab′ọt), n. [< ME. abbot, abbod, < AS. abbot, usually abbod, abbud, < LL. abbātem, acc. of abbas, < LGr. ἀββᾶς, also ἀββᾶ, father: see abba[1].] 1. Literally, father: a title originally given to any monk, but afterward limited to the head or superior of a monastery. It was formerly especially used in the order of St. Benedict, rector being employed by the Jesuits, guardianus by the Franciscans, prior by the Dominicans, and archimandrite or hegoumenos by the Greek and Oriental churches, to designate the same office. Originally the abbots, like the monks, were usually laymen; later they were required to be in holy orders. They were at first subject to the bishop of the diocese; but in the contentions between the bishops and abbots the latter in many cases gradually acquired exemption from jurisdiction of the bishops and became subject to the pope directly, or to an abbot-general, or archabbot, who exercised a supervision over several associated abbeys. As the influence of the religious orders increased, the power, dignity, and wealth of the abbots increased proportionally; many of them held rank as temporal lords, and, as mitered abbots, exercised certain episcopal functions in the territory surrounding their monasteries. In the reign of Henry VIII. twenty-six abbots sat in the House of Lords. Until the sixth century abbots were chosen from the monks by the bishop; since that time they have been generally elected by the monks themselves, ordinarily for life. In some instances, where the administration of the revenues of an abbey fell under the civil authority, the conferring of the benefice, and therefore the nomination of the abbot, came into the hands of the temporal sovereign, a practice variously regulated by concordats with the different countries. The right of confirmation varies; the solemn benediction of an abbot ordinarily belongs to the bishop of the diocese, occasionally to the head abbot, or to a special bishop chosen by the abbot elect. In some instances of exempt abbeys it has been conferred by the pope in person.

2. In later usage, loosely applied to the holder of one of certain non-monastic offices. (a) The principal of a body of parochial clergy, as an Episcopal rector. (b) A cathedral officer at Toledo, Spain. (c) In the middle ages, the head of various guilds, associations, and popular assemblages: as, abbot of bell-ringers; the abbot of misrule.

3. A title retained in Hanover, Würtemberg, Brunswick, and Schleswig-Holstein by the heads of certain Protestant institutions to which the property of various abbeys was transferred at the Reformation. See abbess, 2.—Abbot of abbots, a title formerly conferred upon the abbot of the original Benedictine monastery of Monte Cassino.—Abbot of misrule (in England), abbot of unreason (in Scotland), the personage who took the principal part in the Christmas revels of the populace before the Reformation.—Abbot of the people (abbas populi). (a) From 1270 to 1339, the nominal chief magistrate of the republic of Genoa. (b) The chief magistrate of the Genoese in Galata.—Abbot of yellow-beaks, or freshmen, a mock title at the University of Paris.—Cardinal abbot, a title borne by the abbots of Cluny and Vendôme, who were ex officio cardinals.—Mitered abbot, an abbot who has the privilege of using the insignia and exercising certain of the functions of a bishop.—Regular abbot, an abbot duly elected and confirmed, and exercising the functions of the office.—Secular abbot, a person who is not a monk, but holds an abbacy as an ecclesiastical benefice with the title and some of the revenues and honors of the office. See def. 3, above.—Titular abbot, a person possessing the title but not exercising the functions of an abbot, as when an abbey had been confiscated or given in commendam. See abbé.—Triennial abbot, an abbot appointed for three years instead of, as ordinarily, for life.=Syn. Abbot, Prior. See prior.

abbotcy (ab′ọt-si), n. [< abbot + -cy.] Same as abbacy. [Rare.]

abbotess†, n. [< ME. abbatesse, -isse, < AS. abbodesse, -isse, abbadisse, abbudisse, < ML. abbadissa, prop. abbatissa (> ult. abbess, q. v.), < abbas (abbat-) + fem. -issa.] An abbess. Also written abbatesse.

> Abbots, Abbotesses, Presbyters, and Deacons. Selden.
> And at length became abbatesse there.
> Holinshed, Chron.

abbot-general (ab′ọt-jen″e-ral), n. The head of a congregation of monasteries.

abbotship (ab′ọt-ship), n. [< abbot + -ship.] The state or office of an abbot.

abbozzo (ȧb-bot′sō), n. [It., also abbozzato, sketch, outline, < abbozzare, to sketch, delineate, also bozzare, < bozza, blotch, rough draft, = Pr. bossa (> F. bosse), swelling, < OHG. bōzo, a bundle: see boss[1] and beat.] The dead or first coloring laid on a picture after the sketch has been blocked in. Mrs. Merrifield, Ancient Practice of Painting (1849), I. ccc.

abbr. A common abbreviation of abbreviated and abbreviation.

abbreuvoir, n. See abreuvoir.

abbreviate (ȧ-brē′vi-āt), v.; pret. and pp. abbreviated, ppr. abbreviating. [< LL. abbreviatus, pp. of abbreviare, shorten, < ad-, to, + brevis, short. The same L. verb, through the F., has become E. abridge: see abridge and brief.]

I. trans. 1. To make briefer; abridge; make shorter by contraction or omission of a part: as, to abbreviate a writing or a word.—2. In math., to reduce to the lowest terms, as fractions.=Syn. 1. To shorten, curtail, abridge, epitomize, reduce, compress, condense, cut down.

II. intrans. To practise or use abbreviation.

> It is one thing to abbreviate by contracting, another by cutting off. Bacon, Essays, xxvi.

abbreviate (ȧ-brē′vi-āt), a. and n. [< LL. abbreviatus: see abbreviate, v.]

I. a. Abbreviated.

II. n. An abridgment; an abstract.

> The Speaker, taking the Bill in his hand, reads the Abbreviate or Abstract of the said bill.
> Chamberlayne, State of Great Britain.

abbreviately (ȧ-brē′vi-āt-li), adv. Briefly. [Rare.]

> The sweete smacke that Yarmouth findes in it . . . abbreviatly and meetely according to my old Sarum plaine-song I have harpt upon.
> Nashe, Lenten Stuffe (Harl. Misc., VI. 162).

★abbreviation (ȧ-brē-vi-ā′shọn), n. [= F. abréviation, < LL. abbreviatio(n-), < abbreviare: see abbreviate, v.] 1. The act of abbreviating, shortening, or contracting; the state of being abbreviated; abridgment.

> This book, as graver authors say, was called Liber Domus Dei, and, by abbreviation, Domesday Book.
> Sir W. Temple, Introd. to Hist. of Eng.

2. A shortened or contracted form; a part used for the whole. Specifically, a part of a word, phrase, or title so used; a syllable, generally the initial syllable, used for the whole word; a letter, or a series of letters, standing for a word or words: as, Esq. for esquire; A. D. for Anno Domini; F. R. S. for Fellow of the Royal Society.

3. In math., a reduction of fractions to the lowest terms.—4. In music, a method of notation by means of which certain repeated notes, chords, or passages are indicated without being written out in full. There are various forms of abbreviation, the most common of which are here shown:

=Syn. 2. Abbreviation, Contraction. An abbreviation of a word is strictly a part of it, generally the first letter or syllable, taken for the whole, with no indication of the remaining portion: as, A. D. for Anno Domini; Gen. for Genesis; math. for mathematics; Alex. for Alexander. A contraction, on the other hand, is made by the elision of certain letters or syllables from the body of the word, but in such a manner as to indicate the whole word: as, recd. payt. or rec'd pay't for received payment; contd. for contracted or continued; Wm. for William. In common usage, however, this distinction is not always observed.

abbreviatio placitorum (ȧ-brē-vi-ā′shi-ō plas-i-tō′rum). [ML.] Literally, an abridgment of the pleas; a brief report of law-cases; specifically, notes of cases decided in the reign of King John, which constitute the earliest English law-reports, and embody the germs and early developments of the common law.

abbreviator (ȧ-brē′vi-ā-tọr), n. [< ML. abbreviator, < LL. abbreviare: see abbreviate, v.] 1. One who abbreviates, abridges, or reduces to a smaller compass; specifically, one who abridges what has been written by another.

> Neither the archbishop nor his abbreviator.
> Sir W. Hamilton, Logic.

2. One of a number of secretaries in the chancery of the pope who abbreviate petitions according to certain established and technical rules, and draw up the minutes of the apostolic letters. They formerly numbered 72, of whom the 12 principal were styled de majori parco (literally, of the greater parquet, from the parquet in the chancery where they wrote) and 22 others de minori parco (of the lesser parquet), the remainder being of lower rank. The number is now reduced to 11, all de majori parco. They sign the apostolic bulls in the name of the cardinal vice-chancellor. The abbreviator of the curia is a prelate not belonging to the above college, but attached to the office of the apostolic datary (see datary[2]); he expedites bulls relating to pontifical laws and constitutions, as for the canonization of saints, and the like.

abbreviatory (ȧ-brē′vi-ā-tọ-ri), a. [< abbreviate + -ory.] Abbreviating or tending to abbreviate; shortening; contracting.

abbreviature†, (ȧ-brē′vi-ā-tụr), n. [< abbreviate + -ure.] 1. A letter or character used as an abbreviation.

> The hand of Providence writes often by abbreviatures, hieroglyphics, or short characters.
> Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., § 25.

2. An abridgment; a compendium.

> This is an excellent abbreviature of the whole duty of a Christian. Jer. Taylor, Guide to Devotion.

abbrochment†, (ȧ-brōch′ment), n. [< ML. abrocamentum, appar. formed from stem of E. brokage, brok-er, etc.] The act of forestalling the market or monopolizing goods. Erroneously spelled abroachment.

abb-wool (ab′wụl), n. 1. Wool for the abb or warp of a web.—2. A variety of wool of a certain fineness. See abb.

a-b-c (ā-bē-cē). [ME. abc; as a word, spelled variously abece, apece, apecy, apsie, apcie, absee, absie, absey, abeesee, etc., especially for a primer or spelling-book; in comp., absey-book, etc. Cf. abecedarian and alphabet.] 1. The first three letters of the alphabet; hence, the alphabet.—2. An a-b-c book; a primer.—A-b-c book, a primer for teaching the alphabet.

Abd (abd). [Ar. 'abd, a slave, servant.] A common element in Arabic names of persons, meaning servant: as, Abdallah, servant of God; Abd-el-Kader, servant of the Mighty One; Abd-ul-Latif (commonly written Abdullatif or Abdallatif), servant of the Gracious One.

abdalavi, abdelavi (ab-da-, ab-de-lä′vē), n. [Ar.] The native name of the hairy melon of Egypt, a variety of the muskmelon, Cucumis Melo.

Abderian (ab-dē′ri-an), a. [< L. Abdēra, < Gr. Ἄβδηρα, a town in Thrace, birthplace of Democritus, called the laughing philosopher.] Pertaining to the town of Abdera or its inhabitants; resembling or recalling in some way the philosopher Democritus of Abdera (see Abderite); hence, given to incessant or continued laughter.

Abderite (ab′de-rīt), n. [< L. Abdērita, also Abderites, < Gr. Ἀβδηρίτης, < Ἄβδηρα, L. Abdēra.] 1. An inhabitant of Abdera, an ancient maritime town in Thrace.—2. A stupid person, the inhabitants of Abdera having been proverbial for their stupidity.—The Abderite, Democritus of Abdera, born about 460 B. C., and the most learned of the Greek philosophers prior to Aristotle. He was, with Leucippus, the founder of the atomic or atomistic philosophy (see atomic), the first attempt at a complete mechanical interpretation of physical and psychical phenomena. The tradition that Democritus always laughed at the follies of mankind gained for him the title of the laughing philosopher. Fragments of some of his numerous works have been preserved.

abdest (ab′dest), n. [Per. ābdast, < āb, water, + dast, hand.] Purification or ablution before prayer: a Mohammedan rite.

Abdevenham (ab-dev'n-ham), n. In astrol., the head of the twelfth house in a scheme of the heavens.

abdicable (ab'di-kạ-bl), a. [< L. as if abdicabilis*, < abdicare: see abdicate.] Capable of being abdicated.

abdicant (ab'di-kant), a. and n. [< L. abdican(t-)s, ppr. of abdicare: see abdicate.] I. a. Abdicating; renouncing. [Rare.]

Monks abdicant of their orders.
Whitlock, Manners of Eng. People, p. 93.

II. n. One who abdicates.

abdicate (ab'di-kāt), v.; pret. and pp. abdicated, ppr. abdicating. [< L. abdicatus, pp. of abdicare, renounce, lit. proclaim as not belonging to one, < ab, from, + dicāre, proclaim, declare, akin to dicĕre, say.] I. trans. 1. To give up, renounce, abandon, lay down, or withdraw from, as a right or claim, office, duties, dignity, authority, and the like, especially in a voluntary, public, or formal manner.

The cross-bearers abdicated their service.
Gibbon, D. and F., lxvii.

He [Charles II.] was utterly without ambition. He detested business, and would sooner have abdicated his crown than have undergone the trouble of really directing the administration. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., i.

2. To discard; cast away; take leave of: as, to abdicate one's mental faculties.—3. In civil law, to disclaim and expel from a family, as a child; disinherit during lifetime: with a personal subject, as father, parent.

The father will disinherit or abdicate his child, quite cashier him.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. (To the Reader), I. 86.

4†. To put away or expel; banish; renounce the authority of; dethrone; degrade.

Scaliger would needs turn down Homer, and abdicate him after the possession of three thousand years.
Dryden, Pref. to Third Misc.

=Syn. 1. To resign, renounce, give up, quit, vacate, relinquish, lay down, abandon, desert. (See list under abandon, v.)

II. intrans. To renounce or give up something; abandon some claim; relinquish a right, power, or trust.

He cannot abdicate for his children, otherwise than by his own consent in form to a bill from the two houses.
Swift, Sent. of Ch. of Eng. Man.

Don John is represented . . . to have voluntarily restored the throne to his father, who had once abdicated in his favor. Ticknor, Span. Lit., II. 221.

abdicated (ab'di-kā-ted), p. a. Self-deposed; in the state of one who has renounced or given up a right, etc.: as, "the abdicated Emperor of Austria," Howells, Venetian Life, xxi.

abdication (ab-di-kā'shọn), n. [< L. abdicatio(n-), < abdicare: see abdicate.] The act of abdicating; the giving up of an office, power or authority, right or trust, etc.; renunciation; especially, the laying down of a sovereignty hitherto inherent in the person or in the blood.

The consequences drawn from these facts [were] that they amounted to an abdication of the government, which abdication did not only affect the person of the king himself, but also of all his heirs, and rendered the throne absolutely and completely vacant. Blackstone, Com., I. iii.

Each new mind we approach seems to require an abdication of all our present and past possessions.
Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 311.

abdicative (ab'di-kā-tiv), a. [< abdicate + -ive; in form like L. abdicativus, negative, < abdicare.] Causing or implying abdication. [Rare.]

abdicator (ab'di-kā-tọr), n. [< L. abdicare: see abdicate.] One who abdicates.

abditive (ab'di-tiv), a. [< L. abditivus, removed or separated from, < abditus, pp. of abdere, put away, < ab, from, away, + -dare (in comp.), put.] Having the power or quality of hiding. [Rare.]

abditory (ab'di-tọ-ri), n. [< ML. abditorium, < L. abdere: see abditive.] A concealed repository; a place for hiding or preserving valuables, as goods, money, relics, etc. [Rare.]

abdomen (ab-dō'men or ab'dō-men), n. [L. abdōmen, abdūmen; of uncertain origin; not connected with abdere, conceal]. 1. The belly; that part of the body of a mammal which lies between the thorax and the pelvis; the perivisceral cavity containing most of the digestive and some of the urogenital organs and associated structures. It is bounded above by the diaphragm, which separates it from the thoracic cavity; below by the brim of the pelvic cavity, with which it is continuous; behind by the vertebral column and the psoas and quadratus lumborum muscles; in front and laterally by several lower ribs, the iliac bones, and the abdominal muscles proper. The walls of the abdomen are lined with the serous membrane called peritoneum, and are externally invested with common integument. Its external surface is arbitrarily divided into certain definite regions, called abdominal regions (see abdominal). The principal contents of the abdomen, in man and other mammals, are the end of the esophagus, the stomach, the small and most of the large intestine, the liver, pancreas, and spleen, the kidneys, suprarenal capsules, ureters, bladder (in part), uterus (during pregnancy at least), and sometimes the testicles, with the associated nervous, vascular, and serous structures. The apertures in the abdominal walls are, usually, several through the diaphragm, for the passage of the esophagus, nerves, blood-vessels, and lymphatics; in the groin, for the passage of the femoral vessels and nerves and the spermatic cord, or the round ligament of the uterus; and at the navel, in the fetus, for the passage of the umbilical vessels.

2. In vertebrates below mammals, in which there is no diaphragm, and the abdomen consequently is not separated from the thorax, a region of the body corresponding to but not coincident with the human abdomen, and varying in extent according to the configuration of the body. Thus, the abdomen of a serpent is coextensive with the under side of the body from head to tail; and in descriptive ornithology "pectus is restricted to the swelling anterior part of the gastræum, which we call belly or abdomen as soon as it begins to straighten out and flatten." Coues, N. A. Birds, p. 96.

a, Abdomen of an Insect (Isosoma hordei).

3. In entom., the hind body, the posterior one of the three parts of a perfect insect, united with the thorax by a slender connecting portion, and containing the greater part of the digestive apparatus. It is divided into a number of rings or segments, typically ten (or eleven, as in certain families of Orthoptera), on the sides of which are small respiratory stigmata, or spiracles.

4. In Arthropoda other than insects, the corresponding hinder part of the body, however distinguished from the thorax, as the tail of a lobster or the apron of a crab.—5. In ascidians (Tunicata), a special posterior portion of the body, situated behind the great pharyngeal cavity, and containing most of the alimentary canal.

In . . . most of the compound Ascidians, the greater part of the alimentary canal lies altogether beyond the branchial sac, in a backward prolongation of the body which has been termed the abdomen, and is often longer than all the rest of the body.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 517.

★abdominal (ab-dom'i-nạl), a. and n. [< NL. abdominalis, < L. abdomen: see abdomen.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to the abdomen or belly; situated in or on the abdomen: as, abdominal ventral fins.—2. In ichth., having ventral fins under the abdomen and about the middle of the body: as, an abdominal fish. See Abdominales.

Abdominal Fish, with ventral behind pectoral fin.

—Abdominal aorta, in man and other mammals, that portion of the aorta between its passage through the diaphragm and its bifurcation into the iliac arteries.—Abdominal apertures. See abdomen, 1.—Abdominal fins, in ichth., ventral fins when situated behind the pectoral fins.—Abdominal legs, in entom., false legs or prop-legs of the abdomen. In the larvæ of true insects they are soft, fleshy, inarticulate, and deciduous. There may be as many as eight pairs, or only a single pair, or none. The spinnerets of spiders, though abdominal in position, are regarded as homologous with the jointed legs of higher insects.—Abdominal line, in human anat.: (a) The white line (linea alba) or lengthwise mid-line of union of the abdominal muscles along the front of the belly, and one of several cross-lines intersecting the course of the rectus muscle. The exaggeration of these lines in art gives the "checker-board" appearance of the abdomen in statuary. (b) pl. Certain imaginary lines drawn to divide the surface of the abdomen into regions, as given below.—Abdominal pore, in some fishes, an aperture in the belly connected with the sexual function.

Torso Belvedere, showing "checker-board" appearance.

This [the ovarium], in some few fishes, sheds its ova, as soon as they are ripened, into the peritoneal cavity, whence they escape by abdominal pores, which place that cavity in direct communication with the exterior.
Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 95.

Abdominal reflex, a superficial reflex consisting of a contraction in the abdominal muscles when the skin over the abdomen in the mammary line is stimulated.—Abdominal regions, in human anat., certain regions into which the abdomen is arbitrarily divided for the purpose of mapping its surface with reference to the viscera which lie beneath these regions respectively. Two horizontal parallel lines being drawn around the body, one (a a) crossing the cartilage of the ninth rib, the other (b b) crossing the highest point of the iliac bone, the abdominal surface is divided into three zones, an upper, a middle, and a lower, respectively called epigastric, umbilical, and hypogastric. Each of these is subdivided into three parts by two vertical lines (c c), each drawn through the middle of Poupart's ligament. The central part of the epigastric zone (1) retains the name of epigastric; its lateral portions (4 4) are the right and left hypochondriac regions; the middle part of the umbilical (2) is called the umbilical region, while its lateral portions (5 5) are the right and left lumbar regions; the middle portion of the hypogastric zone (3) is called the hypogastric region, but sometimes the pubic region, while its lateral portions (6 6) are called the right and left iliac (or inguinal) regions. The adjoining region of the thigh, below the fold of the groin, is properly excluded.—Abdominal respiration, that type of respiration in which the action of the diaphragm, and consequently the movement of the abdomen, is most marked; contrasted with thoracic or costal respiration.—Abdominal ribs, in herpet., a series of transverse ossifications in the wall of the abdomen of some reptiles, as dinosaurs and crocodiles; in the latter the series consists of seven on each side, lying superficial to the recti muscles. They are quite distinct from true ribs, and considered by some to be dermal ossifications.

a a, horizontal line through the cartilage of the ninth rib; b b, horizontal line touching the highest parts of the iliac crests; c c, vertical lines drawn through the middle of Poupart's ligament, on either side; 1, epigastric region; 2, umbilical region; 3, hypogastric region; 4 4, hypochondriac regions; 5 5, lumbar regions; 6 6, iliac regions.

Abdominal dermal ribs are developed in some species [of Dinosauria], if not in all. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 227.

Abdominal ring, in anat.: (a) Internal, an oval opening in the fascia of the transversalis abdominis (transverse muscle of the abdomen), about midway between the superior iliac spine and the pubic spine, and half an inch above Poupart's ligament. (b) External, a similar oblong opening in the fascia of the obliquus externus abdominis (external oblique muscle of the abdomen), further down and nearer the mid-line of the body. These rings are respectively the inlet and outlet of the inguinal canal. Also called inguinal rings.—Abdominal scutella, in herpet., the short, wide, imbricated scales which lie along the belly of a serpent from chin to anus.—Abdominal segments, in entom., etc., the individual somites or rings of which the abdomen of an insect, a crustacean, etc., is or may be composed.—Abdominal vertebræ, in ichth., all the vertebræ behind the head which have ribs or rib-like processes arching over the visceral cavity.—Abdominal viscera, those organs, collectively considered, which are situated in the abdomen, being especially those of the digestive system. See abdomen, 1.

II. n. One of the Abdominales (which see).

Abdominales (ab-dom-i-nā'lēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of abdominalis: see abdominal.] 1. A name introduced into the ichthyological system of Linnæus, and variously applied: (a) by Linnæus, as an ordinal name for all osseous fishes with abdominal ventrals; (b) by Cuvier, as a subordinal name for all those malacopterygian osseous fishes which have abdominal ventrals; (c) by J. Müller, as a subordinal name for those malacopterygian fishes which have abdominal ventrals and also a pneumatic duct between the air-bladder and intestinal canal. The name has also been applied to other groups varying more or less from the preceding. The salmonids and the clupeids or herring family are typical representatives in all the above divisions.

2. A section of the coleopterous family Carabidæ, proposed by Latreille for beetles with the abdomen enlarged in proportion to the thorax.

Abdominalia (ab-dom-i-nā'li-ạ), n. pl. [NL. (sc. animalia, animals), neut. pl. of abdominalis: see abdominal.] An order of cirriped crustaceans, having a segmented body, three pairs of abdominal limbs, no thoracic limbs, a flask-shaped carapace, an extensive mouth, two eyes, and the sexes distinct. The members of the order all burrow in shells. Two families are recognized, Cryptophialidæ and Alcippidæ.

The whole family of the Abdominalia, a name proposed by Darwin, if I am not mistaken, have the sexes separate.
Beneden, An. Parasites. (N. E. D.)

abdominally (ab-dom'i-nạl-i), adv. On or in the abdomen; toward the abdomen.

abdominoscopy (ab-dom-i-nos'kō-pi), n. [< L. abdomen (-min-) + Gr. -σκοπία, < σκοπεῖν, look at, view.] In med., examination of the abdomen for the detection of disease.

abdominous (ab-dom'i-nus), a. [< abdomen (-min-) + -ous.] 1. Of or pertaining to the abdomen; abdominal.—2. Having a large belly; pot-bellied. [Rare.]

Gorgonius sits abdominous and wan,
Like a fat squab upon a Chinese fan.
Cowper, Prog. of Err.

abduce (ab-dūs′), v. t.; pret. and pp. abduced, ppr. abducing. [< L. abducere, < ab, away, + ducere, lead: see ductile.] 1†. To draw or lead away by persuasion or argument. — 2. To lead away or carry off by improper means; abduct. [Rare.] — 3†. To draw away or aside, as by the action of an abductor muscle.

If we abduce the eye unto either corner, the object will not duplicate. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 20.

★abducens (ab-dū′senz), n.; pl. abducentes (-sen′tēz). [L.: see abducent, a.] In anat., one of the sixth pair of cranial nerves: so called because it is the motor nerve of the rectus externus (external straight) muscle of the eye, which turns the eyeball outward.

abducent (ab-dū′sent), a. and n. [< L. abducen(t-)s, ppr. of abducere, draw away: see abduce.] I. a. Drawing away; pulling aside. In anat., specifically applied — (a) to those muscles which draw certain parts of the body away from the axial line of the trunk or of a limb, in contradistinction to the adducent muscles or adductors; (b) to motor nerves which effect this action. — Abducent nerves, the sixth pair of cranial nerves; the abducentes.

II. n. That which abducts; an abducens.

abduct (ab-dukt′), v. t. [< L. abductus, pp. of abducere, lead away: see abduce.] 1. To lead away or carry off surreptitiously or by force; kidnap.

The thing is self-evident, that his Majesty has been abducted or spirited away, "enlevé," by some person or persons unknown. Carlyle, French Rev., II. iv. 4.

2. In physiol., to move or draw away (a limb) from the axis of the body, or (a digit) from the axis of the limb: opposed to adduct.

★abduction (ab-duk′shon), n. [< L. abductio(n-), < abducere: see abduce.] 1. The act of abducing or abducting. (a) In law, the act of illegally leading away or carrying off a person; more especially, the taking or carrying away of a wife, a child, a ward, or a voter by fraud, persuasion, or open violence. (b) In physiol., the action of the muscles in drawing a limb or other part of the body away from the axis of the body or of the limb, as when the arm is lifted from the side, or the thumb is bent away from the axis of the arm or the middle line of the hand. (c) In surg., the receding from each other of the extremities of a fractured bone.

2. [< NL. abductio, a word used by Giulio Pacio (1550–1635), in translating ἀπαγωγή in the 25th chapter of the second book of Aristotle's Prior Analytics, in place of deductio and reductio, previously employed.] In logic, a syllogism of which the major premise is evident or known, while the minor, though not evident, is as credible as or more credible than the conclusion. The term is hardly used except in translations from the passage referred to.

After adverting to another variety of ratiocinative procedure, which he calls Apagoge or Abduction (where the minor is hardly more evident than the conclusion, and might sometimes conveniently become a conclusion first to be proved), Aristotle goes on to treat of objection generally. Grote, Aristotle, vi.

abductor (ab-duk′tor), n. [NL., < L. abducere: see abduce.] One who or that which abducts. Specifically, in anat. [pl. abductores (ab-duk-tō′rēz)], a muscle which moves certain parts from the axis of the body or of a limb: as, the abductor pollicis, a muscle which pulls the thumb outward: opposed to adductor. The abductor muscles of the human body are the abductor pollicis (abductor of the thumb) and abductor minimi digiti (abductor of the least digit) of the hand and foot respectively. The first dorsal interosseous muscle of the human hand is sometimes called the abductor indicis (abductor of the forefinger). The abductor tertii internodii secundi digiti (abductor of the third internode of the second digit) is a peculiar muscle of both hand and foot of the gibbons (Hylobates), arising from the second metacarpal or metatarsal bone, and inserted by a long tendon into the preaxial side of the ungual internode of the second digit. The abductor metacarpi quinti (abductor of the fifth metacarpal) is a muscle of the hand in certain lizards. For the abductors in human anatomy, see cut under muscle.

abe (a-bē′), v. i. [For be; prefix unmeaning, or as in ado.] Used in the same sense as be. Also spelled abee. — To let abe, to let be; let alone. Hence, let-abe is used in the substantive sense of forbearance or connivance, as in the phrase let-abe for let-abe, one act of forbearance in return for another, mutual forbearance.

I am for let-abe for let-abe. Scott, Pirate, II. xvii.

Let abe, let alone; not to mention; far less: as, he couldna sit, let abe stand. [Scotch.]

abeam (a-bēm′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3], prep., on, + beam.] Naut., in or into a direction at right angles to the keel of a ship; directly opposite the middle part of a ship's side, and in line with its main-beam: as, we had the wind abeam.

The wind was hauling round to the westward, and we could not take the sea abeam. Kane, Sec. Grinn. Exp., II. 257.

The sea went down toward night, and the wind hauled abeam. R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 347.

abear (a-bār′), v. t. [< ME. aberen, < AS. āberan, < ā- + beran, bear: see a-[1] and bear[1].] 1†. To bear; behave.

So did the Faerie Knight himselfe abeare. Spenser, F. Q., V. xii. 19.

2. To suffer or tolerate. [Provincial or vulgar.]

But if I mun doy I mun doy, for I couldn abear to see it. Tennyson, Northern Farmer.

abearance† (a-bār′ans), n. [< abear + -ance; substituted for abearing, ME. abering.] Behavior; demeanor.

The other species of recognizances with sureties is for the good abearance or good behaviour. Blackstone, Com., IV. xviii.

abearing† (a-bār′ing), n. [ME. abering, verbal n. of aberen, abear.] Behavior; demeanor.

abecedaria, n. Plural of abecedarium.

abecedarian (ā″bē-sē-dā′ri-an), a. and n. [Cf. F. abécédaire; < LL. abecedarius (psalmi abecedarii, alphabetical psalms), < a + be + ce + de, the first four letters of the alphabet (cf. alphabet), + -arius: see -arian.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or formed by the letters of the alphabet. — 2. Pertaining to the learning of the alphabet, or to one engaged in learning it; hence, relating to the first steps in learning.

There is an Abecedarian ignorance that precedes knowledge, and a Doctoral ignorance that comes after it. Cotton, tr. of Montaigne, I. 606.

Another form is abecedary.

Abecedarian psalms, hymns, etc., psalms, hymns, etc. (as the 119th psalm), in which the verses of successive distinct portions are arranged in alphabetical order.

II. n. 1. One who teaches or learns the letters of the alphabet. — 2. [cap.] A follower of Nicolas Storch, an Anabaptist of Germany, in the sixteenth century. The Abecedarians are said to have been so called because Storch taught that study or even a knowledge of the letters was unnecessary, since the Holy Spirit would impart directly a sufficient understanding of the Scriptures.

abecedarium (ā″bē-sē-dā′ri-um), n.; pl. abecedaria (-ä). [Neüt. of LL. abecedarius: see abecedarian.] An a-b-c book.

It appears therefore that all the Italic alphabets were developed on Italian soil out of a single primitive type, of which the abecedaria exhibit a comparatively late survival. Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, II. 131.

Logical abecedarium, a table of all possible combinations of any finite number of logical terms. Jevons.

abecedary (ā-bē-sē′da-ri), a. and n. [< L. abecedarius: see abecedarian.] I. a. Same as abecedarian.

II. n. 1. An a-b-c book; a primer. Hence — 2. A first principle or element; rudiment: as, "such rudiments or abecedaries," Fuller, Ch. Hist., VIII. iii. 2.

abechet, v. t. [ME., < OF. abecher (ML. abbecare), < a, to, + bec, beak: see beak[1].] To feed, as a parent bird feeds its young.

Yet should I somdele ben abeched,
And for the time well refreshed.
Gower, Conf. Amant., v.

abed (a-bed′), adv. [< ME. a bedde, < AS. on bedde: prep. on, and dat. of bedd, bed: see a[3] and bed.] 1. In bed.

Not to be abed after midnight is to be up betimes. Shak., T. N., ii. 3.

2. To bed.

Her mother dream'd before she was deliver'd
That she was brought abed of a buzzard.
Beau. and Fl., False One, iv. 3.

abee (a-bē′), n. [A native term.] A woven fabric of cotton and wool, made in Aleppo. Simmonds.

abeggeț, v. t. An old form of aby[1].

There dorste no wight hond upon him legge,
That he ne swore he shuld anon abegge.
Chaucer, Reeve's Tale, l. 18.

abeigh (a-bēēh′), adv. [A variant of ME. abey, abai, etc.: see bay[5], n.] Aloof; at a shy distance. [Scotch.] — To stand abeigh, to keep aloof.

Maggie coost her head fu' high,
Look'd asklent an' unco skeigh,
Gart poor Duncan stand abeigh — Ha, ha, the wooing o't. Burns, Duncan Gray.

abele (a-bēl′), n. [Formerly abeele, abeal, etc., < D. abeel, in comp. abeel-boom, < OF. abel, earlier aubel, < ML. albellus, applied to the white poplar, prop. dim. of L. albus, white.] The white poplar, Populus alba: so called from the white color of its twigs and leaves. See poplar. Also called abel-tree, and sometimes abbey.

Six abeles i' the kirkyard grow, on the north side in a row. Mrs. Browning, Duchess May.

Abelian[1] (ā-bel′i-an), n. [< Abel + -ian; also Abelite, < LL. Abelitæ, pl., < Abel: see -ite[1].] A member of a religious sect which arose in northern Africa in the fourth century. The Abelians married, but lived in continence, after the manner, as they maintained, of Abel, and attempted to keep up the sect by adopting the children of others. They are known only from the report of St. Augustine, written after they had become extinct. Also called Abelite and Abelonian.

Abelian[2] (ā-bel′i-an), a. Of or pertaining to the Norwegian mathematician Niels Henrik Abel (1802–1829). — Abelian equation, an irreducible algebraic equation, one of whose roots is expressible as a rational function of a second, and shown by Abel to be solvable by the solution of a second equation of a lower degree. — Abelian function, in math., a hyperelliptic function; a symmetric function of inverses of Abelian integrals. The name has been used in slightly different senses by different authors, but it is best applied to a ratio of double theta functions. — Abelian integral, one of a class of ultraelliptic integrals first investigated by Abel; any integral of an algebraic function not reducible to elliptic functions.

Abelite, Abelonian (ā′bel-īt, ā-bel-ō′ni-an), n. Same as Abelian[1].

Abelmoschus (ā-bel-mos′kus), n. [ML., < Ar. abu'l-mosk, -misk, father (source) of musk: abū, father; al, the; mosk, misk, musk: see abba[1] and musk.] A genus of plants of the family Malvaceæ, including A. Abelmoschus, the abelmosk or muskmallow of India and Egypt, which produces the musk-seed used in perfumes, and A. esculentus, the okra. There are 10 or 12 species, all of which are natives of the old world.

abelmosk (ā′bel-mosk), n. [< ML. Abelmoschus.] The plant Abelmoschus. Also spelled abelmusk. See Abelmoschus.

abel-tree (ā′bel-trē), n. Same as abele.

abelwhackets†, n. See ablewhackets.

a bene placito (ä bā′ne plä′chē-tō). [It.: a, at; bene (< L. bene), well; placito (< L. placitum), pleasure: see please and plea.] In music, at pleasure; in the way the performer likes best.

Abeona[1] (ab-ē-ō′nä), n. [LL. Abeona, the goddess of departing, < L. abire, go away, abeo, I go away, < ab, away, + ire, go, eo, I go.] In Rom. myth., the goddess who presided over departure, as of travelers.

Abeona[2] (ab-ē-ō′nä). [NL. (Chas. Girard, 1854): a coined name.] In ichth., a genus of viviparous embiotocoid fishes of the family Holconotidæ, represented by surf-fishes, as A. minima and A. aurora, of the Californian coast.

aber (ab′ėr), n. [Gael. abar = W. aber, a confluence of waters, the mouth of a river. Cf. Gael. inbhir, with same senses, = W. ynfer, influx: see inver-.] A Celtic word used as a prefix to many place-names in Great Britain, and signifying a confluence of waters, either of two rivers or of a river with the sea: as, Aberdeen, Aberdour, Abergavenny, Aberystwith.

aberdavine, n. See aberdevine. Latham.

aberdeen (ab′ėr-dēn), n. [Etym. uncertain. Cf. aberdevine.] In ornith., a name of the knot (which see), Tringa canutus.

aberdevine (ab″ėr-de-vīn′), n. [Etym. unknown: see below.] The siskin, Chrysomitris spinus, a well-known European bird of the finch family (Fringillidæ), nearly related to the goldfinch, and somewhat resembling the green variety of the canary-bird. See siskin. Also spelled aberdavine, abadevine. [Local, Eng.]

About London, the siskin is called the aberdevine by bird-catchers. Rennie, ed. of Montagu's Dict., 1831, p. 2.

[The word (aberdevine) is not now in use, if it ever was. I believe it was first published by Albin (1737), and that it was a bird-catchers' or bird-dealers' name about London; but I suspect it may have originated in a single bird-dealer, who coined it to give fictitious value to a common bird for which he wanted to get a good price. Book-writers have gone on repeating Albin's statement without adding any new information, and I have never met with any one who called the siskin or any other bird by this name. No suggestion as to its etymology seems possible. Prof. A. Newton, letter.]

aberr (ab-ėr′), v. i. [< L. aberrare: see aberrate.] To wander; err. [Rare.]

Divers were out in their account, aberring several ways from the true and just compute, and calling that one year, which perhaps might be another. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 12.

aberrance (ab-er′ans), n. Same as aberrancy.

aberrancy (ab-er′an-si), n.; pl. aberrancies (-siz). [< L. as if aberrantia*, < aberran(t-)s: see aberrant.] A wandering or deviating from the right way; especially, a deviation from truth or rectitude. Another form is aberrance. [Rare.]

They do not only swarm with errours, but vices depending thereon. Thus they commonly affect no man any farther than he deserts his reason, or complies with their aberrancies. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 3.

Aberrancy of Curvature, the angle a h c.

Aberrancy of curvature, in math., the angle between the normal to a curve at any point and the line from that point to the middle point of the infinitesimal chord parallel to the tangent.

aberrant (ab-er′ant), a. [< L. aberran(t-)s, ppr. of aberrare: see aberrate.] 1. Wandering; straying from the right or usual course.

An aberrant berg appears about three hundred miles west-south-west of Ireland, in latitude 51°, longitude 18° west. Science, III. 343.

2. In zoöl. and bot., differing in some of its characters from the group in which it is placed: said of an individual, a species, a genus, etc.

In certain aberrant Rotalines the shell is commonly . . . of a rich crimson hue. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 459.

The more aberrant any form is, the greater must have been the number of connecting forms which have been exterminated or utterly lost. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 387.

Aberrant duct of the testis, in anat., a slender tube or diverticulum from the lower part of the canal of the epididymis, or from the beginning of the excretory duct of the testis (vas deferens). It varies from 2 to 14 inches in length, is coiled up into a fusiform mass extending up the spermatic cord 2 or 3 inches, and terminates blindly. Two or more such tubes are occasionally found together, but they are sometimes entirely wanting. See testis. Also called vas aberrans, vasculum aberrans.

aberrate (ab-er′āt), v. i.; pret. and pp. aberrated, ppr. aberrating. [< L. aberratus, pp. of aberrare, stray from, < ab, from, + errare, to stray: see err.] To wander or deviate from the right way; diverge. [Rare.]

aberration (ab-e-rā′shon), n. [< L. aberratio(n-), < aberrare: see aberrate.] 1. The act of wandering away; deviation; especially, in a figurative sense, the act of wandering from the right way or course; hence, deviation from truth or moral rectitude.

So then we draw near to God, when, repenting us of our former aberrations from him, we renew our covenants with him. Bp. Hall, Sermon on James iv. 8.

The neighbouring churches, both by petitions and messengers, took such happy pains with the church of Salem, as presently recovered that holy flock to a sense of his [Roger Williams's] aberrations. C. Mather, Mag. Chris., vii. 1.

2. In pathol.: (a) A wandering of the intellect; mental derangement. (b) Vicarious hemorrhage. (c) Diapedesis of blood-corpuscles. (d) Congenital malformation.—3. In zoöl. and bot., deviation from the type; abnormal structure or development.

In whichever light, therefore, insect aberration is viewed by us, . . . we affirm that it does . . . exist. Wollaston, Var. of Species, p. 2.

4. In optics, a deviation in the rays of light when unequally refracted by a lens or reflected by a mirror, so that they do not converge and meet in a point or focus, but separate, forming an indistinct image of the object, or an indistinct image with prismatically colored edges. It is called spherical when, as in the former case, the imperfection or blurring arises from the form of curvature of the lens or reflector, and chromatic when, as in the latter case, there is a prismatic coloring of the image arising from the different refrangibility of the rays composing white light, and the consequent fact that the foci for the different colors do not coincide. Thus, in fig. 1, the rays passing through the lens L L near its edge have a focus at A, while those which pass near the axis have a focus at B; hence, an image formed on a screen placed at m m would appear more or less distorted or indistinct.

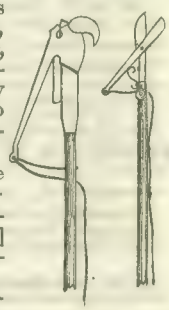

Fig. 1, diagram illustrating the spherical aberration of a lens. Fig. 2, diagram illustrating the chromatic aberration.

In fig. 2 the violet rays (v v) have a focus at V, while the less refrangible red rays (r r) come to a focus at R. A spot of light with a red border would be observed on a screen placed at a a, and one with a blue border on a screen at b b. In the eye the iris and crystalline lens partially eliminate these aberrations. Optical instruments corrected for chromatic aberration are called achromatic.

5. In astron., the apparent displacement of a heavenly body due to the joint effect of the motion of the rays of light proceeding from it and the motion of the earth. Thus, when the light from a star that is not directly in the line of the earth's motion is made to fall centrally into a telescope, the telescope is in reality inclined slightly away from the true direction of the star toward that in which the earth is moving; just as one running under a vertically falling shower of rain, and holding in his hand a long-necked flask, must incline its mouth forward if he does not wish the sides of the neck to be wetted. This phenomenon, discovered and explained by Bradley (1728), is termed the aberration of light, and its effect in displacing a star is called the aberration of the star. The annual aberration, due to the motion of the earth in its orbit, amounts to 20″.4 in the maximum; the diurnal aberration, due to the rotation of the earth, is only 0″.3 at most. See planetary aberration, below.—Circle of aberration, the circle of colored light observed in experiments with convex lenses between the point where the violet rays meet and that where the red rays meet.—Constant of aberration. See constant.—Crown of aberration, a luminous circle surrounding the disk of the sun, depending on the aberration of its rays, by which its apparent diameter is enlarged.—Planetary aberration (see 5, above), better called the equation of light, an apparent displacement of a moving body, as a planet, owing to its not being in the same position at the moment the light reaches the earth that it was when the light left it.= Syn. 1. Deviation, divergence, departure.—2. (a) Derangement, hallucination, illusion, delusion, eccentricity, mania.

aberrational (ab-e-rā′shon-al), a. Characterized by aberration; erratic.

aberuncate† (ab-ē-rung′kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. aberuncated, ppr. aberuncating. [An erroneous form of averruncate, as if < L. aberuncare*, < ab, from, + e for ex, out, + runcare, uproot, weed; hence the unauthorized sense given by Bailey. See averruncate.] To pull up by the roots; extirpate utterly. Johnson.

Aberuncators.

Aberuncated, pulled up by the roots, weeded. Bailey.

aberuncation† (ab-ē-rung-kā′shon), n. [< aberuncate.] Eradication; extirpation; removal.

aberuncator (ab-ē-rung′kā-tor), n. [< aberuncate. Cf. L. runcator, a weeder.] 1. An implement for extirpating weeds; a weeder or weeding-machine.—2. An instrument for pruning trees when their branches are beyond easy reach of the hand. There are various forms of these implements, but they all consist of two blades, similar to those of stout shears, one of which is fixed rigidly to a long handle, while the other forms one arm of a lever, to which a cord passing over a pulley is attached. Also written, more properly, averruncator.

abet (a-bet′), v. t.; pret. and pp. abetted, ppr. abetting. [< ME. abetten, < OF. abeter, abeter, instigate, deceive, < a- (< L., ad-), to, + beter, bait, as a bear, < Icel. beita, bait, cause to bite: see bait, v.; also bet[1], a shortened form of abet.] 1. To encourage by aid or approval: used with a personal object, and chiefly in a bad sense.

They abetted both parties in the civil war, and always furnished supplies to the weaker side, lest there should be an end put to these fatal divisions. Addison, Freeholder, No. 28.

Note, too, how for having abetted those who wronged the native Irish, England has to pay a penalty. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 487.

2†. To maintain; support; uphold.

"Then shall I soone," quoth he, "so God me grace, Abett that virgins cause disconsolate." Spenser, F. Q., I. x. 64.

3. In law, to encourage, counsel, incite, or assist in a criminal act—implying, in the case of felony, personal presence. Thus, in military law, it is a grave crime to aid or abet a mutiny or sedition, or excite resistance against lawful orders. In Scots law, a person is said to be abetting though he may only protect a criminal, conceal him from justice, or aid him in making his escape.

Hence—4. To lead to or encourage the commission of.

Would not the fool abet the stealth
Who rashly thus exposed his wealth? Gay, Fables, ii. 12.

=Syn. To support, encourage, second, countenance, aid, assist, back, connive at, stand by, further.

abet† (a-bet′), n. [< ME. abet, instigation, < OF. abet, instigation, deceit (ML. abettum), < abeter: see abet, v.] The act of aiding or encouraging, especially in a crime. Chaucer.

abetment (a-bet′ment), n. [< abet + -ment.] The act of abetting; that which serves to abet or encourage.

abettal (a-bet′al), n. [< abet + -al.] The act of abetting; aid. Bailey. [Rare.]

abetter, abettor (a-bet′er, -or, or -ôr), n. [Formerly abettour; < abet + -er[1], -or[2].] 1. One who abets or incites; one who aids or encourages another to commit a crime; a supporter or encourager of something bad. Abettor is the form used in law.

But let th' abettor of the Panther's crime
Learn to make fairer wars another time. Dryden, Hind and Panther, i. 1647.

In law, an abettor, as distinguished from an accessory, is more especially one who, being present, gives aid or encouragement.

2. One who aids, supports, or encourages: in a good sense.

It has been the occasion of making me friends and open abettors of several gentlemen of known sense and wit. Pope, Letters, June 15, 1711.

=Syn. 1. Abettor, Accessory, Accomplice. See accomplice.

abevacuation (ab-ē-vak-ū-ā′shon), n. [< NL. abevacuatio(n-): see ab- and evacuation.] In med., variously used to signify a morbid evacuation, whether excessive or deficient.

ab extra (ab eks′trą). [L.] From without: opposed to ab intra (which see).

Those who are so fortunate as to occupy the philosophical position of spectators ab extra are very few in any generation. Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 140.

abeyance (a-bā′ans), n. [< OF. abeiance, abeyance, < a- (< L. ad-), to, at, + beance (beiance*), expectation, desire, < beant, expecting, thinking, ppr. of beer, baer (F. bayer), gape, gaze at, expect anxiously, < ML. badare, gape.] 1. In law, a state of expectation or contemplation. Thus, the fee simple or inheritance of lands and tenements is in abeyance when there is no person in being in whom it can vest, so that it is in a state of expectancy or waiting until a proper person shall appear. So also where one man holds land for life, with remainder to the heirs of another, and the latter is yet alive, the remainder is in abeyance, since no man can have an heir until his death. Titles of honor and dignities are said to be in abeyance when it is uncertain who shall enjoy them. Thus, in Eng. law, when a nobleman holding a dignity descendible to his heirs general dies leaving daughters, the king by his prerogative may grant the dignity to any one of the daughters he pleases, or to the male issue of one of such daughters. While the title to the dignity is thus in suspension it is said to be in abeyance.

2. A state of suspended action or existence, or temporary inactivity.

Upon awaking from slumber, I could never gain, at once, thorough possession of my senses; . . . the mental faculties in general, but the memory in especial, being in a condition of absolute abeyance. Poe, Tales, I. 333.

abeyancy (a-bā′an-si), n. The state or condition of being in abeyance. Hawthorne.

abeyant (a-bā′ant), a. [Inferred from abeyance: see -ance and -ant[1].] In law, being in abeyance.

abgregate† (ab′grē-gāt), v. t. [< L. abgregatus, pp. of abgregare, lead away from the flock, < ab, from, + grex (greg-), flock. Cf. congregate, segregate.] To separate from a flock. Cockeram, 1612.

abhal (ab′hal), n. A name given in the East Indies to the berries of the common juniper, Juniperus communis. Also spelled abhel and abhul.

abhel, n. See abhal.

abhominable (ab-hom′i-na-bl), a. An old mode of spelling abominable, on the supposition that it was derived from ab homine, from or repugnant to man, ridiculed as pedantic by Shakspere in the character of the pedant Holofernes.

This is abhominable (which he would call abominable). Shak., L. L. L., v. 1.

[Abhominable occurs in the Promptorium Parvulorum (c. 1440), and in Gower; abhominacyoun is in Wyclif's New Testament, abhominacioun in Chaucer, and abhomynacioun in Mandeville. Fuller has abhominal, a form made to suit the false etymology.]

abhor (ab-hôr′), v.; pret. and pp. abhorred, ppr. abhorring. [< L. abhorrēre, shrink from, < ab, from, + horrēre, bristle (with fear): see horrid.] I. trans. 1. Literally, to shrink back from with horror or dread; hence, to regard with repugnance; hate extremely or with loathing; loathe, detest, or abominate: as, to abhor evil; to abhor intrigue.

Thou didst not abhor the virgin's womb. Te Deum.

Nature abhors the old, and old age seems the only disease. Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 289.

2†. To fill with horror and loathing; horrify.

He [Alexander] caused the women that were captive to sing before him such songes as abhorred the ears of the Macedons not accustomed to such things. J. Brende, tr. of Quintus Curtius, vi.

How abhorred my imagination is; my gorge rises at it. Shak., Hamlet, v. 1.

=Syn. 1. Hate, Abhor, Detest, etc. See hate.

II. intrans. 1†. To shrink back with disgust, or with fear and shudderings.

To abhorre from those vices.
Udall, Erasmus, St. James, iv.

2. To be antagonistic; be averse or of opposite character: with from.

Which is utterly abhorring from the end of all law.
Milton, Divorce, II. vii. 79.

abhorrence (ab-hor'ens), n. [< abhorrent: see -ance.] 1. The act of abhorring; a feeling of extreme aversion or detestation; strong hatred.

One man thinks justice consists in paying debts, and has no measure in his abhorrence of another who is very remiss in this duty. Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 286.

2†. An expression of abhorrence. Specifically, an address presented in 1680 to Charles II. of England, expressing abhorrence of the Addressers (which see).

3. That which excites repugnance or loathing: as, servility is my abhorrence. = Syn. 1. Horror, hatred, detestation, repugnance, disgust, loathing, shrinking, antipathy, aversion.

abhorrency† (ab-hor'en-si), n. The quality of being abhorrent, or the state of regarding anything with horror or loathing.

The first tendency to any injustice . . . must be suppressed with a show of wonder and abhorrency in the parents. Locke, Education, ¶ 110.

abhorrent (ab-hor'ent), a. [< L. abhorren(t-)s, ppr. of abhorrere: see abhor.] 1. Hating; detesting; struck with abhorrence.

The arts of pleasure in despotic courts
I spurn abhorrent. Glover, Leonidas, x.

2. Exciting horror or abhorrence; very repulsive; detestable: as, abhorrent scenes; an abhorrent criminal or course of conduct.—3. Contrary; utterly repugnant; causing aversion: formerly with from, now with to.

And yet it is so abhorrent from the vulgar.
Glanville, Scep. Sci.

Christianity turns from these scenes of strife, as abhorrent to her highest injunctions. Sumner, Aug. 27, 1846.

abhorrently (ab-hor'ent-li), adv. With abhorrence; in an abhorrent manner.

abhorrer (ab-hôr'er), n. One who abhors. Specifically (with or without a capital letter), in the reign of Charles II. of England, a member of the court party, afterward called Tories. They derived their name from their professed abhorrence of the principles of the Addressers, who endeavored to restrict the royal prerogative. See addresser.

Scarce a day passed but some abhorrer was dragged before them [the House of Commons] and committed to the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, at the pleasure of the house. Roger North, Examen, p. 561.

abhorrible (ab-hor'i-bl), a. [< abhor + -ible, after horrible.] Worthy or deserving to be abhorred. [Rare.]

abhorring (ab-hôr'ing), n. 1. A feeling of abhorrence; loathing.

I find no abhorring in my appetite. Donne, Devotion.

2†. An object of abhorrence.

They shall be an abhorring unto all flesh. Isa. lxvi. 24.

abhul, n. See abhal.

Abia (ā'bi-ă), n. A genus of Hymenoptera. Leach.

Abib (ā'bib), n. [Heb. ābīb, an ear of corn, < ābab, produce early fruit, < āb, swelling.] The time of newly ripe grain; the first month of the Jewish ecclesiastical year, beginning with the new moon of March. Abib seems to have been the designation of a season rather than the name of a month. After the Babylonish captivity it was also called Nisan (Neh. ii. 1).

abidance (a-bī'dans), n. [< abide[1] + -ance.] The act of abiding or continuing; abode; stay. Fuller. [Rare.]

And then, moreover, there is His personal abidance in our churches, raising earthly service into a foretaste of heaven. J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 475.

abide[1] (a-bīd'), v.; pret. and pp. abode, ppr. abiding. [< ME. abiden (pret. sing. abod, pl. abiden, pp. abiden), < AS. ābīdan (pret. sing. ābād, pl. ābidon, pp. ābiden) (= Goth. usbeidan, expect), < ā- + bīdan, bide: see bide. The ME. and AS. forms are trans. and intrans.] I. trans. 1. To wait for; especially, to stand one's ground against.

Abide me if thou dar'st. Shak., M. N. D., iii. 2.
Howbeit we abide our day! M. Arnold, Balder Dead.

2. To await; be in store for.

Bonds and afflictions abide me. Acts xx. 23.

3. To endure or sustain; remain firm under.

Who may abide the day of his coming? Mal. iii. 2.

Greatness does not need plenty, and can very well abide its loss. Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 232.

4. To put up with; tolerate. [In this colloquial sense approaching abide[2].]

I cannot abide the smell of hot meat.
Shak., M. W. of W., i. 3.

As for disappointing them, I shouldn't so much mind, but I can't abide to disappoint myself.
Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, i. 1.

5†. To encounter; undergo: in a jocular sense. [?]

I wil give hym the alder-beste
Gifte, that ever he abode hys lyve.
Chaucer, Dethe of Blaunche, l. 247.

II. intrans. 1. To have one's abode; dwell; reside.

In the noiseless air and light that flowed Round your fair brows, eternal Peace abode.
Bryant, To the Apennines.

2. To remain; continue to stay.

Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved.
Acts xxvii. 31.

Here no man can abide, except he be ready with all his heart to humble himself for the love of God.
Thomas à Kempis, Im. of Christ, i. 17.

3. To continue in a certain condition; remain steadfast or faithful.

But she is happier if she so abide [in widowhood].
1 Cor. vii. 40.

4†. To wait; stop; delay.

He hasteth wel that wysly kan abyde.
Chaucer, Troilus, i. 949.

5. To inhere; belong as an attribute or quality; have its seat.

Though far more cause, yet much less spirit to curse Abides in me. Shak., Rich. III., iv. 4.

To abide by. (a) To remain at rest beside: as, "abide by thy crib," Job xxxix. 9. (b) To adhere to; maintain; defend; stand to: as, to abide by a friend. Specifically, in Scots law, to adhere to as true and genuine: said of the party who relies upon a deed or writing which the other party desires to have reduced or declared null and void, on the ground of forgery or falsehood. (c) To await or accept the consequences of; rest satisfied with: as, to abide by the event or issue. = Syn. 1 and 2. Abide, Sojourn, Continue, Dwell, Reside, Live, remain, stay, stop, lodge, settle, settle down, tarry, linger. Live is the most general word: to pass one's life, without indicating place, time, or manner. Abide, sojourn, to stay for a time—length of stay being associated in the mind with the former, and briefness or shortness of stay with the latter. Continue, to stay on, without interval of absence. Dwell, to be domiciled. Reside, to have one's home; dwell.

And if these pleasures may thee move,
Then live with me and be my love.
Marlowe, Shepherd to his Love.

O Thou who changest not, abide with me! Lyte.

A certain man of Beth-lehem-judah went to sojourn in the country of Moab, he, and his wife, and his two sons. . . . And they came into the country of Moab, and continued there. Ruth i. 1, 2.

And Moses was content to dwell with the man.
Exod. ii. 21.

There, at the moated grange, resides this dejected Mariana. Shak., M. for M., iii. 1.

abide[2] (a-bīd'), v. t. [This word in the sense of 'suffer for' does not occur much earlier than Shakspere's time. It is a corruption of ME. abyen, pay for, due to confusion with abide[1], wait for (as if that sense were equivalent to 'endure'): see further under aby[1], and cf. abide[1], v. t., 4.] To pay the price or penalty of; suffer for.

If it be found so, some will dear abide it.
Shak., J. C., iii. 2.

Ah me! they little know
How dearly I abide that boast so vain.
Milton, P. L., iv. 86.

abident†. Old perfect participle of abide[1].

abider (a-bī'der), n. [< abide[1] + -er[1].] One who dwells or continues; one who lives or resides.

abiding (a-bī'ding), p. a. [Ppr. of abide[1].] Continuing; permanent; steadfast: as, an abiding faith.

Here thou hast no abiding city.
Thomas à Kempis, Im. of Christ, ii. 1.

I do not think that Pope's verse anywhere sings, but it should seem that the abiding presence of fancy in his best work forbids his exclusion from the rank of poet.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 432.

abidingly (a-bī'ding-li), adv. In an abiding manner; enduringly; lastingly; permanently.

abiding-place (a-bī'ding-plās), n. [< abiding, verbal n. of abide[1], + place.] A place where one abides; a permanent dwelling-place; hence, a place of rest; a resting-place.

A very charming little abiding-place.
H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 41.

Many of these plants . . . found suitable abiding-places at the South. Science, III. 359.

Abies (ab'i-ēz), n. [L. abies (abiet-), the silver fir; origin unknown.] A genus of trees, the firs, of the family Pinaceæ and the class Gymnospermæ, some of which are valuable for their timber. It differs from Pinus in its solitary leaves and in the thin scales of its cones, which ripen the first year. From the allied genera Picea, Tsuga, etc., with which it has sometimes been united, it is distinguished by its closely sessile leaves, by the bracts of the female aments being much larger than the scales, and by having erect cones with deciduous scales. It has about 20 species, confined to the northern hemisphere, and equally divided between the old and new worlds. To it belong the silver fir of central Europe (A. pectinata), the balsam-fir of eastern North America (A. balsamea), the red and white firs of western America (A. grandis, concolor, and nobilis), the sacred fir of Mexico (A. religiosa), etc. See fir.

abietene (ab'i-ē-tēn), n. [< L. abies (abiet-), the fir, + -ene.] A hydrocarbon obtained by distillation from the resin of Sabine's pine of California, Pinus Sabiniana. It consists almost wholly of normal heptane, C_7H_{16}, and is a nearly colorless mobile liquid, having a strong aromatic smell, highly inflammable, and burning with a white, smokeless flame.

abietic (ab-i-et'ik), a. [< L. abies (abiet-), the fir, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to trees of the genus Abies; derived from the fir.—Abietic acid, $C_{19}H_{28}O_2$, an acid obtained from the resin of some species of pine, larch, and fir. These resins are anhydrids of abietic acid or mixtures containing it.

abietin (ab'i-ē-tin), n. [< L. abies (abiet-), the fir, + -in[2].] A tasteless, inodorous resin, derived from the turpentine obtained from some species of the genus Abies.

Abietineæ (ab"i-ē-tin'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < L. abies (abiet-), the fir, + -in-eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Pinaceæ, distinguished by bearing strobiles (cones) with two inverted ovules at the base of each scale, which become winged samaroid seeds. The leaves are linear or needle-shaped, and never two-ranked. It includes many of the most valuable kinds of timber-trees, viz., pine (Pinus), true cedar (Cedrus), spruce (Picea), hemlock-spruce (Tsuga), Douglas's spruce (Pseudotsuga), fir (Abies), and larch (Larix).

(1) Staminate and (2) pistillate inflorescence of the pine; (3) a pistillate scale, and (4) the same showing a longitudinal section of the ovules.

abietinic (ab"i-ē-tin'ik), a. Pertaining to or derived from abietin: as, abietinic acid.

abietite (ab'i-ē-tīt), n. [< L. abies (abiet-), the fir, + -ite[2].] A sugar, $C_6H_8O_3$, obtained from the needles of the European silver fir, Abies pectinata.

Abietites (ab"i-ē-tī'tēz), n. [NL., pl. (sc. plantæ), < L. abies (abiet-), the fir.] A genus of fossil plants, family Pinaceæ, ancestors of the firs, ranging from Jurassic to Miocene.

Abigail (ab'i-gāl), n. [< Abigail, the "waiting gentlewoman" in Beaumont and Fletcher's play of "The Scornful Lady"—so named, perhaps, in allusion to the expression "thine handmaid," applied to herself by Abigail, the wife of Nabal, when carrying provisions to David: see 1 Sam. xxv. 2–41.] A general name for a waiting-woman or lady's-maid. [Colloq.] Sometimes written as a common noun, without a capital.

The Abigail, by immemorial custom, being a deodand, and belonging to holy Church.
Reply to Ladies and Bachelors Petition, 1694 (Harl. Misc., IV. 440).

I myself have seen one of these male Abigails tripping about the room with a looking-glass in his hand and combing his lady's hair a whole morning together.
Spectator.

abigeat (ab-ij'ē-at), n. [< OF. abigeat, < L. abigeatus, cattle-stealing, < abigeus, a cattle-stealer, < abigere, drive away: see abactor. For the second sense (b), cf. L. abiga, a plant which has the power of producing abortion, < abigere, as above.] In law: (a) The crime of stealing or driving off cattle in droves. (b) A miscarriage procured by art.

abiliate† (a-bil'i-āt), v. t. [For abilitate; or irreg. formed from able, L. habilis, ML. (h)abilis.] To enable. Bacon. [Rare.]

abiliment† (a-bil'i-ment), n. [Var. of habiliment, q. v.] Ability: as, "abiliment to steer a kingdom," Ford, Broken Heart, v. 2.

abilments†, n. pl. Same as habiliments.

abilitate† (a-bil'i-tāt), v. t. [< ML. habilitatus, pp. of habilitare (> OF. habileter, habiliter), render able, < habilis, able: see able[1].] To assist. ★Nicholas Ferrar.

ability (a-bil'i-ti), n. [< ME. abilite (four syllables), < OF. habilite (ME. also ablete, < OF. ablete), < L. habilita(t-)s, ML. abilita(t-)s, aptness, < habilis, apt, able: see able[1].] 1. The state or condition of being able; power or capacity to do or act in any relation; competence in any occupation or field of action, from the possession of capacity, skill, means, or other qualification.

They gave after their ability unto the treasure of the work. Ezra ii. 69.

Alas! what poor
Ability's in me to do him good?
Shak., M. for M., i. 5.

To the close of the Republic, the law was the sole field for all ability except the special talent of a capacity for generalship. Maine, Village Communities, p. 380.

We must regard the colloidal compounds of which organisms are built as having, by their physical nature, the ability to separate colloids from crystalloids. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 7.

2. pl. In a concrete sense, talents; mental gifts or endowments.

Natural abilities are like natural plants, that need pruning by study. Bacon, Studies, Essay 50.

He had good abilities, a genial temper, and no vices. Emerson, Soc. and Sol.

3. The condition of being able to pay or to meet pecuniary obligations; possession of means: called distinctively financial or pecuniary ability.

Out of my lean and low ability
I'll lend you something. Shak., T. N., iii. 4.

A draft upon my neighbour was to me the same as money; for I was sufficiently convinced of his ability. Goldsmith, Vicar, xiv.

4. That which is within one's power to do; best endeavor.

Be thou assur'd, good Cassio, I will do
All my abilities in thy behalf. Shak., Oth., iii. 3.

=Syn. 1. Ability, Capacity, power, strength, skill, dexterity; faculty, capability, qualification, efficiency. Ability denotes active power or power to perform, and is used with regard to power of any kind. Capacity conveys the idea of receptiveness, of the possession of resources; it is potential rather than actual, and may be no more than undeveloped ability. Ability is manifested in action, while capacity does not imply action, as when we speak of a capacity for virtue. Capacity is the gift of nature; ability is partly the result of education or opportunity.

What is a power, but the ability or faculty of doing a thing? What is the ability to do a thing, but the power of employing the means necessary to its execution? A. Hamilton, Federalist, No. 33.

Capacity is requisite to devise, and ability to execute, a great enterprise. H. Taylor.

2. Abilities, Talents, Parts, etc. (see genius), gifts, faculty, aptitude, accomplishments.

-ability. See -able, -bility, -ibility.

abilliments† (ə-bil'i-ə-mẹnts), n. pl. [< OF. habillement, armor, war equipments (mod. F., clothing); the E. spelling -lli- imitates the sound of F. ll, as in billiards, q. v. See habiliment.] Same as habiliments, but applied more especially to armor and warlike stores.

And now the temple of Janus being shut, warlike abilliments grew rusty. Arth. Wilson, Hist. James I.

abime†, abisme†, n. [< OF. abime, earlier abisme: see abysm.] An abysm.

Column and base upbering from abime.
Ballad in Commendacioun of Oure Ladie, l. 129.

Feel such a care, as one whom some Abisme
In the deep Ocean kept had all his Time.
Drummond of Hawthornden, Works, p. 59.

ab initio (ab i-nish'i-ō). [L.: ab, from; initio, abl. of initium, beginning: see initial.] From the beginning.

abintestate (ab-in-tes'tāt), a. [< LL. abintestatus, < L. ab, from, + intestatus: see intestate.] Inheriting or devolving from one who died intestate.

ab intra (ab in'trä). [L.: see ab- and intra-.] From within: opposed to ab extra.

abiogenesis (ab″i-ō-jen'e-sis), n. [NL. (Huxley, 1870), < Gr. ἀ- priv. + βίος, life, + γένεσις, generation.] In biol., the production of living things otherwise than through the growth and development of detached portions of a parent organism; spontaneous generation. Abiogenesis was formerly supposed to prevail quite widely even among comparatively complex forms of life. As biological science has advanced it has restricted the field of possible abiogenesis until within recent years pathologists have shown, by the study of pathogenic organisms, that there is no living thing which is not descended from a preëxisting organism. It should not be forgotten, however, that the persistent existence of a living being depends upon the continual change of non-living matter into living matter, and that there is no a priori impossibility in the production of non-living matter by the methods of the laboratory. That this has sometime come about in nature seems to be a logical assumption. Also called abiogeny. See biogenesis and heterogenesis.

abiogenetic (ab″i-ō-jẹ-net'ik), a. [See abiogenesis and genetic.] Of or pertaining to abiogenesis.

abiogenetically (ab″i-ō-jẹ-net'i-kal-i), adv. In an abiogenetic manner; by spontaneous generation; as regards abiogenesis.

abiogenist (ab-i-oj'e-nist), n. [< abiogeny + -ist.] A believer in the doctrine of abiogenesis. Also called abiogenesist.

abiogenous (ab-i-oj'e-nus), a. Produced by spontaneous generation.

abiogeny (ab-i-oj'e-ni), n. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + βίος, life, + -γενής, -born: see abiogenesis and -gen.] Same as abiogenesis.

abiological (ab″i-ō-loj'i-kal), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + E. biological.] Not biological; not pertaining to biology.

The biological sciences are sharply marked off from the abiological, or those which treat of the phenomena manifested by not-living matter. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 1.

abit†, n. Obsolete form of habit.

abite†, v. t. [ME. abitan, < AS. ābītan, bite, eat, devour, < ā- + bītan, bite.] To bite; eat; devour.

abition† (ab-ish'ọn), n. [< L. abitio(n-), < abire, go away, < ab, away, + ire, go.] The act of departing; death.

abject (ab'jekt), a. and n. [< ME. abject, < L. abjectus, downcast, low, mean, pp. of abicere, also spelled abjicere, < ab, away, + jacĕre, throw, = Gr. ἰάπτειν, throw: see iambic.] I. a. 1†. Cast aside; cast away; abjected.

So thick bestrown,
Abject and lost, lay these, covering the flood,
Under amazement of their hideous change.
Milton, P. L., i. 312.

2. Low in condition or in estimation; utterly humiliating or disheartening; so low as to be hopeless: as, abject poverty, disgrace, or servitude.—3. Low in kind or character; mean; despicable; servile; groveling.

Or in this abject posture have ye sworn To adore the conqueror? Milton, P. L., i. 322.

=Syn. 3. Abject, Low, Mean, Groveling, debased, despicable, degraded, degenerate, wretched, menial, worthless, beggarly. (See list under low.) Abject, low, and mean may have essentially the same meaning, but low is more often used with respect to nature, condition, or rank; mean, to character or conduct; abject, to spirit. Groveling has the vividness of figurative use; it represents natural disposition toward what is low and base. Low is generally stronger than mean, conformably to the original senses of the two words.

Never debase yourself by treacherous ways,
Nor by such abject methods seek for praise.
Dryden, Art of Poetry, iv. 976.

An abject man he [Wolsey] was, in spite of his pride; for being overtaken riding out of that place towards Esher by one of the King's chamberlains, who brought him a kind message and a ring, he alighted from his mule, took off his cap, and kneeled down in the dirt.
Dickens, Child's Hist. Eng., xxvii.

What in me is dark Illumine, what is low raise and support.
Milton, P. L., i. 23.

There is hardly a spirit upon earth so mean and contracted as to centre all regards on its own interests.
Bp. Berkeley.

This vice of intemperance is the arch-abomination of our natures, tending . . . to drag down the soul to the slavery of grovelling lusts. Everett, Orations, I. 374.

II.† n. A person who is abjectly base, servile, or dependent; a caitiff or menial.

Yea, the abjects gathered themselves together against me, and I knew it not. Ps. xxxv. 15.

We are the queen's abjects, and must obey.
Shak., Rich. III., i. 2.

abject† (ab-jekt'), v. t. [< L. abjectus, pp.: see the adj.] 1. To throw away; cast off or out.

For that offence only Almighty God abjected Saul, that he should no more reign over Israel.

able[2] (ā′bl), n. [F.: see ablet.] Same as ablet.

-able, -ible. [(a) ME. -able, < OF. -able, mod. F. -able = Sp. -able = Pg. -avel = It. -abile, < L. -ābilis, acc. -ābilem; (b) ME. -ible, < OF. -ible, -eble, mod. F. -ible = Sp. -ible = Pg. -ivel = It. -ibile, < L. -ibilis, acc. -ibilem; (c) rarely -eble, < L. -ēbilis, acc. -ēbilem, etc.; being -ble, L. -bilis, suffixed in Latin to a verb-stem ending, or made to end, in a vowel, a, i, e, etc.: see -ble. Examples are: (a) ami-able, < ME. ami-able, < OF. aimable, < L. amicābilis, friendly, < amicā-re, make friendly; (b) horr-ible, < ME. horrible, orrible, < OF. orrible, < L. horribilis, < horrē-re, shudder; (c) del-eble (negative, indelible, conformed to preceding), < L. delēbilis, < delē-re, destroy. From adjectives in -ble are formed nouns in -ness (-ble-ness), or, from or after the L., in -bility, which in some cases is a restored form of ME. and OF. -blete, < L. -bilitas, acc. -bili-tat-em. See -ble, -bility, -ity, -ty.] A common termination of English adjectives, especially of those based on verbs. To the base to which it is attached it generally adds the notion of capable of, worthy of, and sometimes full of, causing: as, obtainable, capable of being obtained; tolerable, capable of being borne; laudable, worthy of praise; credible, that may be believed, or worthy of belief; forcible, full of force; horrible, terrible, full of or causing horror, terror. Many of these adjectives, such as tolerable, credible, legible, have been borrowed directly from the Latin or the French, and are in a somewhat different position from those formed by adding the termination to an already existing English word, as in the case of obtainable. Adjectives of this kind, with a passive signification, are the most numerous, and the base may be Anglo-Saxon or Latin; eatable, bearable, readable, believable, etc., are of the former kind. Of those in -able with an active signification we may mention delectable, suitable, capable. Of a neuter signification are durable, equable, conformable. All these are from verbal bases, but there are others derived from nouns, such as actionable, objectionable, peaceable, salable, serviceable. As to when -able and when -ible is to be used, Mr. Fitzedward Hall remarks: "Generally, the termination is -ible, if the base is the essentially uncorrupted stem of a Latin infinitive or supine of any conjugation but the first. . . . To the rule given above, however, there are many exceptions. . . . To all verbs, then, from the Anglo-Saxon, to all based on the uncorrupted infinitival stems of Latin verbs of the first conjugation, and to all substantives, whencesoever sprung, we annex -able only." See his work "On English Adjectives in -Able, with Special Reference to Reliable," pp. 45–47.

able-bodied (ā′bl-bod′id), a. [< able[1] + body + -ed[2].] Having a sound, strong body; having strength sufficient for physical work: as, a dozen able-bodied men; an able-bodied sailor. In a ship's papers abbreviated to A. B.

> Bp. Hall, Balm of Gilead, vii. 1.

abluent (ab′lō-ẹnt), a. and n. [< L. abluen(t-)s, ppr. of abluere, wash off, cleanse, < ab, off, + luere = Gr. λούειν, wash.] I. a. Washing; cleansing; purifying.

II. n. In med.: (a) That which purifies the blood, or carries off impurities from the system, especially from the stomach and intestines; a detergent. (b) That which removes filth or viscid matter from ulcers or from the skin.

ablution (ab-lō′shọn), n. [< ME. ablution, ablucioun, < OF. ablution, < L. ablutio(n-), < abluere, wash off: see abluent, a.] 1. In a general sense, the act of washing; a cleansing or purification by water.—2. Any ceremonial washing. (a) Among the Oriental races, a washing of the person or of parts of it, as the hands and face, and among the Hebrews also of garments and vessels, as a religious duty on certain occasions, or in preparation for some religious act, as a sign of moral purification, and sometimes in token of innocence of, or absence of responsibility for, some particular crime or charge (whence the expression "to wash one's hands of anything"). The Mohammedan law requires ablution before each of the five daily prayers, and permits it to be performed with sand when water cannot be procured, as in the desert.

> There is a natural analogy between the ablution of the body and the purification of the soul.
> Jer. Taylor, Worthy Communicant.

(b) In the Rom. Cath. Ch.: (1) The washing of the feet of the poor (John xiii. 14) on Maundy or Holy Thursday, called mandatum. (2) The washing of the celebrant's hands before and after communion. (c) In the Eastern Church, the purification of the newly baptized on the eighth day after baptism.

3. In the Rom. Cath. Ch., the wine and water which after communion are separately poured into the chalice over the thumb and index-finger of the officiating priest, who drinks this ablution before going on with the closing prayers.—4†. In chem., the purification of bodies by the affusion of a proper liquor, as water to dissolve salts.—5. In med., the washing of the body externally, as by baths, or internally, by diluent fluids.—6. The water used in cleansing.

> Wash'd by the briny wave, the pious train
> Are cleansed, and cast the ablutions in the main.
> Pope, Iliad, i. 413.

aboil (ạ-boil′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3], prep., + boil[2].] In or into a boiling state.

abolete† (ab′ō-lēt), a. [< L. abolētus*, pp. of abolescere, decay, < abolēre, destroy: see abolish.] Old; obsolete.

abolish (ą-bol′ish), v. t. [< late ME. abolysshen, < OF. aboliss-, extended stem of abolir, < L. abolēre, destroy, abolish, < ab, from, + olere*, in comp., grow.] To do away with; put an end to; destroy; efface or obliterate; annihilate: as, to abolish customs or institutions; to abolish slavery; to abolish idols (Isa. ii. 18); to abolish death (2 Tim. i. 10).

Or wilt thou thyself
Abolish thy creation, and unmake,
For him, what for thy glory thou hast made?
Milton, P. L., iii. 163.

Congress can, by edict, . . . abolish slavery, and pay for such slaves as we ought to pay for.
Emerson, Misc., p. 285.

His quick, instinctive hand
Caught at the hilt, as to abolish him.
Tennyson, Geraint.

=Syn. To Abolish, Repeal, Rescind, Recall, Revoke, Abrogate, Annul, Cancel, end, destroy, do away with, set aside, nullify, annihilate, quash, vacate, make void, extirpate, eradicate, suppress, uproot, erase, expunge. Abolish is a strong word, and signifies a complete removal, generally but not always by a summary act. It is the word specially used in connection with things that have been long established or deeply rooted, as an institution or a custom: as, to abolish slavery or polygamy. Repeal is generally used of the formal rescinding of a legislative act. Abrogate, to abolish summarily, more often as the act of a ruler, but sometimes of a representative body. Annul, literally to bring to nothing, to deprive of all force or obligation, as a law or contract. Rescind (literally, to cut short) is coextensive in meaning with both repeal and annul. Recall, revoke (see renounce). Cancel is not used of laws, but of deeds, bonds, contracts, etc., and figuratively of whatever may be thought of as crossed out. [In legal parlance, rescind is never applied to a statute; it is the common expression for the act of a party in justly repudiating a contract. Repeal is never applied to a contract; it is the common expression for the termination of the existence of a statute by a later statute. Annul is the common expression for the judicial act of a court in terminating the existence of any obligation or conveyance. Cancel is used when the instrument is obliterated actually or in legal contemplation; the other words when the obligation is annihilated irrespective of whether the instrument is left intact or not.]

I have never doubted the constitutional authority of Congress to abolish slavery in this District [of Columbia].
Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 184.

Leaving out amended acts and enumerating only acts entirely repealed, the result is that in the last three sessions there have been repealed . . . 650 acts belonging to the present reign. H. Spencer, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXV. 6.

The king also rescinded the order by which the Bishop of London had been suspended from the exercise of his functions. Buckle.

Whose laws, like those of the Medes and Persians, they cannot alter or abrogate. Burke.

Your promises are sins of inconsideration at best; and you are bound to repent and annul them. Swift.

I here forget all former griefs, Cancel all grudge. Shak., T. G. of V., v. 4.

abolishable (ą-bol′ish-ą-bl), a. [< abolish + -able. Cf. F. abolissable.] Capable of being abolished or annulled, as a law, rite, custom, etc.; that may be set aside or destroyed.

And yet . . . hope is but deferred; not abolished, not abolishable. Carlyle, French Rev., I. ii. 8.

abolisher (ą-bol′ish-ėr), n. [< abolish + *-er*1.] One who or that which abolishes.

abolishment (ą-bol′ish-ment), n. [< abolish + -ment. Cf. F. abolissement.] The act of abolishing or of putting an end to; abrogation; destruction; abolition. [Now rare.]

He should think the abolishment of Episcopacy among us would prove a mighty scandal.
Swift, Sent. of a Ch. of Eng. Man.

abolition (ab-ō-lish′ọn), n. [< F. abolition, < L. abolitio(n-), < abolēre, annul, abolish: see abolish.] 1. The act of abolishing, or the state of being abolished; annulment; abrogation; utter destruction: as, the abolition of laws, decrees, ordinances, rites, customs, debts, etc.; the abolition of slavery. The most frequent use of the word in recent times has been in connection with the effort to put an end to the system of slavery, which was finally accomplished in the United States in 1865 by the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution.

For the amalgamation of races, and for the abolition of villenage, she [Britain] is chiefly indebted to the influence which the priesthood in the middle ages exercised over the laity. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., i.

2†. In law: (a) Permission to desist from further prosecution. (b) Remission of punishment; condonation. [In the civil, French, and German law, abolition is used nearly synonymously with pardon, remission, grace. Grace is the generic term; pardon, by those laws, is the clemency extended by the prince to a participant in crime who is not a principal or accomplice; remission is granted in cases of involuntary homicide and self-defense. Abolition is used when the crime cannot be remitted. The prince by letters of abolition may remit the punishment, but the infamy remains unless letters of abolition have been obtained before sentence has been rendered. Bouvier.] = Syn. Overthrow, annulment, obliteration, extirpation, suppression.

abolitional (ab-ō-lish′ọn-ąl), a. Pertaining or relating to abolition.

abolitionary (ab-ō-lish′ọn-ą-ri), a. Destructive; abolitional.

abolitionism (ab-ō-lish′ọn-izm), n. [< abolition + -ism.] Belief in the principle of abolition, as of slavery; devotion to or advocacy of the opinions of abolitionists.

abolitionist (ab-ō-lish′ọn-ist), n. [< abolition + -ist; = F. abolitionniste.] A person who favors the abolition of some law, institution, or custom. Specifically, one of those who favored and sought to effect the abolition of slavery in the United States. Before 1830 these persons generally advocated gradual and voluntary emancipation. After that time many began to insist on immediate abolition, without regard to the wishes of the slaveholders. A portion of the abolitionists formed the Liberty party, which afterward acted with the Free-soil and Republican parties, and finally became merged in the latter. See abolition, 1.

abolitionize (ab-ō-lish′ọn-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. abolitionized, ppr. abolitionizing. To imbue with the doctrines or principles of abolitionists.

abolla (a-bol′ą), n.; pl. abollæ (-ē). [L., < Gr. ἀμβολή, contracted form of ἀναβολή, a cloak, < ἀναβάλλειν, throw back, < ἀνά, back, + βάλλειν, throw. The Gr. form ἀβόλλα was in turn borrowed from the Latin.] In Rom. antiq., a loose woolen cloak. Its precise form is not known; it differed from the toga, and was worn especially by soldiers; perhaps on this account, it was adopted by Stoic philosophers, who affected great austerity of life, whence Juvenal's expression facinus majoris abollæ, a crime of a deep philosopher.

★aboma (ą-bō′mą), n. [= Pg. aboma, < Guiana aboma: see boa, boma.] A large boa or anaconda of the family Pythonidæ or Boidæ, of the warmer parts of America. The species is not determined, and the name is probably of general applicability to the huge tree-snakes of the American tropics. As a book-name, aboma is identified with the Epicrates cenchris, usually misspelled Epicratis cenchria, after the Penny Cyc., 1836. This is a species called by Sclater the thick-necked tree-boa. A Venezuelan species is known as the brown aboma, Epicrates maurus. Some such serpent is also called the ringed boa, Boa aboma. In any case, the aboma is a near relative of the anaconda, Eunectes murinus, and of the common boa, Boa constrictor. Compare boa and bom.

The tamacuilla huilia or aboma appears to be the serpent worshipped by the ancient Mexicans. It is of gigantic size. S. G. Goodrich, Johnson's Nat. Hist., II. 406.

abomasum (ab-ō-mā′sum), n.; pl. abomasa (-są). [NL., < L. ab, from, + omasum.] The fourth or true stomach of ruminating animals, lying next to the omasum or third stomach, and opening through the pylorus into the duodenum. See cut under ruminant.

abomasus (ab-ō-mā′sus), n.; pl. abomasi (-sī). Same as abomasum.

abominable (ą-bom′i-ną-bl), a. [< ME. abominable, abhominable, < OF. abominable = Pr. abhomenable = Sp. abominable = Pg. abominavel = It. abominabile, < L. abominabilis, deserving abhorrence, < abominari, abhor, deprecate as an ill omen: see abominate. For the old spelling abhominable, see that form.] Deserving or liable to be abominated; detestable; loathsome; odious to the mind; offensive to the senses. In colloquial language especially, abominable often means little more than excessive, extreme, very disagreeable: as, his self-conceit is abominable.

This infernal pit
Abominable, accursed, the house of woe.
Milton, P. L., x. 464.

The captain was convicted of the murder of a cabin-boy, after a long course of abominable ill-treatment.
H. N. Oxenham, Short Studies, p. 54.

The almost universal keeping of abortifacients by druggists, despite statutes to the contrary. N. Y. Independent, July 24, 1873.

★abortion (a-bôr'shon), n. [< L. abortio(n-), miscarriage, < aboriri, miscarry: see abort, v.] 1. Miscarriage; the expulsion of the fetus before it is viable—that is, in women, before about the 28th week of gestation. Expulsion of the fetus occurring later than this, but before the normal time, is called (when not procured by art, as by a surgical operation) premature labor. A somewhat useless distinction has been sometimes drawn between abortion and miscarriage, by which the former is made to refer to the first four months of pregnancy and the latter to the following three months. Criminal abortion is premeditated or intentional abortion procured, at any period of pregnancy, by artificial means, and solely for the purpose of preventing the birth of a living child; feticide. At common law the criminality depended on the abortion being caused after quickening. Some modern statutes provide otherwise.

In the penitential discipline of the Church, abortion was placed in the same category as infanticide, and the stern sentences to which the guilty person was subject imprinted on the minds of Christians, more deeply than any mere exhortations, a sense of the enormity of the crime. Lecky, Europ. Morals, II. 24.

2. The product of untimely birth; hence, a misshapen being; a monster.—3. Any fruit or product that does not come to maturity; hence, frequently, in a figurative sense, anything which fails in its progress before it is matured or perfected, as a design or project.—4. In bot. and zoöl., the arrested development of an organ at a more or less early stage.

In the complete abortion of the rostellum [of Cephalanthera grandiflora] we have evidence of degradation. Darwin, Fertil. of Orchids by Insects, p. 80.

He [Mr. Bates] claims for that family [the Heliconidæ] the highest position, chiefly because of the imperfect structure of the fore legs, which is there carried to an extreme degree of abortion. A. R. Wallace, Nat. Selec., p. 133.

abortional (a-bôr'shon-al), a. Of the nature of an abortion; characterized by failure.

The treaty . . . proved abortional, and never came to fulfilment. Carlyle, Frederick the Great, VI. xv. 22.

abortionist (a-bôr'shon-ist), n. [< abortion + -ist.] One who produces or aims to produce a criminal abortion; especially, one who makes a practice of so doing.

He [Dr. Robb] urged the necessity of physicians using all their influence to discountenance the work of abortionists. N. Y. Med. Jour., XL. 580.

★abortive (a-bôr'tiv), a. and n. [< L. abortivus, born prematurely, causing abortion, < abortus, pp. of aboriri, miscarry: see abort, v.] I. a. 1. Brought forth in an imperfect condition; imperfectly formed or inadequately developed, as an animal or vegetable production; rudimentary.—2. Suppressed; kept imperfect; remaining rudimentary, or not advancing to perfection in form or function: a frequent use of the term in zoölogy. Compare vestigial.

The toes [of seals] are completely united by strong webs, and the straight nails are sometimes reduced in number, or even altogether abortive. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 359.

The power of voluntarily uncovering the canine [tooth] on one side of the face being thus often wholly lost, indicates that it is a rarely used and almost abortive action. Darwin, Express. of Emot., p. 253.

Hence—3. Not brought to completion or to a successful issue; failing; miscarrying; coming to nought: as, an abortive scheme.

Abortive as the first-born bloom of spring,
Nipp'd with the lagging rear of winter's frost.
Milton, S. A., l. 1576.

He made a salutation, or, to speak nearer the truth, an ill-defined, abortive attempt at courtesy. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, vii.

4. In bot., defective; barren. A. Gray.—5. Producing nothing; chaotic; ineffectual.

The void profound
Of unessential Night receives him next,
Wide-gaping; and with utter loss of being Threatens him, plunged in that abortive gulf.
Milton, P. L., ii. 438.

6. In med., producing or intended to produce abortion; abortifacient: as, abortive drugs.—7. Deformed; monstrous. [Rare.]

Thou elvish-mark'd, abortive, rooting hog!
Thou that wast seal'd in thy nativity
The slave of nature and the son of hell!
Shak., Rich. III., i. 3.

Abrahamic (ā-brą-ham'ik), a. [< L. Abraham, < Gr. Ἀβραάμ, repr. Heb. 'Abrāhām, father of a multitude, orig. 'Abrām, lit. father of height.] Of or pertaining to the patriarch Abraham.

Abrahamidæ (ā-brą-ham'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Abraham + -idæ.] The descendants of Abraham; the Hebrews.

This [Biblical] revelation of origins . . . was a whole system of religion, pure and elevating, . . . placing the Abrahamidæ, who for ages seem alone to have held to it, on a plane of spiritual vantage immeasurably above that of other nations. Dawson, Orig. of World, p. 71.

Abrahamite (ā'brą-ham-īt or ā'brąm-īt), n. [< ML. Abrahamitæ, pl.; as Abraham + -ite[2].] 1. One of a Christian sect named from its founder, Abraham of Antioch (ninth century), and charged with Paulician (Gnostic) errors.—2. One of a sect of Deists in Bohemia, who came into prominence about 1782, and were banished to Hungary by the Emperor Joseph II. for nonconformity. They seem to have professed the religion of Abraham before his circumcision, to have believed in God, the immortality of the soul, and a future state of rewards and punishments, but to have rejected baptism and the doctrine of the Trinity, and to have acknowledged no scripture but the decalogue and the Lord's prayer.

Abrahamitical (ā″brą-ham-it'i-kal or ā-brąm-it'i-kal), a. Relating to Abraham or to the Abrahamites.

Abraham-man (ā'brą-ham- or ā'brąm-man), n. 1. Originally, a mendicant lunatic from Bethlehem Hospital, London. The wards in the ancient Bedlam (Bethlehem) bore distinctive names, as of some saint or patriarch. That named after Abraham was devoted to a class of lunatics who on certain days were permitted to go out begging. They bore a badge, and were known as Abraham-men. Many, however, assumed the badge without right, and begged, feigning lunacy. Hence the more received meaning came to be—2. An impostor who wandered about the country seeking alms, under pretense of lunacy. Hence the phrase to sham Abraham, to feign sickness.

Matthew, sceptic and scoffer, had failed to subscribe a prompt belief in that pain about the heart; he had muttered some words in which the phrase, "shamming Abraham," had been very distinctly audible. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xxxiii.

Abraham's-balm† (ā′brą-hąmz- or ā′brąmz-bäm), n. An old name of Vitex Agnus-castus, supposed to be a charm for the preservation of chastity. See agnus castus, under agnus.

Abraham's-eye† (ā′brą-hąmz- or ā′brąmz-ī), n. A magical charm supposed to have power to deprive of eyesight a thief who refused to confess his guilt.

abraid† (a-brād′), v. [< ME. abraiden, abreiden, start up, awake, move, reproach, < AS. ābregdan, contr. ābrēdan (a strong verb), move quickly: see braid[1] and upbraid.] I. trans. To rouse; awake; upbraid.

> How now, base brat! what! are thy wits thine own,
> That thou dar'st thus abraide me in my land?
> Greene, Alphonsus, ii.

II. intrans. To awake; start.

> And if that he out of his sleepe abraide,
> He might don us bathe a vilanie.
> Chaucer, Reeve's Tale, l. 270.

Abram†, Abraham†, a. Corrupted forms of auburn.

Abramidina (ab′ra-mi-dī′nä), n. pl. [NL., < Abramis (Abramid-) + -ina.] In Günther's classification of fishes, the twelfth subfamily of Cyprinidæ, having the anal fin elongate and the abdomen, or part of it, compressed. It includes the genus Abramis and similar freshwater fishes related to the bream.

Abramis (ab′ra-mis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀβραμίς (ἀβραμιδ-), the name of a fish found in the Nile and the Mediterranean: not etymologically related to bream.] A genus of fishes of the family Cyprinidæ, typified by the common fresh-water bream of Europe, A. brama. The name is restricted by some to old-world forms closely allied to the bream, but most authors include certain American fishes, such as the common American shiner, Abramis or Notemigonus chrysoleucus, etc. G. Cuvier, 1817. See bream[1].

> In . . . Abramis and Ballerus, the teeth are entire.
> Jordan and Evermann, p. 250.

Abranchia (a-brang′ki-ą), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of abranchius: see abranchious.] A name given to several different groups of animals which have no gills: (a) To a group of vertebrates, comprising mammals, birds, and reptiles (or Mammalia and Sauropsida), whose young never possess gills. The group is thus contrasted with Batrachia and Pisces collectively. In this sense the term has no exact classificatory signification. (b) To a group of gastropodous mollusks, variously rated by naturalists as a suborder, an order, or a subclass; the Apneusta or Dermatopnoa of some, related to the Nudibranchiata, having no branchiæ, the upper surface of the body ciliated, and no shell except when in the larval state. This group includes the families Limapontidæ, Phyllirhoidæ, and Elysiidæ. (c) To an order of Annelida, the Oligochæta, which are without branchiæ, and respire by the surface of the body. There are several families, among them the Lumbricidæ, to which the common earthworm belongs. They are mostly hermaphrodite, and undergo no metamorphosis. They have no feet, but the body is provided with bristles (setæ). The mouth is rudimentary, not suctorial, as in the related order Hirudinea (leeches). The species are mostly land or fresh-water worms. (d) In Cuvier's system of classification, to the third family of the order Annelides, containing the earthworms (Abranchia setigera) and the leeches; thus approximately corresponding to the two modern orders Oligochæta and Hirudinea. It included, however, some heterogeneous elements, as the gordians. Sometimes called Abranchiata and also Abranchiæ. [If it is advisable to apply the term to any group of animals, it is probably to be retained in the second of the senses above noted.]

abranchian (a-brang′ki-ąn), n. One of the ★Abranchia.

Abranchiata (a-brang-ki-ā′tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of abranchiatus: see abranchiate.] A term sometimes used as synonymous with Abranchia.

abranchiate (a-brang′ki-āt), a. [< NL. abranchiatus: see abranchious and -ate[1].] Devoid of gills; of or pertaining to the Abranchia.

abranchious (a-brang′ki-us), a. [< NL. abranchius, < Gr. ἀ- priv. + βράγχια, gills.] Same as abranchiate. [Rare.]

> The second family of the abranchious Annelides,—or, the Abranchia without bristles.
> G. Cuvier, Règne Anim. (tr. of 1849), p. 398.

Abrasax (ab′ra-saks), n. Same as Abraxas, 1, 2.

abrase† (ab-rāz′), v. t. [< L. abrasus, pp. of abradere, rub off: see abrade.] Same as abrade.

abrase† (ab-rāz′), a. [< L. abrasus, pp.: see the verb.] Made clean or clear of marks by rubbing.

> A nymph as pure and simple as the soule or as an abrase table. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 3.

abrasion (ab-rā′zhon), n. [< L. abrasio(n-), < abradere: see abrade.] 1. The act of abrading; the act of wearing or rubbing off or away by friction or attrition. Common examples of abrasion are: (a) The wearing or rubbing away of rocks by icebergs or glaciers, by currents of water laden with sand, shingle, etc., by blown sand, or by other means. (b) The natural wasting, or wear and tear, to which coins are subjected in course of circulation, as opposed to intentional or accidental defacement.

> It is one of the most curious phenomena of language that words are as subject as coin to defacement and abrasion. G. P. Marsh, Lect. on Eng. Lang., Int., p. 16.

2. The result of rubbing or abrading; an abraded spot or place: applied chiefly to a fretting or excoriation of the skin by which the underlying tissues are exposed.—3. In pathol., a superficial excoriation of the mucous membrane of the intestines, accompanied by loss of substance in the form of small shreds.—4. The substance worn away by abrading or attrition. Berkeley.

abrasive (ab-rā′siv), a. and n. [< L. as if abrasivus*, < abrasus, pp. of abradere: see abrade.] I. a. Tending to produce abrasion; having the property of abrading; abradant.

> The . . . abrasive materials used in the treatment of metallic surfaces.
> C. P. B. Shelley, Workshop Appliances, p. 108.

II. n. Any material having abrading qualities; an abradant.

> The amateur is most strenuously counselled to polish the tool upon the oil-stone, or other fine abrasive employed for setting the edge.
> O. Byrne, Artisan's Handbook, p. 17.

abraum (ab′râm; G. pron. äp′roum), n. [G.; lit., what has to be cleared away to get at something valuable beneath; the worthless upper portion of a vein or ore-deposit; the earth covering the rock in a quarry; < abräumen, clear away, take from the room or place, < ab- (= E. off), from, + raum, place, = E. room, q. v.] Red ocher, used by cabinet-makers to give a red color to new mahogany.—Abraum salts [G. abraumsalze], a mixture of salts of potash, soda, magnesia, etc., overlying the rock-salt deposit at Stassfurt, Prussia, and vicinity, the value of which was not immediately recognized when these deposits were opened, but which is now the chief source of supply of potassic salts in the world.

Abraxas, collection of the British Museum.

Abraxas (ab-rak′sas), n. [See def. 2, and cf. abracadabra.] 1. In antiq., a Gnostic amulet consisting of an engraved gem, often bearing a mystical figure (which generally combines human and brute forms) and an unintelligible legend, but sometimes inscribed with the word Abraxas, either alone or accompanying a figure or a word connected with Hebrew or Egyptian religion, as Iao, Sabaoth, Osiris.— 2. A mystical word used by the Gnostic followers of Basilides to denote the Supreme Being, or, perhaps, its 365 emanations collectively, or the 365 orders of spirits occupying the 365 heavens. Later it was commonly applied to any symbolical representation of Gnostic ideas. It is said to have been coined by Basilides in the second century, from the sum of the Greek numeral letters expressing the number 365; thus: $\alpha = 1$, $\beta = 2$, $\rho = 100$, $\alpha = 1$, $\xi = 60$, $\alpha = 1$, $\varsigma = 200$; total, 365.

Abraxas. (Both examples are of the Basilidian type.)

Also written Abrasax.

3. A genus of lepidopterous insects, of the family Geometridæ, containing the large magpie-moth, Abraxas grossulariata. The larvæ are very destructive to gooseberry- and currant-bushes in Europe, consuming their leaves as soon as they appear.

abray† (a-brā′), v. i. [A false pres. form, made from ME. pret. abrayde, abraide, taken for a weak verb, with pret. ending -de (= E. -ed), whereas the verb is strong, with pret. abrayde, abraide, properly abraid, abreid (< AS. ābræġd), similar in form to pres. abrayde, abraide, < AS. ābregde, inf. ābregdan: see abraid.] To awake.

> But, whenas I did out of sleep abray, abrazite (ab′ra-zīt), n. [< Gr. ἀ- priv., not, + βράζειν, boil, ferment, + -ite[2].] A mineral found at Capo di Bove, near Rome, probably the same as that named zeagonite and later gismondine (which see).
> I found her not where I left her whyleare.
> Spenser, F. Q., IV. vi. 36.

abrazitic (ab-ra-zit′ik), a. Not effervescing, as in acids or when heated before the blowpipe: said of certain minerals. [Rare.]

abread, abreed (ą-brēd′), prep. phr. as adv. [Sc., < ME. abrede, on brede, in breadth: a, on, prep.; brede, < AS. brǣdu, breadth, < brād, broad: see a[3] and breadth, and cf. abroad.] Abroad. Burns. Also spelled abraid. [Scotch.]

abreast (ą-brest′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3], prep., on, + breast.] 1. Side by side, with breasts in a line: as, "the riders rode abreast," Dryden.

> It [the wall of Chester] has everywhere, however, a rugged outer parapet and a broad hollow flagging, wide enough for two strollers abreast.
> H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 9.

2. Naut.: (a) Lying or moving side by side, with stems equally advanced. (b) When used to indicate the situation of a vessel in regard to another object, opposite; over against; lying so that the object is on a line with the beam: in this sense with of.

> The Bellona . . . kept too close to the starboard shoal, and grounded abreast of the outer ship of the enemy.
> Southey, Nelson, II. 121.

3. Figuratively, up to the same pitch or level: used with of or with: as, to keep abreast of the times in science, etc.—4†. At the same time; simultaneously.

> Abreast therewith began a convocation. Fuller.

Line abreast, a formation of a squadron in which the ships are abreast of one another.

abrenounce† (ab-rē-nouns′), v. t. [< L. ab, from (here intensive), + E. renounce, after LL. abrenuntiāre, < L. ab + renuntiāre, renounce: see renounce.] To renounce absolutely.

> Under pain of the pope's curse . . . either to abrenounce their wives or their livings.
> Foxe, Book of Martyrs, Acts and Deeds, fol. 159.

abrenunciation† (ab-rē-nun-si-ā′shon), n. [< ML. abrenuntiatio(n-), < L. abrenuntiāre: see abrenounce.] Renunciation; absolute denial.

> An abrenunciation of that truth which he so long had professed. Hurt of Sedition, iii. b.

abreption† (ab-rep′shon), n. [< L. as if abreptio(n-)*, < abripere, pp. abreptus, snatch away, < ab, away, + rapere, seize: see rapt and ravish.] The state of being carried away or forcibly separated; separation.

abreuvoir (a-brē-vwor′), n. [F., a drinking-place, horse-trough, < abreuver, give to drink, earlier abrever, < OF. abevrer = Sp. abrevar = It. abbeverare, < ML. abeverare, orig. adbiberare*, < ad, to, + biberare*, < L. bibere, drink: see bib[1] and beverage.] 1. A watering-place for animals; a horse-trough.—2. In masonry, a joint or interstice between stones, to be filled up with mortar or cement. Gwilt.

Also spelled abbreuvoir.

abricock†, abricot†, n. Same as apricot.

abrid (ā′brid), n. [Uncertain; perhaps due to Sp. abrido*, for irreg. abierto, pp. of abrir, open, unlock, < L. aperire, open.] A bushing-plate around a hole in which a pintle moves. E. H. Knight.

abridge (ą-brij′), v. t.; pret. and pp. abridged, ppr. abridging. [< ME. abregen, abreggen, abriggen, etc., < OF. abrigier, abridgier, abbregier, abrevier = Pr. abrevjar, < L. abbreviare, shorten, < ad, to, + brevis, short: see abbreviate and brief.] 1. To make shorter; curtail: as, "abridged cloaks," Scott, Ivanhoe, xiv.—2. To shorten by condensation or omission, or both; rewrite or reconstruct on a smaller scale; put the main or essential parts of into less space: used of writings: as, Justin abridged the history of Trogus Pompeius.

> The antiquities of Richborough and Reculver, abridged from the Latin of Mr. Archdeacon Battely.
> N. and Q., 6th ser., X. 143.

3. To lessen; diminish: as, to abridge labor.

> Power controlled or abridged is almost always the rival and enemy of that power by which it is controlled or abridged. A. Hamilton, Federalist, No. 15.

4. To deprive; cut off: followed by of, and formerly also by from: as, to abridge one of rights or enjoyments.

> Nor do I now make moan to be abridg'd
> From such a noble rate. Shak., M. of V., i. 1.

5. In alg., to reduce, as a compound quantity or equation, to a more simple form. = Syn. 2. To cut down, prune. See abbreviate.—4. To dispossess, divest, strip, despoil.

abridgedly (ą-brij′ed-li), adv. In a concise or shortened form.

abridger (ą-brij′ėr), n. One who or that which abridges, by curtailing, shortening, or condensing.

> Criticks have been represented as the great abridgers of the native liberty of genius. H. Blair, Lectures, iii.
>
> Abridgers are a kind of literary men to whom the indolence of modern readers . . . give[s] ample employment.
> I. D'Israeli, Curios. of Lit., II. 67.

abridgment (ạ-brij'mẹnt), n. [< late ME. abrygement, < OF. abrigement, abregement: see abridge and -ment.] 1. The act of abridging, or the state of being abridged; diminution; contraction; reduction; curtailment; restriction: as, an abridgment of expenses; "abridgment of liberty," Locke.

Persons employed in the mechanic arts are those whom the abridgment of commerce would immediately affect.
A. Hamilton, Works, II. 15.

It was his sin and folly which brought him under that abridgment. South.

2. A condensation, as of a book; a reduction within a smaller space; a reproduction of anything in reduced or condensed form.

A genuine abridgment is a reproduction of the matter or substance of a larger work in a condensed form, and in language which is not a mere transcript of that of the original. Drone, Copyright, p. 158.

Here lies David Garrick, describe him who can,
An abridgment of all that was pleasant in man.
Goldsmith, Retaliation.

3. That which abridges or cuts short. [Rare.]

Look, where my abridgments come [namely, the players who cut me short in my speech. Compare, however, meaning 4]. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2.

4. That which shortens anything, as time, or makes it appear short; hence, a pastime. [Rare.]

Say, what abridgment have you for this evening?
What mask, what music? Shak., M. N. D., v. 1.

Also spelled abridgement.

= Syn. 2. Abridgment, Compendium, Epitome, Abstract, Conspectus, Synopsis, Summary, Syllabus, Brief, Digest. An abridgment is a work shortened by condensation of statement, or by omitting the less essential parts. A compendium, or compend, is a concise but comprehensive view of a subject; in general it does not imply, as abridgment does, the existence of a larger or previous work. An epitome contains only the most important points of a work or subject, expressed in the smallest compass. An abstract is a bare statement or outline of facts, heads, or leading features in a book, lecture, subject, etc. Conspectus and synopsis are, literally, condensed views—the substance of any matter so arranged as to be taken in at a glance; synopsis implies orderly arrangement under heads and particulars. A summary is a brief statement of the main points in a work or treatise, less methodical than an abstract or a synopsis; it may be a recapitulation. A syllabus is commonly a synopsis printed for the convenience of those hearing lectures; but the term is also applied to certain papal documents. (See syllabus.) Brief is generally confined to its technical legal meanings. (See brief.) A digest is a methodical arrangement of the material of a subject, as under heads or titles; it may include the whole of the matter concerned: as, a digest of laws. There may be an abridgment of a dictionary, a compend or compendium of literature, an epitome of a political situation, an abstract of a sermon, a conspectus or synopsis of a book, a summary of the arguments in a debate, a digest of opinions on some moot point.

abrin (ā'brin), n. [< Abrus + *-in*2.] A name given to a poisonous principle obtained from Abrus precatorius.

abroach (ạ-brōch'), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< ME. abroche, in the phrase sette(n) abroche, set abroach, < *a*3 for on + broche, a spit, spigot, pin: see brooch and broach.] Broached; letting out or yielding liquor, or in a position for letting out: as, the cask is abroach.

If the full tun of vengeance be abroach,
Fill out and swill until you burst again.
Webster (?), Weakest Goeth to the Wall, i. 2.

To set abroach. (a) To set running; cause to flow or let out liquor, as a cask or barrel.

Barrels of ale set abroach in different places of the road had kept the populace in perfect love and loyalty towards the Queen and her favourite. Scott, Kenilworth, II. xi.

(b) Figuratively, to give rise to; spread abroad; disseminate; propagate.

What mischiefs he might set abroach.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 2.

abroacht (ạ-brōch'), v. t. [< ME. abrochen, broach, tap, < OF. brocher, brochier, broach, with prefix a-, due to adv. abroche: see abroach, prep. phr., and broach.] To open, as a cask, for the purpose of letting out liquor; tap; broach.

Thilke tonne that I schal abroche.
Chaucer, Wife of Bath, Prol., l. 177.

abroad (ạ-brâd'), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< ME. abroad, abrod, < *a*3, prep., on, + brood, brod, broad: see broad.] 1. Broadly; widely; expansively; outward on all or on both sides.

The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts. Rom. v. 5.

Her winges bothe abrod she spradde. Gower.

Look now abroad—another race has filled
These populous borders. Bryant, The Ages, st. 32.

2. Out of or beyond certain limits. (a) Beyond the walls of a house or the bounds of any inclosure: as, to walk abroad.

Where as he lay
So sick alway,
He myght not come abrode.
Sir T. More, A Merry Jest.

We are for the most part more lonely when we go abroad among men than when we stay in our chambers.
Thoreau, Walden, p. 147.

(b) Beyond the bounds of one's own country; in foreign countries: as, he lived abroad for many years. [In the United States used most commonly with reference to Europe.]

At home the soldier learned how to value his rights, abroad how to defend them.
Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

Others, still, are introduced from abroad by fashion, or are borrowed thence for their usefulness.
F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 153.

3. Absent; gone away, especially to a considerable distance: as, the head of the firm is abroad. —4. In an active state; astir; in circulation: as, there are thieves abroad; rumors of disaster are abroad.

There's villainy abroad: this letter will tell you more.

To be all abroad. (a) To be wide of the mark, in a figurative sense; be far wrong in one's guess or estimate. (b) To be at a loss; be puzzled, perplexed, bewildered, nonplussed; be all or quite at sea.—The schoolmaster is abroad, education is diffused among the people: often used ironically or punningly, implying that the schoolmaster is absent. See schoolmaster.

Abrocoma (ab-rok'ọ-mạ̈), n. Same as Habrocoma.

abrocome (ab'rọ-kōm), n. Same as habrocome.

abrogable (ab'rọ-gạ-bl), a. [< L. as if abrogabilis*, < abrogare, abrogate: see abrogate, v., and -ble.] Capable of being abrogated.

abrogate (ab'rọ-gāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. abrogated, ppr. abrogating. [< L. abrogatus, pp. of abrogare, annul, repeal, < ab, from, + rogare, ask, propose a law: see rogation.] 1. To abolish summarily; annul by an authoritative act; repeal. Applied specifically to the repeal of laws, customs, etc., whether expressly or by establishing something inconsistent therewith. See abrogation.

The supremacy of mind abrogated ceremonies.
Bancroft, Hist. U. S., II. 346.

Since I revoke, annul, and abrogate
All his decrees in all kinds: they are void!
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 170.

2†. To do away with; put an end to; abolish.

Perge, good master Holofernes, perge; so it shall please you to abrogate scurrility. Shak., L. L. L., iv. 2.

abrogatet (ab'rọ-gāt), a. [< L. abrogatus, annulled, pp. of abrogare: see abrogate, v.] Annulled; abolished.

abrogation (ab-rọ-gā'shọn), n. [< L. abrogatio(n-), a repeal, < abrogare, repeal: see abrogate, v.] The act of abrogating. Specifically, the annulling of a law by legislative action or by usage. See derogation. Abrogation is expressed when pronounced by the new law in general or particular terms; it is implied when the new law contains provisions positively contrary to the former law.

There are no such institutions here;—no law that can abide one moment when popular opinion demands its abrogation. W. Phillips, Speeches, p. 47.

abrogative (ab'rọ-gā-tiv), a. Abrogating or annulling: as, an abrogative law.

abrogator (ab'rọ-gā-tọr), n. One who abrogates or repeals.

Abronia (a-brō'ni-ạ), n. [NL., prop. Habronia*, < Gr. ἁβρός, graceful, elegant, delicate: see Abrus.] A genus of plants, low and mostly trailing nyctaginaceous herbs, natives of the western United States. The showy and sometimes fragrant flowers are borne in umbels, much resembling the garden verbena in appearance, but very different in structure. Two or three species are found in cultivation.

abrood† (ạ-brōd'), prep. phr. as adv. [< ME. abrode, < *a*3, prep., on, + brode, E. brood.] In or as if in the act of brooding.

The Spirit of God sat abrood upon the whole rude mass.
Abp. Sancroft, Sermons, p. 135.

abrook† (ạ-brůk'), v. t. [< *a-*1 (expletive) + *brook*2.] To brook; endure. See *brook*2.

Ill can thy noble mind abrook
The abject people, gazing on thy face,
With envious looks still laughing at thy shame.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., ii. 4.

abrotanoid (ab-rot'ạ-noid), n. [< Gr. ἀβρότονον, an aromatic plant, prob. southernwood (ML. abrotanum), + εἶδος, form: see idol.] A species of sclerodermatous East Indian reef-coral, Madrepora abrotanoides.

abrotanum (ab-rot'ạ-num), n. [< ML. abrotanum and aprotanum, prop. L. abrotonum (also abrotonus), < Gr. ἀβρότονον (also ἀβρότονος), an aromatic plant, prob. southernwood (Artemisia Abrotanum), = Skt. mrātana, a plant, Cyperus rotundus; less prob. for ἀβρότονον*, < ἁβρός, delicate, + τόνος, a cord, taken in the sense of filament or fiber. The L. form gave rise to AS. aprotane, ambrotena, prutene, and other corrupt forms, and to It. Sp. Pg. abrotano, OF. abrone, averoine, F. aurone.] A European species of Artemisia, A. Abrotanum, frequent in cultivation under the name of southernwood.

abrupt (ạ-brupt'), a. and n. [< L. abruptus, steep, disconnected, abrupt, pp. of abrumpere, break off, < ab, off, + rumpere, break: see rupture.] I. a. 1. Broken or appearing as if broken away or off; marked by or showing a sudden breach or change of continuity; wanting continuation or completion: as, the path or the discourse came to an abrupt termination; an abrupt turn in a road. Hence—2. Steep; precipitous: as, an abrupt cliff; an abrupt descent.

The abrupt mountain breaks,
And seems with its accumulated crags
To overhang the world. Shelley, Alastor.

3. Figuratively, sudden; without notice to prepare the mind for the event; unceremonious: as, an abrupt entrance or address.

Abrupt death
A period puts, and stops his impious breath.
Oldham, Satires on Jesuits.

4. Lacking in continuity; having sudden transitions from one subject to another: as, an abrupt style.—5. In bot., terminating suddenly: as, an abrupt point: sometimes used in the sense of truncate: as, an abrupt leaf.—Abrupt-pinnate. Same as abruptly pinnate. See abruptly. = Syn. 2. Precipitous, perpendicular, sheer, steep.—3. Sudden, unexpected, hasty, hurried, rough, rude, brusk, blunt, curt, precipitate, short, summary, vehement.—4. Broken, disconnected.

II. n. [< L. abruptum, a steep ascent or descent, prop. neut. of abruptus, broken off: see the adj.] An abrupt place; a precipice or chasm. [Rare and poetical.]

Or spread his aery flight,
Upborne with indefatigable wings,
Over the vast abrupt. Milton, P. L., ii. 409.

abrupt† (ạ-brupt'), v. t. To break off; interrupt; disturb.

Insecurity . . . abrupteth our tranquillities.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., ii. 112.

abrupted (ạ-brup'ted), p. a. Broken off suddenly; interrupted.

abruptedly (ạ-brup'ted-li), adv. Abruptly.

abruption (ab-rup'shọn), n. [< L. abruptio(n-), a breaking off, < abrumpere: see abrupt, a.] A sudden breaking off; a sudden termination; a violent separation of bodies.

By this abruption posterity lost more instruction than delight. Johnson, Life of Cowley.

abruptly (ạ-brupt'li), adv. 1. Brokenly; by breaking or being broken off suddenly: as, the path or the discourse ended abruptly.—2. Precipitously, or with a very steep slope: as, the rocks rise abruptly from the water's edge.—3. Suddenly, without giving notice, or without the usual forms: as, the minister left France abruptly.—4. With an abrupt termination.—Abruptly pinnate, terminating without an odd leaflet or tendril: said of a pinnate leaf.

Abruptly Pinnate Leaf.

abruptness (ạ-brupt'nes), n. The state or quality of being abrupt. (a) The state or quality of being broken off, steep, or craggy; sudden breach of continuity; precipitousness. (b) Suddenness; unceremonious haste or vehemence. (c) Any want of continuity or smoothness.

Some other languages, for their soft and melting fluency, as having no abruptness of consonants, have some advantage of the English. Howell, Forreine Travell, p. 158.

Abrus (ā'brus), n. [NL., prop. Habrus*, < Gr. ἁβρός, graceful, elegant, delicate.] A small genus of leguminous plants. Abrus Abrus, or Indian licorice, is a woody twiner, indigenous to India, but now found in all tropical countries, where its root is often used as a substitute for licorice. Its polished, party-colored seeds, of the size of a small pea, called crabs'-eyes, jumble-beads, and jequirity or John Crow beans, are employed for rosaries, necklaces, etc., and as a remedy in diseases of the conjunctiva. They have given their native name of retti [Hind. ratti, ratī] to a weight (2.1875 grains) used by Hindu jewelers and druggists. See retti-weights.

abs-. A prefix of Latin origin; a form of ab- used (as in Latin) before c, q, t, as in abscond, abstain, absterge, abstract, etc.

abscess (ab'ses), n. [< L. abscessus, a going away, in medical language an abscess, < abscedere, go away, < abs, lengthened form of ab, away, + cedere, go: see cede.] In med., a collection of pus in the tissues of any part of the body.

abscessed (ab'sest), p. a. Diseased with an abscess or with abscesses.

abscession† (ab-sesh'ọn), n. [< L. abscessio(n-), < abscedere, go away: see abscess.] 1. Departure.

Neither justly excommunicated out of that particular church to which he was orderly joyned, nor excommunicating himself by voluntary Schisme, declared abscession, separation, or apostasie.
Bp. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 37.

2. In med., an abscess.

abscess-root (ab'ses-rōt), n. A popular name of the plant Polemonium reptans.

abscind (ab-sind'), v. t. [< L. abscindere, cut off, tear off, < ab, off, + scindere, cut, = Gr. σχίζειν, cut, separate: see scission and schism.] To cut off. [Rare.]

Two syllables abscinded from the rest.
Johnson, Rambler, No. 90.

abscise (ab-sīz'), v. t.; pret. and pp. abscised, ppr. abscising. [< L. abscisus, pp. of abscidere, cut off, < abs for ab, off, away, + cædere, cut. Cf. excise, incise, v., and precise, a.] To cut off or away.

abscissa (ab-sis'ä), n.; pl. abscissæ or abscissas (-ē, -äz). [L. (tr. of Gr. ἀπολαμβανομένη), abbreviation of recta ex diametro abscissa, line cut off from the diameter; fem. of abscissus, cut off, pp. of abscindere: see abscind.] In math.: (a) In the conic sections, that part of a transverse axis which lies between its vertex and a perpendicular ordinate to it from a given point of the conic. Thus (fig. 1), in the parabola PAC, AM, the part of the axis AB cut off by the ordinate PM, is the abscissa of the point P. (b) In the system of Cartesian coördinates, a certain line used in determining the position of a point in a plane. Thus (fig. 2), let two fixed intersecting lines (axes) OY and OX be taken, and certain directions on them (as from O toward X and from O toward Y) be assumed as positive. From any point, as P, let a line be drawn parallel to OY and cutting OX in M. Then will the two quantities OM and MP, with the proper algebraic sign, determine the position of the point P. OM, or its value, is called the abscissa of the point, and the fixed line X'X is called the axis of abscissas. See coördinate, n., 2.

abscissio infiniti (ab-sish'i-ō in-fi-nī'tī). [L.; lit., a cutting off of an infinite (number): see abscission and infinite.] In logic, a series of arguments which exclude, one after another, various assertions which might be made with regard to the subject under discussion, thus gradually diminishing the number of possible assumptions.

★abscission (ab-sizh'ọn), n. [< L. abscissio(n-), < abscindere, cut off: see abscind.] 1. The act of cutting off; severance; removal.

Not to be cured without the abscission of a member.
Jer. Taylor.

2†. The act of putting an end to; the act of annulling or abolishing. Sir T. Browne.— 3. Retrenchment. [Rare.]—4. The sudden termination of a disease by death. Hooper, Med. Dict.— 5. In rhet., a figure of speech consisting in a sudden reticence, as if the words already spoken made sufficiently clear what the speaker would say if he were to finish the sentence: as, "He is a man of so much honor and candor, and such generosity — but I need say no more."— 6. In horary astrol., the preventing of anything shown by one aspect by means of another; frustration.—Abscission of the cornea, in surg., a specific cutting operation performed upon the eye for the removal of a staphyloma of the cornea.

absconce (ab-skons'), n. [< ML. absconsa, a dark lantern, fem. of L. absconsus, for absconditus, pp. of abscondere, hide: see abscond and sconce[1].] Eccles., a dark lantern holding a wax-light, used in the choir in reading the absolution and benediction at matins, and the chapters and prayers at lauds.

abscond (ab-skond'), v. [< L. abscondere, hide, put away, < abs, away, + condere, put, lay up, < con-, for cum, together, + -dere, in comp., a weakened form of dare*, put, = E. do.] I. intrans. 1. To retire from public view, or from the place in which one resides or is ordinarily to be found; depart in a sudden and secret manner; take one's self off; decamp; especially, to go out of the way in order to avoid a legal process.

He must, for reasons which nobody could divine, have absconded.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 150.

2. To hide, withdraw, or lie concealed: as, "the marmot absconds in winter," Ray, Works of Creation.

A fish that flashes his freckled side in the sun and as suddenly absconds in the dark and dreamy waters again.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 377.

= Syn. Escape, retreat, flee, run away, make off.

II.† trans. To conceal.

Nothing discoverable in the lunar surface is ever covered and absconded from us by the interposition of any clouds or mists but such as rise from our own globe.
Bentley, Sermons, viii.

absconded† (ab-skon'ded), p. a. Hidden; secret; recondite. In her., said of a bearing which is completely covered by a superimposed charge. Thus, if a shield has three mullets in pale, the middle one of the three would be completely hidden or absconded by a shield of pretense or inescutcheon.

I am now obliged to go far in the pursuit of beauty which lies very absconded and deep.
Shaftesbury, Moralists, p. 3.

abscondedly† (ab-skon'ded-li), adv. In concealment or hiding.

An old Roman priest that then lived abscondedly in Oxon.
Wood, Athenæ Oxon., I. 631.

abscondence† (ab-skon'dens), n. Concealment; seclusion.

absconder (ab-skon'dėr), n. One who absconds.

absconsio (ab-skon'shi-ō), n.; pl. absconsiones (ab-skon-shi-ō'nēz). [NL., < L. abscondere, hide: see abscond.] In anat. and surg., a cavity or sinus.

absence (ab'sens), n. [< ME. absence, < OF. absence, ausence, F. absence = Sp. Pg. ausencia = It. assenza, < L. absentia, absence, < absen(t-)s, absent: see absent, a.] 1. The state of being absent; the state of being away or not present: as, speak no ill of one in his absence.

Say, is not absence death to those who love?
Pope, Autumn.

We see on the lip of our companion the presence or absence of the great masters of thought and poetry to his mind.
Emerson, Domestic Life.

2. The period of being away or absent: as, an absence of several weeks or years.— 3. The state of being wanting; non-existence at the place and time spoken of; want; lack: as, the absence of evidence.

In the absence of conventional law.
Chancellor Kent.

4. Absent-mindedness; inattention to things present: a shortened form of absence of mind.

To conquer that abstraction which is called absence.
Landor.

For two or three days I continued subject to frequent involuntary fits of absence, which made me insensible, for the time, to all that was passing around me.
B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 147.

Absence of mind, habitual or temporary forgetfulness of, or inattention to, one's immediate surroundings.— Decree in absence, in Scots law, a decree pronounced against a defendant who has not appeared and pleaded on the merits of the cause.— Leave of absence, permission from a superior to be absent. In the United States army an officer is entitled to 30 days' leave in each year on full pay. He may permit this time to accumulate for a period not exceeding four years. Wilhelm, Mil. Dict.

absent (ab'sent), a. and n. [< ME. absent, < OF. absent, ausent, F. absent = Sp. Pg. ausente = It. assente, < L. absen(t-)s, being away (ppr. of abesse, be away), < ab, away, + sen(t-)s*, ppr. (= Gr. ὤν (ὀντ-), = Skt. sant, being, = E. sooth, true: see sooth), < inf. esse, be: see essence, am, is, and cf. present.] I. a. 1. Not in a certain place at a given time; not in consciousness or thought at a certain time; away: opposed to present.

With this she fell distract,
And, her attendants absent, swallow'd fire.
Shak., J. C., iv. 3.

The picture or visual image in your mind when the orange is present to the senses is almost exactly reproduced when it is absent.
J. Fiske, Idea of God, p. 140.

2. Not existing; wanting; not forming a part or attribute of: as, among them refinement is absent; revenge is entirely absent from his mind.— 3. Absent-minded (which see).

From this passage we may gather not only that Chaucer was . . . small of stature and slender, but that he was accustomed to be twitted on account of the abstracted or absent look which so often tempts children of the world to offer its wearer a penny for his thoughts.
A. W. Ward, Life of Chaucer, iii.

Absent with leave (milit.), said of officers permitted to absent themselves from their posts, and of enlisted men on furlough.— Absent without leave (milit.), said of officers and soldiers (sometimes of deserters) who have absented themselves from their posts without permission; they are so reported in order to bring their offense under the cognizance of a court martial. In the United States army, an officer absent without leave for three months may be dropped from the rolls of the army by the President, and is not eligible to reappointment. Wilhelm, Mil. Dict. = Syn. 3. Absent, Inattentive, Abstracted, Preoccupied, Diverted, Distracted. An absent man is one whose mind wanders unconsciously from his immediate surroundings, or from the topic which demands his attention; he may be thinking of little or nothing. An abstracted man is kept from what is present by thoughts and feelings so weighty or interesting that they engross his attention. He may have been so preoccupied by them as to be unable to begin to attend to other things, or his thoughts may be diverted to them upon some chance suggestion. In all these cases he is or becomes inattentive. Distracted (literally, dragged apart) is sometimes used for diverted, but denotes more properly a state of perplexity or mental uneasiness sometimes approaching frenzy.

II.† n. One who is not present; an absentee.

Let us enjoy the right of Christian absents, to pray for one another.
Bp. Morton, To Abp. Usher.

absent (ab-sent'), v. t. [< F. absenter = Sp. Pg. ausentar = It. assentare, < L. absentare, cause to be away, be away, < absen(t-)s, absent: see absent, a.] To make absent; take or keep away: now used only reflexively, but formerly sometimes otherwise, as by Milton: as, to absent one's self from home; he absented himself from the meeting.

If thou didst ever hold me in thy heart,
Absent thee from felicity awhile.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 2.

What change
Absents thee, or what chance detains?
Milton, P. L., x. 108.

absentaneous† (ab-sen-tā'nē-us), a. [< ML. absentaneus, < L. absen(t-)s, absent: see absent, a.] Relating to absence; absent. Bailey.

absentation (ab-sen-tā'shọn), n. [< ML. absentatio(n-), < L. absentare, make absent: see absent, v.] The act of absenting one's self, or the state of being absent. [Rare.]

His absentation at that juncture becomes significant.
Sir W. Hamilton, Discussions, p. 229.

★absentee (ab-sen-tē'), n. 1. One who is absent; more narrowly, one who withdraws from his country, office, estate, post, duty, or the like. Specifically applied, generally by way of reproach, to landlords and capitalists who derive their income from one country, but spend it in another in which they reside. 2. In law, one who is without the jurisdiction of a particular court or judge.

absenteeism (ab-sen-tē'izm), n. The practice or habit of being an absentee; the practice of absenting one's self from one's country, station, estate, etc. Absenteeism in France, under the old régime, was one of the greatest evils, and a prominent cause of the first revolution; and in Ireland it has been a cause of much popular discontent.

Partly from the prevailing absenteeism among the landlords, . . . these peasants of the north [of Russia] are more energetic, more intelligent, more independent, and consequently less docile and pliable, than those of the fertile central provinces.
D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 109.

absenteeship (ab-sen-tē'ship), n. Same as absenteeism.

absenter (ab-sen'tėr), n. One who absents himself.

He [Judge Foster] has fined all the absenters £20 apiece.
Lord Thurlow, Sir M. Foster.

absente reo (ab-sen'tē rē'ō). [L.: absente, abl. of absen(t-)s, absent; reo, abl. of reus, a defendant, < res, an action: see res.] The defendant being absent: a law phrase.

absently (ab'sent-li), adv. In an absent or inattentive manner; with absence of mind.

absentment (ab-sent'ment), n. [< absent, v., + -ment.] The act of absenting one's self, or the state of being absent. Barrow. [Rare.]

absent-minded (ab'sent-mīn'ded), a. Characterized by absence of mind (see absence); inattentive to or forgetful of one's immediate surroundings.

absent-mindedness (ab'sent-mīn'ded-nes), n. The quality, state, or habit of being absent-minded.

absentness (ab'sent-nes), n. The quality of being absent, inattentive, or absent-minded; absent-mindedness.

absey-book† (ab'sē-bůk), n. [That is, a-b-c book: see a-b-c.] A primer, which sometimes included a catechism.

And then comes answer like an Absey-book.
Shak., K. John, i. 1.

absidiole (ab-sid'i-ōl), n. Same as apsidiole.

absinth (ab'sinth), n. [< F. absinthe, < L. absinthium: see absinthium.] 1. Wormwood. See absinthium.— 2. Absinthe (which see).

absinthate (ab-sin'thāt), n. A salt formed by a combination of absinthic acid with a base.

absinthe (ab'sanṭ'), n. [F., < L. absinthium: see absinthium.] The common name of a highly aromatic liqueur of an opaline-green color and bitter taste; an abbreviation of extrait d'absinthe, extract of absinthium. It is prepared by steeping in alcohol or strong spirit bitter herbs, the chief of which are Artemisia Absinthium, A. mutellina, A. spicata; besides which some recipes mention plants that are not of this genus, and can be intended only to modify the bitter or the wormwoods; the liquor so flavored is then redistilled. It is considered tonic and stomachic. Its excessive use produces a morbid condition differing somewhat from ordinary alcoholism. Vertigo and epileptiform convulsions are marked symptoms, and hallucinations occur without other symptoms of delirium tremens. The use of it prevailed at one time among the French soldiers in Algiers, but it is now forbidden throughout the French army. The most common way of preparing it for drinking is by pouring it into water drop by drop or allowing it to trickle through a funnel with a minute opening; so prepared, it is called la hussarde, and is common in the cafés of France, Italy, and Switzerland.

absinthial (ab-sin'thi-al), a. Of or pertaining to wormwood; hence, bitter. N. E. D.

absinthian (ab-sin'thi-an), a. Pertaining to or of the nature of wormwood.

Tempering absinthian bitterness with sweets.
Randolph, Poems (1652), p. 60.

absinthiate (ab-sin'thi-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. absinthiated, ppr. absinthiating. [< L. absinthiatus, pp. adj., containing wormwood, < absinthium: see absinthium.] 1. To impregnate with wormwood.—2. To saturate with absinthe.

Latinised English and absinthiated barrack-room morality. The Spectator, No. 3035, p. 1154.

absinthic (ab-sin'thik), a. Of or pertaining to absinthium or wormwood.—Absinthic acid, an acid derived from wormwood, probably identical with succinic acid.

absinthin (ab-sin'thin), n. The crystalline bitter principle ($C_{20}H_{28}O_4$) of wormwood, Artemisia Absinthium.

absinthine (ab-sin'thin), a. Having the qualities of absinth or wormwood; absinthic. Carlyle.

absinthism (ab-sin'thizm), n. The cachectic state produced by the use of absinthe (which see).

absinthium (ab-sin'thi-um), n. [L., < Gr. ἀψίνθιον, also ἄψινθος, wormwood, prob. of eastern origin.] The common wormwood, Artemisia Absinthium, a European species, much cultivated for its bitter qualities. It contains a volatile oil which is the principal ingredient in the French liqueur absinthe.

Artemisia Absinthium.
Leaf and flowering branch.

absinthol (ab-sin'thol), n. The chief constituent of oil of wormwood, $C_{10}H_{16}O$.

absis (ab'sis), n. Same as apsis.

absist† (ab-sist'), v. i. [< L. absistere, withdraw, < ab, off, + sistere, stand, a reduplicated form of stare, to stand: see state, stand.] To desist.

absistence† (ab-sis'tens), n. A standing off; a refraining or holding back.

absit (ab'sit), n. [L.; third pers. pres. subj. of abesse, be away.] In colleges, a leave of absence from commons.

absit omen (ab'sit ō'men). [L.; lit., may the omen be away: absit, third pers. pres. subj. of abesse, be away; omen, an omen: see absent and omen.] May it not be ominous! May the omen fail!

★absolute (ab'sō-lūt), a. and n. [< ME. absolut, < OF. absolut, < L. absolutus, complete, unrestricted, absolute, pp. of absolvere, loosen from: see absolve.] I. a. 1. Free from every restriction; unconditional: as, the only absolute necessity is logical necessity; absolute skepticism; absolute proof.—2. Perfect; complete; entire; possessed as a quality in the highest degree, or possessing the essential characteristics of the attribute named in the highest degree: as, absolute purity; absolute liberty.

What philosophical inquiry aims at is, to discover a proof, by subjective analysis, of a greater certainty in the law, of an inviolable uniformity in nature, of what may properly be called an absolute uniformity, if only the word absolute is used as opposed to incomplete or partial, and not as opposed to relative or phenomenal.
S. Hodgson, Phil. of Reflection, II. iv. § 1.

Hence—3. Perfect; free from imperfection: sometimes applied to persons.

May seem as shy, as grave, as just, as absolute
As Angelo. Shak., M. for M., v. 1.

So absolute she seems,
And in herself complete. Milton, P. L., viii. 547.

4. Fixed; determined; not merely provisional; irrevocable.

O, pass not, Lord, an absolute decree,
Nor bind thy sentence unconditional.
Dryden, Annus Mirabilis.

5. Viewed independently of other similar things; not considered with reference to other similar things as standards; not comparative merely: opposed to relative: as, absolute position; absolute velocity (see below). [Careful writers, without an explanation, or unless the context makes the meaning clear, do not use the word in this sense; so that, though it has always belonged to the word, it is considered as secondary.]

Such a code is that here called Absolute Ethics as distinguished from Relative Ethics—a code the injunctions of which are alone to be considered as absolutely right, in contrast with those that are relatively right or least wrong; and which, as a system of ideal conduct, is to serve as a standard for our guidance in solving, as well as we can, the problems of real conduct.
H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 104.

6. Unlimited in certain essential respects; arbitrary; despotic: applied especially to a system of government in which the will of the sovereign is comparatively unhampered by laws or usage: as, an absolute monarchy.

As Lord Chamberlain, I know, you are absolute by your office, in all that belongs to the decency and good manners of the stage. Dryden, Orig. and Prog. of Satire.

All absolute governments, of whatever form, concentrate power in one uncontrolled and irresponsible individual or body, whose will is regarded as the sense of the community. Calhoun, Works, I. 37.

7. Certain; infallible.

The colour of my hair—he cannot tell,
Or answers "dark," at random,—while, be sure,
He's absolute on the figure, five or ten,
Of my last subscription.
Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, iii.

8. Domineering; peremptory; exacting strict obedience.

Tapped on her head
With absolute forefinger. Mrs. Browning.

9. Ultimate; not derived from anything else: as, an absolute principle.—10. Immeasurable; not definable by measurement; not led up to by insensible gradations: as, the distinction between right and wrong is absolute.

The opposition is no longer of the rigid or absolute nature which it was before. A. Seth.

11. In gram., standing out of the usual syntactical relation or construction: applied to the case of a noun and an adjunct in no relation of dependence upon the rest of the sentence, and defining the time or circumstances of an action: as, the genitive absolute in Greek, the ablative absolute in Latin, the locative absolute in Sanskrit, and the nominative absolute in English.—Absolute alcohol. See alcohol.—Absolute atmosphere, an absolute unit of pressure, equal to one million times the pressure produced on a square centimeter by the force of one dyne; that is, by a force of one gram accelerated every second by a velocity of one centimeter per second.—Absolute ego, in metaph., the non-individual, pure ego, neither subject nor object, which, according to the German metaphysician J. G. Fichte, posits the world.—Absolute electrometer. See electrometer.—Absolute equation, in astron., the sum of the optic and eccentric equations, the former being the apparent inequality of a planet's motion in its orbit due to its unequal distance from the earth at different times, an effect which would subsist even if the planet's real motion were uniform, and the latter being the inequality due to a real lack of uniformity in the planet's motion.—Absolute estate, in law, an unqualified, unconditional estate, entitling the owner to immediate and unlimited possession and dominion.—Absolute form. See form.—Absolute identity, the metaphysical doctrine that mind and matter are phenomenal modifications of the same substance.—Absolute instrument, an instrument designed to measure electrical or other physical quantities in terms of absolute units. See unit.—Absolute invariant, in alg., an invariant entirely unchanged by a linear transformation of the quantic.—Absolute magnitude, magnitude without regard to sign, as plus or minus: opposed to algebraical magnitude.—Absolute measure, that which is based simply on the fundamental units of time, space, and mass, and does not involve a comparison with any other arbitrary quantity, especially not any gravitation-unit, whose value varies with the latitude and elevation above the sea. Thus, the absolute measure of a force is that of the velocity it would impart to the unit-mass in a unit of time. The units so derived are called absolute units; for example, the poundal or dyne. See unit.—Absolute position, position in absolute space.—Absolute pressure. (a) That measure of pressure which includes atmospheric pressure. (b) Pressure expressed in absolute measure, commonly in absolute atmospheres (which see).—Absolute problem, a qualitative problem in which it is sought to discover whether an object possesses a given character, but not to compare different objects.—Absolute proposition, in logic, a categorical proposition.—Absolute reality, in metaph., reality not as it is conceived, but as it exists independently of all thought about it.—Absolute reciprocant. See reciprocant.—Absolute space, space considered as the receptacle of things, and not as relative to the objects in it: opposed to spatial extension.—Absolute temperature, temperature measured from the absolute zero of temperature (see below) on the absolute or thermodynamic scale of temperature, which is defined by the condition that the area included between two fixed adiabatic lines and any two isothermal lines is proportional to the difference of temperatures for those lines on this scale. This absolute scale of temperature differs by very small quantities, usually negligible, from that of an air-thermometer, and by the absolute temperature is often meant the temperature on the latter scale above the absolute zero.—Absolute term. (a) In logic, a general class-name, as man, as opposed to a relative or connotative term. (b) In alg., that term of an equation or quantic in which the unknown quantity does not appear, or, if it appears, has the exponent 0. Thus, in the equation $x^2+12x-24=0$, which may also be written $x^2+12x-24x^0=0$, the term written -24 in the first form and $-24x^0$ in the second form is called the absolute term.—Absolute time, time regarded as a quasi-substance independent of the events it brings into relationship, that is, which occur in it.

Absolute, true, and mathematical time, in itself and its own nature out of relation to anything out of itself, flows equably, and is otherwise called duration: relative, apparent, and vulgar time is any sensible and external measure of duration by motion [whether accurate or inequable] which the vulgar use in place of true time, as an hour, a day, a month, a year.
Sir I. Newton, Principia (trans.), Def. 8, Scholium.

Absolute velocity, the velocity of a body with reference not to other moving bodies, but to something immovable.

We know nothing about absolute velocities in space, for we have no standard of comparison.
A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 15.

Absolute zero of temperature, the lowest possible temperature which the nature of matter admits; the temperature at which the particles whose motion constitutes heat would be at rest; that temperature at which, if it were maintained in the refrigerator of a perfect thermodynamic engine, the engine would convert all the heat it could receive from its source into work. This temperature lies 273 degrees below the zero of the centigrade scale. See absolute temperature.=Syn. 1. Unconditional, independent.—2. Finished, perfect, rounded, consummate, complete.—6. Arbitrary, autocratic, unrestricted, irresponsible.—7. Positive, decided, certain, sure.—8. Peremptory, imperative, dictatorial.—9. Immediate, direct, self-existent.

II. n. 1. In metaph.: (a) That which is free from any restriction, or is unconditioned; hence, the ultimate ground of all things; God: as, it is absurd to place a limit to the power of the Absolute.

Being itself, and the types which follow, as well as those of logic in general, may be looked upon as definitions of the Absolute, or metaphysical definitions of God: at least the first and third typical form in every triad may.
Hegel, Logic, tr. by Wallace, § 85.

The contention of those who declare the Absolute to be unknowable is, that beyond the sphere of knowable phenomena there is an Existent, which partially appears in the phenomena, but is something wholly removed from them, and in no way cognizable by us.
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. 430.

(b) That which is perfect or complete: as, its beauty approaches the absolute. (c) That which is independent of some or all relations; the non-relative.

The term absolute is of a twofold . . . ambiguity, corresponding to the double . . . signification of the word in Latin. Absolutum means what is freed or loosed; in which sense the absolute will be what is aloof from relation, comparison, limitation, condition, dependence, etc. In this meaning, the absolute is not opposed to the infinite. Absolutum means finished, perfected, completed; in which sense the absolute will be what is out of relation, etc., as finished, perfect, complete, total. . . . In this acceptation—and it is that in which for myself I exclusively use it—the absolute is diametrically opposed to, is contradictory of, the infinite.
Sir W. Hamilton, Discussions (3d ed.), p. 13, foot-note.

Whatever can be known or conceived out of all relation, that is to say, without any correlative being necessarily known or conceived along with it, is the known Absolute.
Ferrier, Institutes of Metaph., prop. xx.

2. In math., a locus whose projective relation to any two elements may be considered as constituting the metrical relation of these elements to one another. All measurement is made by successive superpositions of a unit upon parts of the quantity to be measured. Now, in all shiftings of the standard of measurement, if this be supposed to be rigidly connected with an unlimited continuum superposed upon that in which lies the measured quantity, there will be a certain locus which will always continue unmoved, and to which, therefore, the scale of measurement can never be applied. This is the absolute. In order to establish a system of measurement along a line, we first put a scale of numbers on the line in such a manner that to every point of the line corresponds one number, and to every number one point. If then we take any second scale of numbers related in this manner to the points of the line, to any number, x, of the first scale, will correspond just one number, y, of the second. If this correspondence extends to imaginary points, x and y will be connected by an equation linear in x and linear in y, which may be written thus: $xy+ax+by+c=0$. The scale will thus be shifted from $x=0$ to $y=0$ or $x=-c/a$. In this shifting, two points of the scale remain unmoved, namely, those which satisfy the equation $x^2+(a+b)x+c=0$. This pair of points, which may be really distinct, coincident, or imaginary, constitute the absolute. For a plane, the absolute is a curve of the second order and second class. For three-dimensional space it is a quadric surface. For the ordinary system of measurement in space, producing the Euclidean geometry, the absolute consists of two coincident planes joined along an imaginary circle, which circle is itself usually termed the absolute. See distance and anharmonic ratio.—Philosophies of the absolute, certain systems of metaphysics founded on Kant's Critique of Reason—most prominently those of Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel—which, departing from the principles of Kant, maintain that the absolute is cognizable.

absolutely (ab'sō-lūt-li), adv. Completely; wholly; independently; without restriction, limitation, or qualification; unconditionally; positively; peremptorily.

Command me absolutely not to go.
Milton, P. L., ix. 1156.

Absolutely we cannot discommend, we cannot absolutely approve, either willingness to live or forwardness to die.
Hooker, Eccl. Pol., v.

As a matter of fact, absolutely pure water is never found in the economy of nature. Huxley, Physiog., p. 115.

absoluteness (ab'sọ-lūt-nes), n. The state of being absolute; independence; completeness; the state of being subject to no extraneous restriction or control; positiveness; perfection.

If you have lived about, as the phrase is, you have lost that sense of the absoluteness and the sanctity of the habits of your fellow-patriots which once made you so happy in the midst of them.
H. James, Jr., Portraits of Places, p. 75.

absolution (ab-sọ-lū'shọn), n. [< ME. absolucium, -cion, -cioun, < L. absolutio(n-), < absolvere, loosen from: see absolve.] 1. The act of absolving, or the state of being absolved; release from consequences, obligations, or penalties; specifically, release from the penal consequences of sin.

God's absolution of men is his releasing of them from the bands of sin with which they were tied and bound.
Trench, Study of Words, p. 240.

(a) According to Rom. Cath. theol., a remission of sin, which the priest, on the ground of authority received from Christ, makes in the sacrament of penance (which see). "It is not a mere announcement of the gospel, or a bare declaration that God will pardon the sins of those who repent, but, as the Council of Trent defines it, is a judicial act by which a priest as judge passes a sentence on the penitent." Cath. Dict. (b) According to Prot. theol., a sacerdotal declaration assuring the penitent of divine forgiveness on the ground of his repentance and faith. In the Roman Catholic Church the priest pronounces the absolution in his own name: "I absolve thee." In Protestant communions that use a form of absolution, and in the Greek Church, it is pronounced in the name of God and as a prayer: "God [or Christ] absolve thee."

By absolution [in the Augsburg Confession] is meant the official declaration of the clergyman to the penitent that his sins are forgiven him upon finding or believing that he is exercising a godly sorrow, and is trusting in the blood of Christ. Shedd, Hist. of Christ. Doct.

2†. Abolition; abolishment.

But grant it true [that the Liturgy ordered too many ceremonies], not a total absolution, but a reformation thereof, may hence be inferred. Fuller, Ch. Hist., XI. x. 8.

3. In civil law, a sentence declaring an accused person to be innocent of the crime laid to his charge.—Absolution from censures (eccles.), the removal of penalties imposed by the church.—Absolution for the dead (eccles.), a short form of prayer for the repose of the soul, said after a funeral mass.—Absolutions in the breviary (eccles.), certain short prayers said before the lessons in matins, and before the chapter at the end of prime. = Syn. 1. Remission, etc. See pardon, n.

absolutism (ab'sọ-lū-tizm), n. [< absolute + -ism, after F. absolutisme = Pg. absolutismo.] 1. The state of being absolute. Specifically, in political science, that practice or system of government in which the power of the sovereign is unrestricted; a state so governed; despotism.

The province of absolutism is not to dispose of the national life, but to maintain it without those checks on the exercise of power which exist elsewhere.
Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, § 99.

From the time of its first conversion Germany has never taken kindly to the claims of absolutism, either of authority or of belief, so strongly put forward by the Church.
G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 310.

2. The principle of absolute individual power in government; belief in the unrestricted right of determination or disposal in a sovereign.—3. The theological doctrine of predestination or absolute decrees.—4. The metaphysical doctrines of the absolutists. = Syn. 1. Tyranny, Autocracy, Absolutism, etc. See despotism.

absolutist (ab'sọ-lū-tist), n. and a. [< absolute + -ist, after F. absolutiste.] I. n. 1. An advocate of despotism, or of absolute government.—2. In metaph., one who maintains that there is an absolute or non-relative existence, and that it is possible to know or conceive it.

Hence the necessity which compelled Schelling and the absolutists to place the absolute in the indifference of subject and object, of knowledge and existence.
Sir W. Hamilton.

II. a. Of or pertaining to absolutism; despotic; absolutistic.

Socialism would introduce, indeed, the most vexatious and all-encompassing absolutist government ever invented.
Rae, Cont. Socialism, p. 366.

All these things were odious to the old governing classes of France; their spirit was absolutist, ecclesiastical, and military. John Morley.

absolutistic (ab"sọ-lū-tis'tik), a. Of, pertaining to, or characterized by absolutism; characteristic of absolutists or absolutism.

But the spirit of the Roman empire was too absolutistic to abandon the prerogative of a supervision of public worship. Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, III. § 2.

absolutory (ab-sol'ū-tọ-ri), a. [< ML. absolutorius, < L. absolutus: see absolute.] Giving absolution; capable of absolving: as, "an absolutory sentence," Ayliffe, Parergon.

absolvable (ạb-sol'vạ-bl), a. Capable of being absolved; deserving of or entitled to absolution.

absolvatory (ạb-sol'vạ-tọ-ri), a. [Irreg. < absolve + -atory; prop. absolutory, q. v.] Conferring absolution, pardon, or release; having power to absolve.

absolve (ạb-solv'), v. t.; pret. and pp. absolved, ppr. absolving. [< L. absolvere, loosen from, < ab, from, + solvere, loosen: see solve, and cf. assoil.] 1. To set free or release, as from some duty, obligation, or responsibility.

No amount of erudition or technical skill or critical power can absolve the mind from the necessity of creating, if it would grow. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 104.

2. To free from the consequences or penalties attaching to actions; acquit; specifically, in eccles. language, to forgive or grant remission of sins; pronounce forgiveness of sins to.

The felon's latest breath
Absolves the innocent man who bears his crime.
Bryant, Hymn to Death.

I am just absolved,
Purged of the past, the foul in me, washed fair.
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 18.

3†. To accomplish; finish.

The work begun, how soon Absolved. Milton, P. L., vii. 94.

4†. To solve; resolve; explain.

We shall not absolve the doubt.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 10.

= Syn. 1. To free, release, excuse, liberate, exempt.—2. To acquit, excuse, clear, pardon, forgive, justify. See acquit.

absolver (ạb-sol'vẹr), n. One who absolves; one who remits sin, or pronounces it to be remitted.

absolvitor (ab-sol'vi-tọr), n. [Irreg. < L. absolvere: see absolve.] In law, a decree of absolution.—Decree of absolvitor, in Scots law, a decree in favor of the defendant in an action. A decree in favor of the pursuer or plaintiff is called a decree condemnator.

absolvitory (ab-sol'vi-tọ-ri), a. [See absolvatory.] Absolutory; absolvatory.

absonant (ab'sọ-nant), a. [< L. ab + sonan(t-)s: see sonant, and cf. absonous.] Wide from the purpose; contrary; discordant: opposed to consonant: as, "absonant to nature," Quarles, The Mourner. [Now rare.]

absonate† (ab'sọ-nāt), v. t. [For absoniate*, < ML. absoniatus, pp. of absoniare, avoid, lit. be discordant: see absonous.] To avoid; detest. Ash.

absonous† (ab'sọ-nus), a. [< L. absonus, discordant, < ab, from, + sonus, sound: see sound[5].] 1. Unmusical.—2. Figuratively, discordant; opposed; contrary: as, "absonous to our reason," Glanville, Scep. Sci., iv.

absorb (ạb-sôrb'), v. t. [< L. absorbēre, swallow down anything, < ab, away, + sorbēre, suck up, = Gr. ῥοφεῖν, sup up.] 1. To drink in; suck up; imbibe, as a sponge; take in by absorption, as the lacteals of the body; hence, to take up or receive in, as by chemical or molecular action, as when charcoal absorbs gases.

It is manifest, too, that there cannot be great self-mobility unless the absorbed materials are efficiently distributed to the organs which transform insensible motion into sensible motion. H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 2.

Every gas and every vapor absorbs exactly those kinds of rays which it emits when in the glowing condition, whilst it permits all other kinds of rays to traverse it with undiminished intensity. Lommel, Nature of Light, p. 164.

2†. To swallow up; engulf; overwhelm: as, the sea absorbed the wreck.

And dark oblivion soon absorbs them all.
Cowper, On Names in Biog. Brit.

3. To swallow up the identity or individuality of; draw in as a constituent part; incorporate: as, the empire absorbed all the small states.

A clear stream flowing with a muddy one,
Till in its onward current it absorbs . . .
The vexed eddies of its wayward brother.
Tennyson, Isabel.

4. To engross or engage wholly.

When a tremendous sound or an astounding spectacle absorbs the attention, it is next to impossible to think of anything else. H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 98.

The confirmed invalid is in danger of becoming absorbed in self. Whately, On Bacon's Ess. of Adversity.

5†. In med., to counteract or neutralize: as, magnesia absorbs acidity in the stomach.—Absorbing-well, a vertical excavation or shaft sunk in the earth to enable the surface-water to reach a permeable bed which is not saturated with water, and can therefore take up or absorb and carry off the water which has access to it from above. Such wells are sometimes called negative wells, waste-wells, and drain-wells; also, in the south of England, dead wells. The geological conditions favoring their use are rare; but they have occasionally been found practicable and convenient in connection with manufacturing establishments. = Syn. 4. To Absorb, Engross, Swallow up, Engulf, engage, arrest, rivet, fix. (See engross.) Absorb and engross denote the engagement of one's whole attention and energies by some object or occupation; but absorb commonly has connected with it the idea of mental passivity, engross that of mental activity. Thus, one is absorbed in a novel, but engrossed in business. The words, however, are sometimes used interchangeably. Swallow up and engulf have a much stronger figurative sense; engulf generally expresses misfortune.

absorbability (ạb-sôr-bạ-bil'i-ti), n. The state or quality of being absorbable.

absorbable (ạb-sôr'bạ-bl), a. Capable of being absorbed or imbibed.

absorbed (ạb-sôrbd'), p. a. 1. Drawn in or sucked up. Specifically applied to the coloring in paintings when the oil has sunk into the canvas, leaving the color flat and the touches dead or indistinct: nearly synonymous with sunk in.

2. Engrossed: as, an absorbed look.

absorbedly (ạb-sôr'bed-li), adv. In an absorbed manner.

absorbedness (ạb-sôr'bed-nes), n. The state of being absorbed, or of having the attention fully occupied.

absorbefacient (ab-sôr-bē-fā'shient), a. and n. [< L. absorbēre, absorb, + facien(t-)s, ppr. of facere, make.] I. a. Causing absorption.

II. n. Any substance causing absorption, as of a swelling. H. C. Wood, Therap.

absorbency (ạb-sôr'ben-si), n. Absorptiveness.

★absorbent (ạb-sôr'bent), a. and n. [< L. absorben(t-)s, ppr. of absorbēre: see absorb.] I. a. Absorbing or capable of absorbing; imbibing; swallowing; performing the function of absorption: as, absorbent vessels; the absorbent system.

"Absorption-bands" [in the spectrum] . . . indicate what kind of light has been stopped and extinguished by the absorbent object. A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 450.

Absorbent cotton. See cotton[1].—Absorbent gland. See gland.—Absorbent grounds, in painting, picture-grounds prepared, either on board or on canvas, so as to have the power of absorbing the redundant oil from the colors, for the sake of quickness in drying, or to increase the brilliancy of the colors.—Absorbent-strata water-power, a hydraulic device for utilizing the power of water passing through an absorbing-well. See absorbing-well, under absorb.

II. n. Anything which absorbs. Specifically—(a) In anat. and physiol., a vessel which imbibes or takes nutritive matters into the system; specifically, in the vertebrates, a lymphatic vessel (which see, under lymphatic). (b) In therapeutics: (1) any substance used to absorb a morbid or excessive discharge; (2) an alkali used to neutralize acids in the stomach. (c) In chem.: (1) anything that takes up into itself a gas or liquid, as a substance which withdraws moisture from the air; (2) a substance, such as magnesia, lime, etc., which neutralizes acids.

★absorber (ạb-sôr'bẹr), n. One who or that which absorbs.

Let us study the effect of using sodium vapour as the medium—not as a source of light, but as an absorber.
J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 39.

Schlösing has investigated the action of the ocean-water as an absorber and regulator of the carbonic acid gas in the atmosphere. Smithsonian Report, 1881, p. 266.

absorbing (ạb-sôr'bing), p. a. 1. Soaking up; imbibing; taking up.

If either light or radiant heat be absorbed, the absorbing body is warmed. Tyndall, Light and Elect., p. 76.

2. Engrossing; enchanting: as, the spectacle was most absorbing.

The total aspect of the place, its sepulchral stillness, its absorbing perfume of evanescence and decay and mortality, confounds the distinctions and blurs the details.
H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 334.

absorbingly (ạb-sôr'bing-li), adv. In an absorbing manner; engrossingly.

absorbition† (ab-sôr-bish'ọn), n. [Irreg. < absorb + -ition.] Absorption.

absorpt† (ab-sôrpt'), a. [< L. absorptus, pp. of absorbēre: see absorb.] Absorbed.

Circe in vain invites the feast to share,
Absent I wander and absorpt in care.
Pope, Odyssey, iv.

absorptiometer (ab-sôrp-shi-om'e-tẹr), n. [< L. absorptio, absorption, + Gr. μέτρον, a measure: see meter[2].] An instrument invented by Professor Bunsen to determine the amount of gas absorbed by a unit-volume of a liquid. It is a graduated tube in which a certain quantity of the gas and liquid is agitated over mercury. The amount of absorption is measured on the scale by the height to which the mercury presses up the liquid in the tube.

★absorption (ạb-sôrp'shọn), n. [< L. absorptio(n-), a drinking, < absorbēre: see absorb.] The act or process of absorbing, or the state of being absorbed, in all the senses of the verb: as—(a) The act or process of imbibing, swallowing, or engulfing mechanically. (b) The condition of having one's attention entirely occupied with something. (c) In chem. and phys., a taking in or reception by molecular or chemical action: as, absorption of gases, light, heat. See below.

We know the redness of the sun at evening arises, not from absorption by the ether, but from absorption by a great thickness of our atmosphere.
J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 30.

(d) In physiol., the process of taking up into the vascular system (venous or lymphatic) either food from the alimentary canal or inflammatory products and other substances from the various tissues. Plants absorb moisture and nutritive juices principally by their roots, but sometimes by their general surfaces, as in seaweeds, and carbonic acid by their leaves. Absorption of organic matter by leaves takes place in several insectivorous plants.—Absorption-bands, in spectrum analysis, dark bands in the spectrum more or less broad and in general not sharply defined. They are seen when the light has passed through a body not necessarily incandescent, and which may be a solid (as a salt of didymium), a liquid (as a solution of blood), or a vapor (as nitrous oxid, carbon-dioxid, or the aqueous vapor in the terrestrial atmosphere). See absorption-lines and spectrum.—Absorption of color, the phenomenon observed when certain colors are retained or prevented from passing through certain transparent bodies. Thus, pieces of colored glass are almost opaque to some parts of the spectrum, while allowing other colors to pass through freely. This is merely a special case of the absorption of light.—Absorption of gases, the action of some solids and liquids in taking up or absorbing gases. Thus, a porous body like charcoal (that is, one presenting a large surface) has the ability to take in, or condense on its surface, a large quantity of some gases through the molecular attraction exerted between its surface and the molecules of the gas, boxwood charcoal, for example, being able to absorb 90 times its volume of ammonia-gas. On account of this property, charcoal is used as a disinfectant to absorb noxious gases. (See occlusion.) Liquids also have the power to absorb or dissolve gases, the quantity absorbed varying with the nature of the liquid and the gas; it is also proportional to the pressure, and increases as the temperature is lowered. For example, at the ordinary temperature and pressure water absorbs its own volume of carbon dioxid; at a pressure of two atmospheres, two volumes are absorbed, and so on. If this additional pressure is relieved, the excess over one volume is liberated with effervescence, as in soda-water.—Absorption of heat, the action performed in varying degrees in different bodies—solids, liquids, and gases—of stopping radiant heat, as a result of which their own temperature is more or less raised. For example, rock-salt and carbon disulphid absorb but little radiant heat, that is, are nearly diathermanous. On the other hand, alum and water arrest a large portion of it, that is, are comparatively athermanous.

The waves of ether once generated may so strike against the molecules of a body exposed to their action as to yield up their motion to the latter; and in this transfer of the motion from the ether to the molecules consists the absorption of radiant heat. Tyndall, Radiation, § 2.

Absorption of light, that action of an imperfectly transparent or opaque body by which some portion of an incident pencil of light is stopped within the body, while the rest is either transmitted through it or reflected from it. It is owing to this action that, for example, a certain thickness of pure water shows a greenish color, of glass a bluish-green color, etc.—Absorption-lines, in spectrum analysis, dark lines produced in an otherwise continuous spectrum by the absorption of relatively cool vapors through which the light has passed. When light passes through a vapor which, when luminous, gives a bright-lined spectrum, but is cooler than the source, the vapor absorbs just those rays which it can emit. Thus when a flame containing sodium vapor is interposed before a lime-light, the latter shows a continuous spectrum crossed by dark lines replacing the bright lines due to the sodium vapor alone. The solar spectrum shows a multitude of dark lines, due to the absorption of the solar atmosphere, and in part also to that of the earth.—Absorption-spectrum, a spectrum with absorption-lines or -bands.—Cutaneous or external absorption, in med., the process by which certain substances, when placed in contact with a living surface, produce the same effects upon the system as when taken into the stomach or injected into the veins, only in a less degree. Thus, arsenic, when applied to an external wound, will sometimes affect the system as rapidly as when introduced into the stomach; and mercury, applied externally, excites salivation.—Interstitial absorption. See interstitial.

absorptive (ab-sôrp'tiv), a. [< F. absorptif, < L. as if absorptivus,* < absorbēre: see absorb.] Having power to absorb or imbibe; causing absorption; absorbent.

The absorptive power of a substance may not be so extensive as to enable it to absorb and extinguish light-rays or heat-rays of all kinds; it may arrest some only.
A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 449.

absorptiveness (ab-sôrp'tiv-nes), n. The quality of being absorptive; absorptivity.

absorptivity (ab-sôrp-tiv'i-ti), n. The power or capacity of absorption. [Rare.]

The absorptivity inherent in organic beings. J. D. Dana.

absquatulate (ab-skwot'ū-lāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. absquatulated, ppr. absquatulating. [A feigned word, of American origin, simulating a L. derivation. Cf. abscond, ambulate.] To run away; abscond; make off. [Slang.]

absque hoc (abz'kwē hok). [L., without this (or that): absque, without, < abs, off, from, with generalizing suffix -que; hoc, abl. of hic, this, that.] Without this or that: specifically used, in law, in traversing what has been alleged and is repeated.

absque tali causa (abz'kwē tā'lī kâ'zä). [L.: absque, without; tali, abl. of talis, such; causa, abl. of causa, cause.] Without such cause: a phrase used in law.

abs. re. In law, an abbreviation of Latin absente reo (which see), the defendant being absent.

abstain (ab-stān'), v. [< ME. abstainen, absteinen, abstenen, < OF. abstener, abstenir, astenir, F. abstenir, refl., < L. abstinēre, abstain, < abs, off, + tenēre, hold: see tenable. Cf. contain, attain, detain, pertain, retain, sustain.] I. intrans. To forbear or refrain voluntarily, especially from what gratifies the passions or appetites: used with from: as, to abstain from the use of ardent spirits; to abstain from luxuries.

Abstain from meats offered to idols. Acts xv. 29.

To walk well, it is not enough that a man abstains from dancing. De Quincey, Herodotus.

II.† trans. To hinder; obstruct; debar; cause to keep away from: as, "abstain men from marrying," Milton.

abstainer (ab-stā'nėr), n. One who abstains; specifically, one who abstains from the use of intoxicating liquors; a teetotaler.

abstainment (ab-stān'mėnt), n. The act of abstaining; abstention.

abstemious (ab-stē'mi-us), a. [< L. abstemius, < abs, from, + a supposed temum,* strong drink, > temetum, strong drink, and temulentus, drunken.] 1. Sparing in diet; moderate in the use of food and drink; temperate; abstinent.

Under his special eye
Abstemious I grew up, and thriv'd amain.
Milton, S. A., l. 637.

Instances of longevity are chiefly among the abstemious.
Arbuthnot, Nat. and Choice of Aliments.

Abstemious, refusing luxuries, not sourly and reproachfully, but simply as unfit for his habit.
Emerson, Misc., p. 261.

2. Restricted; very moderate and plain; very sparing; spare: opposed to luxurious or rich: as, an abstemious diet.—3. Devoted to or spent in abstemiousness or abstinence: as, an abstemious life.

Till yonder sun descend, O let me pay
To grief and anguish one abstemious day.
Pope, Iliad, xix. 328.

4. Promoting or favoring abstemiousness; associated with temperance. [Rare.]

Such is the virtue of th' abstemious well.
Dryden, Fables.

abstemiously (ab-stē'mi-us-li), adv. In an abstemious manner; temperately; with a sparing use of meat or drink.

abstemiousness (ab-stē'mi-us-nes), n. The quality or habit of being temperate, especially in the use of food and drink.=Syn. Abstemiousness, Abstinence, Temperance, Sobriety, soberness, moderation, temperateness. (See sobriety.) The italicized words denote voluntary abstention from objects of desire, most commonly abstention from food or drink, regarded either as an act or as an element in character. Abstemiousness, by derivation and earlier use, suggests abstinence from wine; but it has lost this special sense, and now generally signifies habitual moderation in the gratification of the appetites and desires; abstinence is simply the refraining from gratification, and may be applied to a single act. They both suggest self-denial, while temperance and sobriety suggest wisdom, balance of mind, and propriety. Temperance suggests self-control, the measure of abstention being proportioned to the individual's idea of what is best in that respect. Hence, abstinence and temperance often stand in popular use for total abstinence from intoxicating drink.

Knowing the abstemiousness of Italians everywhere, and seeing the hungry fashion in which the islanders clutched our gifts and devoured them, it was our doubt whether any of them had ever experienced perfect repletion. Howells, Venetian Life, xii.

If twenty came and sat in my house, there was nothing said about dinner, . . . but we naturally practised abstinence. Thoreau, Walden, p. 154.

The rule of "not too much," by temperance taught.
Milton, P. L., xi. 531.

abstention (ab-sten'shọn), n. [< L. abstentio(n-), < abstinēre: see abstain.] A holding off or refraining; abstinence from action; neglect or refusal to do something.

As may well be supposed, this abstention of our light cavalry was observed by the Russians with surprise and thankfulness. Kinglake.

Thus the act [of nursing] is one that is to both exclusively pleasurable, while abstention entails pain on both.
H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 102.

abstentionist (ab-sten'shọn-ist), n. One who practises or is in favor of abstention, as from the act of voting, from eating flesh, etc.

abstentious (ab-sten'shus), a. [< abstention + -ous. Cf. contentious, etc.] Characterized by abstention. Farrar.

abster† (ab-stėr'), v. t. [< L. absterrēre, frighten from, < abs, from, + terrēre, frighten: see terrible.] To frighten off; deter; hinder.

So this in like manner should abster and fear me and mine from doing evil. Becon, Christmas Banquet.

absterge (ab-stėrj'), v. t.; pret. and pp. absterged, ppr. absterging. [< L. abstergēre, wipe off, < abs, off, + tergēre, wipe: see terse.] 1. To wipe, or make clean by wiping; wash away.

Baths are used to absterge, belike, that fulsomeness of sweat to which they are there subject.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 286.

2. In med.: (a) To cleanse by lotions, as a wound or ulcer. (b) To purge. See deterge.

abstergent (ab-stėr'jent), a. and n. [< L. abstergen(t-)s, ppr. of abstergēre: see absterge.] I. a. Having cleansing or purgative properties.

II. n. 1. Anything that aids in scouring or cleansing, as soap or fuller's earth.—2. In med., a lotion or other application for cleansing a sore: in this sense nearly superseded by detergent.

abstergify†, v. t. or i. [Improp. < L. abstergēre (see absterge) + E. -fy.] To cleanse.

Specially when wee would abstergifie, and that the huske remains behind in the boiling of it.
Benvenuto, Passengers' Dialogues.

absterse (ab-stėrs'), v. t.; pret. and pp. abstersed, ppr. abstersing. [< L. abstersus, pp. of abstergēre: see absterge.] To absterge; cleanse; purify. Sir T. Browne. [Rare.]

abstersion (ab-stėr'shọn), n. [< L. abstersio(n-),* < abstergēre, pp. abstersus: see absterge.] 1. The act of wiping clean: as, "ablution and abstersion," Scott, Waverley, xx.—2. In med., a cleansing by substances which remove foulness from about sores, or humors or obstructions from the system.

Abstersion is plainly a scouring off or incision of the more viscous humours, and making the humours more fluid; and cutting between them and the part.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 42.

abstersive (ab-stėr'siv), a. and n. [= F. abstersif, < L. abstersivus,* < abstergēre, pp. abstersus: see absterge.] I. a. Cleansing; having the quality of removing foulness. See detersive.

The seats with purple clothe in order due,
And let the abstersive sponge the board renew.
Pope, Odyssey, xx. 189.

A tablet stood of that abstersive tree
Where Æthiop's swarthy bird did build her nest.
Sir J. Denham, Chess.

II. n. That which effects abstersion; that which purifies.

Abstersives are fuller's earth, soap, linseed-oil, and oxgall. Petty, in Sprat's Hist. Royal Soc., p. 295.

abstersiveness (ab-stėr'siv-nes), n. The quality of being abstersive or abstergent.

A caustick or a healing faculty, abstersiveness, and the like. Boyle, Works, II. 117.

★abstinence (ab'sti-nens), n. [< ME. abstinence, < OF. abstinence, astinence, astenance, < L. abstinentia, < abstinen(t-)s, ppr. of abstinēre: see abstinent.] 1. In general, the act or practice of voluntarily refraining from the use of something or from some action; abnegation.

Since materials are destroyed as such by being once used, the whole of the labour required for their production, as well as the abstinence of the persons who supplied the means for carrying it on, must be remunerated.
J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ.

More specifically—2. The refraining from indulgence in the pleasures of the table, or from customary gratifications of the senses or the intellect, either partially or wholly.

Against diseases here the strongest fence
Is the defensive virtue abstinence. Herrick.

Men flew to frivolous amusements and to criminal pleasures with the greediness which long and enforced abstinence naturally produces. Macaulay.

3. In a still narrower sense—(a) Forbearance from the use of alcoholic liquors as a beverage: in this sense usually preceded by the adjective total. (b) Eccles., the refraining from certain kinds of food or drink on certain days, as from flesh on Fridays.—Day of abstinence, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., a day on which it is forbidden to eat flesh-meat. A fasting-day limits to one full meal, and commonly includes abstinence.=Syn. Abstemiousness, Abstinence, Temperance, etc. See abstemiousness.

abstinency (ab'sti-nen-si), n. The habit or practice of abstaining or refraining, especially from food. [Rare.]

abstinent (ab'sti-nent), a. and n. [< ME. abstinent, < OF. abstinent, astinent, astenant, < L. abstinen(t-)s, ppr. of abstinēre, abstain: see abstain.] I. a. Refraining from undue indulgence, especially in the use of food and drink; characterized by moderation; abstemious.

II. n. 1. One who abstains or is abstinent; an abstainer.

Very few public men, for instance, care to order a bottle of wine at a public table. It is not because they are total abstinents. Harper's Mag., LXV. 633.

2. [cap.] One of a sect which appeared in France and Spain in the third century. The Abstinents opposed marriage, condemned the eating of flesh, and placed the Holy Spirit in the class of created beings.

abstinently (ab'sti-nent-li), adv. In an abstinent manner; with abstinence.

abstorted† (ab-stôr'ted), p. a. [< L. abs, away, + tortus, pp. of torquēre, twist: see tort and torture.] Forced away. Phillips, 1662.

★abstract (ab-strakt'), v. [< L. abstractus, pp. of abstrahere, draw away, < abs, away, + trahere, draw: see track, tract.] I. trans. 1. To draw away; take away; withdraw or remove, whether to hold or to get rid of the object withdrawn: as, to abstract one's attention; to abstract a watch from a person's pocket, or money from a bank. [In the latter use, a euphemism for steal or purloin.]

Thy furniture of radiant dye
Abstracts and ravishes the curious eye.
King, Rufinus, l. 257.

Abstract what others feel, what others think,
All pleasures sicken, and all glories sink.
Pope, Essay on Man, iv. 45.

In truth the object and the sensation are the same thing, and cannot therefore be abstracted from each other.
Berkeley, Prin. of Human Knowl. (1710), i. ¶ 5.

2. To consider as a form apart from matter; attend to as a general object, to the neglect of special circumstances; derive as a general idea from the contemplation of particular instances; separate and hold in thought, as a part of a complex idea, while letting the rest go. This meaning of the Latin abstrahere, with the corresponding meaning of abstractio, first appears toward the end of the great dispute between the nominalists and realists in the twelfth century. The invention of these terms may be said to embody the upshot of the controversy. They are unquestionably translations of the Greek ἀφαιρεῖν and ἀφαίρεσις, though we cannot say how these Greek terms became known in the West so early. The earliest passage is the following: "We say those thoughts (intellectus) are by abstraction (per abstractionem), which either contemplate the nature of any form in itself without regard to the subject matter, or think any nature indifferently (indifferenter), apart, that is, from the difference of its individuals. . . . On the other hand, we may speak of subtraction, when any one endeavors to contemplate the nature of any subject essence apart from all form. Either thought, however, the abstracting as well as the subtracting, seems to conceive the thing otherwise than it exists." De Intellectibus, in Cousin's Fragments Philosophiques (2d ed.), p. 481. This old literature having been long forgotten, an erroneous idea of the origin of the term arose. "Abstraction means etymologically the active withdrawal of attention from one thing in order to fix it on another thing." Sully. [This plausible but false notion gave rise to the phrase to abstract (intrans.) from. See below.]

3. To derive or obtain the idea of.

And thus from divers accidents and acts
Which do within her observation fall
The goddesses and powers divine abstracts,
As Nature, Fortune, and the Virtues all.
Sir J. Davies.

4. To select or separate the substance of, as a book or writing; epitomize or reduce to a summary.

The great world in a little world of fancy
Is here abstracted.
Ford, Fancies Chaste and Noble, ii. 2.

Let us abstract them into brief compends.
Watts, Imp. of Mind.

5†. To extract: as, to abstract spirit. Boyle.

= Syn. 2. To disengage, isolate, detach.—4. See abridge.

II. intrans. To form abstractions; separate ideas; distinguish between the attribute and the subject in which it exists: as, "brutes abstract not," Locke.

Thus the common consciousness lives in abstraction, though it has never abstracted. E. Caird, Hegel, p. 159.

To abstract from, to withdraw the attention from, as part of a complex idea, in order to concentrate it upon the rest.

I noticed the improper use of the term abstraction by many philosophers, in applying it to that on which the attention is converged. This we may indeed be said to prescind, but not to abstract. Thus, let A, B, C be three qualities of an object. We prescind A, in abstracting from B and C, but we cannot without impropriety say that we abstract A. Hamilton, Lectures on Metaph., xxxv.

[This is all founded on a false notion of the origin of the term. See above.]

abstract (ab'strakt), a. and n. [< L. abstractus, pp. of abstrahere: see abstract, v. As a philosophical term, it is a translation of Gr. τὰ ἐξ ἀφαιρέσεως.] I. a. 1. Conceived apart from matter and from special cases: as, an abstract number, a number as conceived in arithmetic, not a number of things of any kind. Originally applied to geometrical forms (the metaphor being that of a statue hewn from a stone), and down to the twelfth century restricted exclusively to mathematical forms and quantities. (Isidorus, about A. D. 600, defines abstract number.) It is now applied to anything of a general nature which is considered apart from special circumstances: thus, abstract right is what ought to be done independently of instituted law. [The phrase in the abstract is preferable to the adjective in this sense.]

Abstract natures are as the alphabet or simple letters whereof the variety of things consisteth; or as the colours mingled in the painter's shell, wherewith he is able to make infinite variety of faces and shapes.
Bacon, Valerius Maximus, xiii.

Abstract calculations, in questions of finance, are not to be relied on. A. Hamilton, Works, I. 129.

Consider the positive science of Crystallography, and presently it appears that the mineralogist is studying the abstract Crystal, its geometrical laws and its physical properties.
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, I. i. § 61.

2. In gram. (since the thirteenth century), applied specially to that class of nouns which are formed from adjectives and denote character, as goodness, audacity, and more generally to all nouns that do not name concrete things. Abstract in this sense is a prominent term in the logic of Occam and of the English nominalists.

Of the name of the thing itself, by a little change or wresting, we make a name for that accident which we consider; and for "living" put into the account "life"; for "moved," "motion"; for "hot," "heat"; for "long," "length"; and the like: and all such names are the names of the accidents and properties by which one matter and body is distinguished from another. These are called "names abstract," because severed, not from matter, but from the account of matter. Hobbes, Leviathan, i. 4.

A mark is needed to shew when the connotation is dropped. A slight mark put upon the connotative term answers the purpose; and shews when it is not meant that anything should be connoted. In regard to the word black, for example, we merely annex to it the syllable ness; and it is immediately indicated that all connotation is dropped: so in sweetness, hardness, dryness, lightness. The new words, so formed, are the words which have been denominated abstract; as the connotative terms from which they are formed have been denominated concrete; and as these terms are in frequent use, it is necessary that the meaning of them should be well remembered. It is now also manifest what is the real nature of abstract terms; a subject which has in general presented such an appearance of mystery. They are simply the concrete terms with the connotation dropped.
James Mill, Analysis of the Human Mind, ix.

Why not say at once that the abstract name is the name of the attribute? J. S. Mill.

3†. Having the mind drawn away from present objects, as in ecstasy and trance; abstracted: as, "abstract as in a trance," Milton, P. L., viii. 462.—4. Produced by the mental process of abstraction: as, an abstract idea. Under this head belong two meanings of abstract which can hardly be considered as English, though they are sometimes used by writers influenced by the German language. They are—(a) General; having relatively small logical comprehension; wide; lofty; indeterminate. This is the usual meaning of abstract in German; but its establishment in English would greatly confuse our historical terminology. (b) Resulting from analytical thought; severed from its connections; falsified by the neglect of important considerations. This is the Hegelian meaning of the word, carrying with it a tacit condemnation of the method of analytical mechanics and of all application of mathematics.

5. Demanding a high degree of mental abstraction; difficult; profound; abstruse: as, highly abstract conceptions; very abstract speculations.—6. Applied to a science which deals with its object in the abstract: as, abstract logic; abstract mathematics: opposed to applied logic and mathematics.—7. Separated from material elements; ethereal; ideal.

Love's not so pure and abstract as they use
To say, which have no mistress but their muse.
Donne, Poems, p. 27.

Abstract arithmetic. See arithmetic, 2.

II. n. 1. That which concentrates in itself the essential qualities of anything more extensive or more general, or of several things; the essence; specifically, a summary or epitome containing the substance, a general view, or the principal heads of a writing, discourse, series of events, or the like.

You shall find there
A man who is the abstract of all faults
That all men follow. Shak., A. and C., i. 4.

This is but a faint abstract of the things which have happened since. D. Webster, Bunker Hill Monument.

2. That portion of a bill of quantities, an estimate, or an account which contains the summary of the various detailed articles.—3. In phar., a dry powder prepared from a drug by digesting it with suitable solvents, and evaporating the solution so obtained to complete dryness at a low temperature (122° F.). It is twice as strong as the drug or the fluid extract, and about ten times as strong as the tincture.

4. A catalogue; an inventory. [Rare.]

He hath an abstract for the remembrance of such places and goes to them by his note. Shak., M. W. of W., iv. 2.

5. In gram., an abstract term or noun.

The concrete "like" has its abstract "likeness"; the concretes "father" and "son" have, or might have, the abstracts "paternity" and "filiety" or "filiation."
J. S. Mill.

Abstract of title, in law, an epitome or a short statement of the successive title-deeds or other evidences of ownership of an estate, and of the encumbrances thereon.—In the abstract [L. in abstracto], conceived apart from matter or special circumstances; without reference to particular applications; in its general principles or meanings.

Were all things red, the conception of colour in the abstract could not exist. H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 46.

Be the system of absolute religious equality good or bad, pious or profane, in the abstract, neither churchmen nor statesmen can afford to ignore the question, How will it work? H. N. Ozenham, Short Studies, p. 401.

= Syn. 1. Abridgment, Compendium, Epitome, Abstract, etc. See abridgment.

abstracted (ab-strak'ted), p. a. 1. Refined; exalted: as, "abstracted spiritual love," Donne.—2. Difficult; abstruse; abstract. Johnson.—3. Absent in mind; absorbed; inattentive to immediate surroundings.

And now no more the abstracted ear attends
The water's murmuring lapse.
T. Warton, Melancholy, v. 179.

Thy dark vague eyes, and soft abstracted air.
M. Arnold, Scholar-Gipsy.

= Syn. 3. Absent, Inattentive, Abstracted, etc. See absent.

abstractedly (ab-strak'ted-li), adv. 1. In an abstracted or absent manner.—2. In the abstract; in a separated state, or in contemplation only.

It may indeed be difficult for those who have but little faith in the invisible . . . to give up their own power of judging what seems best, from the belief that that only is best which is abstractedly right.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 57.

abstractedness (ab-strak'ted-nes), n. The state of being abstracted; abstractness: as, "the abstractedness of these speculations," Hume, Human Understanding, § 1.

Advance in representativeness of thought makes possible advance in abstractedness: particular properties and particular relations become thinkable apart from the things displaying them.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 493.

abstracter (ab-strak'tėr), n. 1. One who abstracts or takes away.—2. One who makes an abstract or summary.

The London Chemical Society, a few years ago, issued to the abstracters for its journal a series of instructions on chemical nomenclature and notation. Science, VI. 369.

★abstraction (ab-strak'shon), n. [< LL. abstractio(n-), < L. abstrahere: see abstract, v.] 1. The act of taking away or separating; the act of withdrawing, or the state of being withdrawn; withdrawal, as of a part from a whole, or of one thing from another. Rarely applied to the physical act of taking or removing except in a derogatory sense: as, the abstraction (dishonest removal, larceny) of goods from a warehouse.

A hermit wishes to be praised for his abstraction [that is, his withdrawal from society]. Pope, Letters.

The sensation of cold is really due to an abstraction of heat from our own bodies.
W. L. Carpenter, Energy in Nature, p. 41.

Wordsworth's better utterances have the bare sincerity, the absolute abstraction from time and place, the immunity from decay, that belong to the grand simplicities of the Bible. Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 246.

2. The act of abstracting or concentrating the attention on a part of a complex idea and neglecting the rest or supposing it away; especially, that variety of this procedure by which we pass from a more to a less determinate concept, from the particular to the general; the act or process of refining or sublimating.

The mind makes the particular ideas, received from particular objects, to become general; which is done by considering them as they are in the mind such appearances, separate from all other existences, and the circumstances of real existence, as time, place, or any other concomitant ideas. This is called abstraction, whereby ideas, taken from particular beings, become general representatives of all of the same kind.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xi. § 9.

To be plain, I own myself able to abstract in one sense, as when I consider some particular parts or qualities separated from others, with which, though they are united in some object, yet it is possible they may really exist without them. But I deny that I can abstract one from another, or conceive separately, those qualities which it is impossible should exist so separated; or that I can frame a general notion by abstracting from particulars in the manner aforesaid. Which two last are the proper acceptations of abstraction.
Berkeley, Prin. of Human Knowl., Int., ¶ 10.

The active mental process by which concepts are formed is commonly said to fall into three stages, comparison, abstraction, and generalization. . . . When things are widely unlike one another, as for example different fruits, as a strawberry, a peach, and so on, we must, in order to note the resemblance, turn the mind away from the differences of form, colour, etc. This is the difficult part of the operation. Great differences are apt to impress the mind, and it requires a special effort to turn aside from them and to keep the mind directed to the underlying similarity. This effort is known as abstraction.

Sully, Outlines of Psychology, ix.

This was an age of vision and mystery; and every work was believed to contain a double or secondary meaning. Nothing escaped this eccentric spirit of refinement and abstraction. T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry.

3. A concept which is the product of an abstracting process; a metaphysical concept; hence, often, an idea which cannot lead to any practical result; a theoretical, impracticable notion; a formality; a fiction of metaphysics.

Ariel, delicate as an abstraction of the dawn and vesper sunlight, flies around the shipwrecked men to console them. A. H. Welsh, Eng. Lit., I. 388.

Tangents, sines, and cosines are not things found isolated in Nature, but, because they are abstractions from realities, they are applicable to Nature.
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, I. i. § 71.

The arid abstractions of the schoolmen were succeeded by the fanciful visions of the occult philosophers.
I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 285.

4. Inattention to present objects; the state of being engrossed with any matter to the exclusion of everything else; absence of mind: as, a fit of abstraction.

Keep your hoods about the face;
They do so that affect abstraction here.
Tennyson, Princess, ii.

The tank was nearly five feet deep, and on several occasions I narrowly escaped an involuntary bath as I entered my room in moments of abstraction.
O'Donovan, Merv, xi.

5. In distillation, the separation of volatile parts from those which are fixed. It is chiefly used with relation to a fluid that is repeatedly poured upon any substance in a retort and distilled off, to change its state or the nature of its composition.—Abstraction from singulars but not from matter, in the Scotist logic, the degree of abstraction required to form such a concept as that of a white man, where we cease to think of the individual man, but yet continue to attend to the color, which is a material passion.—Concrete abstraction. Same as partial abstraction.—Divisive abstraction. Same as negative abstraction.—Formal abstraction, the mental act of abstraction, as distinguished from the resulting concept.—Intentional abstraction, mental abstraction; separation in thought.—Logical abstraction, that process of abstractive thought which produces a general concept.—Mathematical abstraction, the act of thinking away color, etc., so as to gain pure geometrical conceptions.—Metaphysical abstraction, a process of abstraction carried further than the mathematical.—Minor abstraction, a kind of abstraction involved in sensuous perception, according to the Thomists.—Negative abstraction, separation of one concept from another in the sense of denying one of the other.—Objective abstraction, the concept produced by the act of abstracting.—Partial abstraction, the imagining of some sensible thing deprived of some extensive part, as a man without a head.—Physical abstraction, abstraction from singulars; that grade of abstraction required in physics.—Precisive abstraction, the thinking of a part of a complex idea to the neglect of the rest, but without denying in thought those predicates not thought of.—Real abstraction, the real separation of one thing from another, as the (supposed) abstraction of the soul from the body in ecstasy.

abstractional (ab-strak'shon-al), a. Pertaining to abstraction. H. Bushnell.

abstractionist (ab-strak'shon-ist), n. One who occupies himself with abstractions; an idealist; a dreamer.

The studious class are their own victims: . . . they are abstractionists, and spend their days and nights in dreaming some dream. Emerson, Montaigne.

abstractitious† (ab-strak-tish'us), a. [< L. as if abstractitius*: see abstract, v.] Abstracted or drawn from other substances, particularly from vegetables, without fermentation. Bailey.

abstractive (ab-strak'tiv), a. [= F. abstractif, < L. as if abstractivus*, < abstractus, pp.: see abstract, v.] 1. Pertaining to abstraction; having the power or quality of abstracting. 2. Pertaining to or of the nature of an abstract, epitome, or summary. 3†. Abstractitious. —Abstractive cognition, cognition of an object not as present.

The names given in the schools to the immediate and mediate cognitions were intuitive and abstractive, meaning by the latter term, not merely what we with them call abstract knowledge, but also the representations of concrete objects in the imagination and memory.
Sir W. Hamilton, Lectures on Metaph., xxiii.

abstractively (ab-strak'tiv-li), adv. In an abstractive manner; in or by itself; abstractly. [Rare or obsolete.]

That life which abstractively is good, by accidents and adherences may become unfortunate.
Feltham, Resolves, ii. 186.

abstractiveness (ab-strak'tiv-nes), n. The property or quality of being abstractive. [Rare.]

abstractly (ab'strakt-li), adv. In an abstract manner or state; absolutely; in a state or manner unconnected with anything else; in or by itself: as, matter abstractly considered.

abstractness (ab'strakt-nes), n. The state or quality of being abstract; a state of being in contemplation only, or not connected with any object: as, "the abstractness of the ideas themselves," Locke, Human Understanding.

abstrahent (ab'stra-hent), a. [< L. abstrahen(t-)s, ppr. of abstrahere, draw away: see abstract, v.] Abstract, as concepts; abstracting from unessential elements.

abstrich (ab'strik; G. pron. äp'strich), n. [G., < abstreichen, wipe off: see off and strike.] Literally, that which is cleaned or scraped off. Technically, in metal., the dark-brown material which appears on the surface of lead in a cupeling-furnace, and becomes pure litharge as the process goes on. Abzug is a nearly equivalent term.

abstricted† (ab-strik'ted), a. [< L. as if abstrictus*, pp. of abstringere*: see abstringe and strict.] Unbound; loosened. Bailey.

abstriction (ab-strik'shon), n. [< L. as if abstrictio(n-), < abstrictus, pp.: see abstricted.] 1. The act of unbinding or loosening. [Obsolete and rare.]—2. In bot., a method of cell-formation in some of the lower cryptogams, differing from ordinary cell-division in the occurrence of a decided constriction of the walls at the place of division.

abstringe† (ab-strinj'), v. t. [< L. as if abstringere*, < abs, from, + stringere, bind: see stringent.] To unbind.

abstrude (ab-strödʹ), v. t.; pret. and pp. abstruded, ppr. abstruding. [< L. abstrudere, throw away, conceal, < abs, away, + trudere, thrust, push (= E. threaten, q. v.), remotely akin to E. thrust, q. v.: see also abstruse.] To thrust away. Bailey; Johnson.

abstruse (ab-strösʹ), a. [< L. abstrusus, hidden, concealed, pp. of abstrudere, conceal, thrust away: see abstrude.] 1†. Withdrawn from view; out of the way; concealed.

Hidden in the most abstruse dungeons of Barbary.
Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, I. iv. 15.

2. Remote from comprehension; difficult to be apprehended or understood; profound; occult; esoteric: opposed to obvious.

It must be still confessed that there are some mysteries in religion, both natural and revealed, as well as some abstruse points in philosophy, wherein the wise as well as the unwise must be content with obscure ideas.
Watts, Logic, iii. 4.

The higher heathen religions, like the Egyptian religion, Brahmanism, and Buddhism, are essentially abstruse, and only capable of being intelligently apprehended by speculative intellects. Faiths of the World, p. 349.

abstrusely (ab-strösʹli), adv. In an abstruse or recondite manner; in a manner not to be easily understood.

abstruseness (ab-strösʹnes), n. The state or quality of being abstruse, or difficult to be understood; difficulty of apprehension.

abstrusion (ab-strösʹzhon), n. [< L. abstrusio(n-), a removing, a concealing, < abstrudere: see abstrude.] The act of thrusting away. [Rare.]

abstrusity (ab-strösʹi-ti), n.; pl. abstrusities (-tiz). [< abstruse + -ity.] Abstruseness; that which is abstruse. [Rare.]

Matters of difficulty and such which were not without abstrusities. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vii. 13.

absume† (ab-sūmʹ), v. t. [< L. absūmere, take away, diminish, consume, destroy, < ab, away, + sūmere, take: see assume.] To bring to an end by a gradual waste; consume; destroy; cause to disappear. Boyle.

absumption† (ab-sump'shon), n. [< L. absumptio(n-), a consuming, < absūmere, pp. absumptus, consume: see absume.] Decline; disappearance; destruction.

The total defect or absumption of religion.
Bp. Gauden, Eccl. Ang. Susp.

absurd (ab-sėrdʹ), a. and n. [= F. absurde = Sp. Pg. absurdo = It. assurdo, < L. absurdus, harsh-sounding, inharmonious, absurd; a word of disputed origin: either (1) 'out of tune,' < ab, away, from, + surdus*, sounding, from a root found in Skt. √svar, sound, and in E. (Gr.) siren, q. v.; or (2) < ab- (intensive) + surdus, indistinct, dull, deaf, > E. surd, q. v.] I. a. 1. Being or acting contrary to common sense or sound judgment; inconsistent with common sense; ridiculous; nonsensical: as, an absurd statement; absurd conduct; an absurd fellow.

There was created in the minds of many of these enthusiasts a pernicious and absurd association between intellectual power and moral depravity.
Macaulay, Moore's Byron.

Specifically—2. In logic or philos., inconsistent with reason; logically contradictory; impossible: as, that the whole is less than the sum of its parts is an absurd proposition; an absurd hypothesis.

It would be absurd to measure with a variable standard. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 44.

=Syn. Absurd, Silly, Foolish, Stupid, Irrational, Unreasonable, Preposterous, Infatuated, ridiculous, nonsensical, senseless, incongruous, unwise, ill-judged, ill-advised. (See foolish.) Foolish, absurd, and preposterous imply a contradiction of common sense, rising in degree from foolish, which is commonly applied where the contradiction is small or trivial. That which is foolish is characterized by weakness of mind, and provokes our contempt. That which is silly is still weaker, and more contemptible in its lack of sense; silly is the extreme in that direction. That which is absurd does not directly suggest weakness of mind, but it is glaringly opposed to common sense and reason: as, that a thing should be unequal to itself is absurd. That which is preposterous is the height of absurdity, an absurdity as conspicuous as getting a thing wrong side before; it excites amazement that any one should be capable of such an extreme of foolishness. That which is irrational is contrary to reason, but not especially to common sense. Unreasonable is more often used of the relation of men to each other; it implies less discredit to the understanding, but more to the will, indicating an unwillingness to conform to reason. Irrational ideas, conclusions; unreasonable demands, assumptions, people. An infatuated person is so possessed by a misleading idea or passion that his thoughts and conduct are controlled by it and turned into folly. He who is stupid appears to have little intelligence; that which is stupid is that which would be natural in a person whose powers of reasoning are defective or suspended.

'Tis a fault to heaven,
A fault against the dead, a fault to nature,
To reason most absurd. Shak., Hamlet, i. 2.

From most silly novels we can at least extract a laugh; but those of the modern-antique school have a ponderous, a leaden kind of fatuity, under which we groan.
George Eliot, Silly Novels.

How wayward is this foolish love! Shak., T. G. of V., I. 2.

A man who cannot write with wit on a proper subject is dull and stupid. Addison, Spectator, No. 291.

The brave man is not he who feels no fear,
For that were stupid and irrational.
Joanna Baillie, Basil.

She entertained many unreasonable prejudices against him, before she was acquainted with his personal worth.
Addison.

Though the error be easily fallen into, it is manifestly preposterous. Is. Taylor.

The people are so infatuated that, if a cow falls sick, it is ten to one but an old woman is clapt up in prison for it.
Addison, Travels in Italy.

II. n. An unreasonable person or thing; one who or that which is characterized by unreasonableness; an absurdity. [Rare.]

This arch absurd, that wit and fool delights.
Pope, Dunciad, i. 221.

absurdity (ab-sėrʹdi-ti), n.; pl. absurdities (-tiz). [= F. absurdité = Sp. absurdidad = Pg. absurdidade = It. assurdità, < L. absurdita(t-)s, absurdity, < absurdus: see absurd.] 1. The state or quality of being absurd or inconsistent with obvious truth, reason, or sound judgment; want of rationality or common sense: as, the absurdity of superstition; absurdity of conduct.

The absurdity involved in exacting an inexorable concealment from those who had nothing to reveal.
De Quincey, Essenes, ii.

2. That which is absurd; an absurd action, statement, argument, custom, etc.: as, the absurdities of men; your explanation involves a gross absurdity.

And this absurdity—for such it really is—we see every day—people attending to the difficult science of matters where the plain practice they quite let slip.
M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma, xii.

=Syn. 1. Absurdness, silliness, unreasonableness, self-contradiction, preposterousness, inconsistency. See folly.

absurdly (ab-sėrdʹli), adv. In an absurd manner; in a manner inconsistent with reason or obvious propriety.

absurdness (ab-sėrdʹnes), n. Same as absurdity.

abterminal (ab-tėrʹmi-nal), a. [< L. ab, from, + terminus, end.] From the terminus or end: applied to electric currents which pass in a muscular fiber from its extremities toward its center.

abthain, abthane (abʹthān), n. [Sc.; formerly also spelled abthein, abthen, abthan, abbathain, etc.; < ML. abthania, an abbacy, < Gael. abdhaine, an abbacy. The origin of ML. abthania not being known, it came to be regarded as the office or dignity of an imaginary abthanus, a word invented by Fordun, and explained as 'superior thane,' as if < L. abbas, father (see abbot), + ML. thanus, E. thane.] 1. An abbacy (in the early Scottish church).—2. Erroneously, a superior thane.

abthainry, abthanrie (abʹthān-ri), n. [Sc., < abthain, abthane, + -ry.] 1. The territory and jurisdiction of an abbot; an abbacy.—2. Erroneously, the jurisdiction of the supposed abthain. See abthain, 2.

abthanage (abʹthā-nāj), n. Same as abthainry.

abucay (ä-bö-kī'), n. [Bisaya abucay, abocag.] A white parrot of the Philippine Islands. Also (erroneously) abacay.

abulia (a-bö'li-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀβουλία, ill-advisedness, thoughtlessness, < ἄβουλος, ill-advised, thoughtless, < ἀ- priv. + βουλή, advice, counsel.] A form of mental derangement in which volition is impaired or lost. Also written aboulia.

abulomania (a-bö-lō-mā'ni-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄβουλος, ill-advised, thoughtless, + μανία, madness.] Same as abulia. Also written aboulomania.

abumbral (ab-um'brąl), a. Same as abumbrellar.

abumbrellar (ab-um-brel'ăr), a. [< L. ab, from, + NL. umbrella, the disk of acalephs.] Turned away from the umbrella or disk: applied to the surface of the velum or marginal ridge of medusæ or sea-blubbers, and opposed to adumbrellar (which see).

abuna (a-bö'nä), n. [Ethiopic and Ar. abū-na, our father. Cf. abba.] The head of the Christian church in Abyssinia. See Abyssinian.

abundance (ą-bun'dąns), n. [< ME. abundance, habundance, aboundance (see aboundance), < OF. abondance, < L. abundantia, abundance, < abundare, abound: see abound.] 1. A copious supply or quantity; overflowing plenteousness; unrestricted sufficiency: strictly applicable to quantity only, but sometimes used of number: as, an abundance of corn, or of people; to have money in great abundance.

By reason of the abundance of his horses their dust shall cover thee. Ezek. xxvi. 10.

2. Overflowing fullness or affluence; repletion; amplitude of means or resources.

Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. Mat. xii. 34.

The abundance [of Chaucer] is a continual fulness within the fixed limits of good taste; that of Langland is squandered in overflow. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 260.

abundancy† (ą-bun'dan-si), n. The state or quality of being abundant.

abundant (ą-bun'dant), a. [< ME. abundant, habundant, aboundant, < OF. abondant, habondant, < L. abundan(t-)s, ppr. of abundare, overflow: see abound.] 1. Plentiful; present in great quantity; fully sufficient: as, an abundant supply.

Thy abundant goodness shall excuse
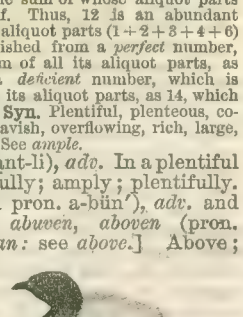
This deadly blot in thy digressing son.
Shak., Rich. II., v. 3.

The history of our species is a history of the evils that have flowed from a source as tainted as it is abundant.
Brougham.



2. Possessing in great quantity; copiously supplied; having great plenty; abounding: followed by in.

The Lord, . . . abundant in goodness and truth.
Ex. xxxiv. 6.

Abundant definition. See definition.—Abundant number, in arith., a number the sum of whose aliquot parts exceeds the number itself. Thus, 12 is an abundant number, for the sum of its aliquot parts (1+2+3+4+6) is 16. It is thus distinguished from a perfect number, which is equal to the sum of all its aliquot parts, as 6=1+2+3; and from a deficient number, which is greater than the sum of all its aliquot parts, as 14, which is greater than 1+2+7. =Syn. Plentiful, plenteous, copious, ample, exuberant, lavish, overflowing, rich, large, great, bountiful, teeming. See ample.

abundantly (ą-bun'dant-li), adv. In a plentiful or sufficient degree; fully; amply; plentifully.

abune (ą-bön'; Scotch pron. a-bün'), adv. and prep. [Contr. < ME. abuven, aboven (pron. ä-bö'ven), < AS. ābufan: see above.] Above; beyond; in a greater or higher degree. Also written aboon. [Scotch.]

abusable (ą-bū'zą-bl), a. [< abuse + -able.] Capable of being abused.

abusage† (ą-bū'zāj), n. Same as abuse.

abuse (ą-būz'), v. t.; pret. and pp. abused, ppr. abusing. [< ME. abusen, < OF. abuser (F. abuser), < ML. abusari, freq. of L. abūti, pp. abūsus, use up, consume, misuse, abuse, < ab, from, mis-, + uti, use: see use, v.] 1. To use ill; misuse; put to a wrong or bad use; divert from the proper use; misapply: as, to abuse rights or privileges; to abuse words.

They that use this world as not abusing it. 1 Cor. vii. 31.

The highest proof of virtue is to possess boundless power without abusing it. Macaulay, Addison.

2. To do wrong to; act injuriously toward; injure; disgrace; dishonor.

I swear, 'tis better to be much abus'd
Than but to know't a little. Shak., Othello, iii. 3.

Poor soul, thy face is much abused with tears.
Shak., R. and J., iv. 1.

3. To violate; ravish; defile.—4. To attack with contumelious language; revile.—5. To deceive; impose on; mislead.

You are a great deal abused in too bold a persuasion.
Shak., Cymbeline, i. 5.

Nor be with all these tempting words abused.
Pope, tr. of Ovid, Sappho to Phaon, l. 67.

It concerns all who think it worth while to be in earnest with their immortal souls not to abuse themselves with a false confidence, a thing so easily taken up, and so hardly laid down. South.

=Syn. 1. To Abuse, Misuse, misapply, misemploy, pervert, profane. Abuse and misuse are closely synonymous terms, but misuse conveys more particularly the idea of using inappropriately, abuse that of treating injuriously. In general, abuse is the stronger word.

So a fool is one that hath lost his wisdom, . . . not one that wants reason, but abuses his reason.
Charnock, Attributes.

From out the purple grape Crushed the sweet poison of misused wine.
Milton, Comus, l. 47.

2. To maltreat, ill-use, injure.—4. To revile, reproach, vilify, rate, berate, vituperate, rail at.

abuse (ą-būs'), n. [= F. abus = Sp. Pg. It. abuso, < L. abūsus, a using up, < abūti, pp. abūsus, use up, misuse: see abuse, v.] 1. Ill use; improper treatment or employment; application to a wrong purpose; improper use or application: as, an abuse of our natural powers; an abuse of civil rights, or of religious privileges; abuse of advantages; abuse of words.

Perverts best things
To worst abuse, or to their meanest use.
Milton, P. L., iv. 204.

And thus he bore without abuse
The grand old name of gentleman.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, cx.

A daring abuse of the liberty of conscience.
Irving, Knickerbocker.

2. Ill treatment of a person; injury; insult; dishonor; especially, ill treatment in words; contumelious language.

I, dark in light, exposed
To daily fraud, contempt, abuse, and wrong.
Milton, S. A., l. 76.

3. A corrupt practice or custom; an offense; a crime; a fault: as, the abuses of government.

The poor abuses of the time want countenance.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 2.

If abuses be not remedied, they will certainly increase.
Swift, Adv. of Relig.

4. Violation; defilement: as, self-abuse.—5†. Deception.

This is a strange abuse.—Let's see thy face.
Shak., M. for M., v. 1.

Is it some abuse, or no such thing? Shak., Ham., iv. 7.

Abuse of distress, in law, use of an animal or chattel distrained, which makes the distrainer liable to prosecution as for wrongful appropriation.—Abuse of process, in law, (a) Intentional irregularity for the purpose of gaining an advantage over one's opponent. (b) More commonly, the use of legal process (it may be in a manner formally regular) for an illegal purpose; a perversion of the forms of law, as making a criminal complaint merely to coerce payment of a debt, or wantonly selling very valuable property on execution in order to collect a trifling sum. =Syn. 1. Misuse, perversion, profanation, prostitution.—3. Abuse, Invective, maltreatment, outrage; vituperation, contumely, scolding, reviling, aspersion, slander, obloquy. (See invective.) "Abuse as compared with invective is more personal and coarse, being conveyed in harsh and unseemly terms, and dictated by angry feeling and bitter temper. Invective is more commonly aimed at character or conduct, and may be conveyed in writing and in refined language, and dictated by indignation against what is in itself blameworthy. It often, however, means public abuse under such restraints as are imposed by position and education." C. J. Smith.

abuseful (ą-būs'fůl), a. Using or practising abuse; abusive. [Rare or obsolete.]

The abuseful names of hereticks and schismaticks.
Bp. Barlow, Remains, p. 397.

abuser (ą-bū'zėr), n. 1. One who abuses, in speech or behavior; one who deceives.

Next thou, th' abuser of thy prince's ear.
Sir J. Denham, Sophy.

2. A ravisher.

That vile abuser of young maidens.
Fletcher, Faithful Shep., v. 1.

abusion† (ą-bū'zhọn), n. [< ME. abusion, < OF. abusion = Pr. abuzio = Sp. abusion = Pg. abusão = It. abusione, < L. abusio(n-), misuse, in rhet. catachresis, < abūti, pp. abūsus, misuse: see abuse, v.] 1. Misuse; evil or corrupt usage; violation of right or propriety.

Redress the abusions and exactions.
Act of Parl. No. xxxiii. (23 Hen. VIII.).

Shame light on him, that through so false illusion,
Doth turne the name of Souldiers to abusion.
Spenser, Mother Hub. Tale, l. 220.

2. Reproachful or contumelious language; insult.—3. Deceit; illusion.

They speken of magic and abusion.
Chaucer, Man of Law's Tale, l. 116.

abusive (ą-bū'siv), a. [= F. abusif = Sp. Pg. It. abusivo, < L. abūsivus, misapplied, improper, < abūti, pp. abūsus, misuse: see abuse, v.] 1. Practising abuse; using harsh words or ill treatment: as, an abusive author; an abusive fellow.—2. Characterized by or containing abuse; marked by contumely or ill use; harsh; ill-natured; injurious.

An abusive, scurrilous style passes for satire, and a dull scheme of party notions is called fine writing.
Addison, Spectator, No. 125.

One from all Grub-street will my fame defend,
And, more abusive, calls himself my friend.
Pope, Prol. to Satires, l. 112.

3. Marked by or full of abuses; corrupt: as, an abusive exercise of power.

A very extensive and zealous party was formed [in France], which acquired the appellation of the Patriotic party, who, sensible of the abusive government under which they lived, sighed for occasions of reforming it.
Jefferson, Autobiog., p. 56.

4†. Misleading, or tending to mislead; employed by misuse; improper.

In describing these battles, I am, for distinction sake, necessitated to use the word Parliament improperly, according to the abusive acception thereof for these latter years. Fuller, Worthies, I. xviii.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Insolent, insulting, offensive, scurrilous, ribald, reproachful, opprobrious, reviling.

abusively (ą-bū'siv-li), adv. 1. In an abusive manner; rudely; reproachfully.—2†. Improperly; by misuse.

Words being carelessly and abusively admitted, and as inconstantly retained. Glanville, Van. of Dogmat., xvii.

abusiveness (ą-bū'siv-nes), n. The quality of being abusive; rudeness of language, or violence to the person; ill usage.

abut (ą-but'), v.; pret. and pp. abutted, ppr. abutting. [< ME. abutten, abouten, < OF. abouter, abuter, abut (F. abouter, join end to end), < a, to, + bout, but, end; cf. OF. boter, F. bouter, thrust, push, butt: see butt[1]. The mod. F. aboutir, arrive at, tend to, end in, depends in most of its senses upon bout, an end, though strictly it represents the OF. abouter, in the sense of 'thrust toward.'] I. intrans. 1. To touch at the end; be contiguous; join at a border or boundary; terminate; rest: with on, upon, or against before the object: as, his land abuts upon mine; the building abuts on the highway; the bridge abuts against the solid rock.

Whose high upreared and abutting fronts
The perilous, narrow ocean parts asunder.
Shak., Hen. V., i. (cho.).

Steam is constantly issuing in jets from the bottom of a small ravine-like hollow, which has no exit, and which abuts against a range of trachytic mountains.
Darwin, Geol. Observations, i. 2.

In the last resort all these questions of physical speculation abut upon a metaphysical question.
W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 243.

The lustrous splendor of the walls abutting upon the Grand Canal. D. G. Mitchell, Bound Together, ii.

2. In ship-building, same as butt[1], 3.—Abutting owner, an owner of land which abuts or joins. Thus, the owner of land bounded by a highway or river, or by a tract of land belonging to another person, is said in reference to the latter to be an abutting owner. The term usually implies that the relative parts actually adjoin, but is sometimes loosely used without implying more than close proximity.—Abutting power (in an active sense), the ability of an abutment to resist the thrust or strain of the arch, gas, fluid, etc., pressing or reacting against it.—Abutting joint. See abutment, 2 (b) (2).

II. trans. To cause to terminate against or in contiguity with; project, or cause to impinge upon.

★ Sometimes shortened to but.

Abutilon (a-bū'ti-lon), n. [NL., < Ar. aubūtīlūn, a name given by Avicenna to this or an allied genus.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the family Malvaceæ, including about 80 species distributed through the warmer regions of the globe. They are often very ornamental, and several species (A. striatum, venosum, insigne, etc.) are frequent in gardens and greenhouses. Some Indian species furnish fiber for ropes, and in Brazil the flowers of A. esculentum are used as a vegetable.

abutment (ą-but'ment), n. [< abut + -ment.] 1. The state or condition of abutting.—2. That which abuts or borders on something else; the part abutting or abutted upon or against. Specifically—(a) Any body or surface designed to resist the thrust or reaction of any material structure, vapor, gas, or liquid that may press upon it; particularly, in arch., the portion of a pier or other structure that receives the thrust of an arch or vault; in engin., the terminal mass of a bridge, usually of masonry, which receives the thrust of an arch or the end-weight of a truss: in distinction from a pier, which carries intermediate points; a stationary wedge, block, or surface against which water, gas, or steam may react, as in a rotary pump or engine; the lower part of a dock or bridge-pier designed to resist ice or currents in a stream, etc. See bridge and impost. (b) In carp.: (1) The shoulder of a joiner's plane between which and the plane-bit the wedge is driven. E. H. Knight. (2) Two pieces of wood placed together with the grain of each at a right angle with the other. Their meeting forms an abutting joint.

Abutment.
A, A, arch-abutments; B, B, current- or ice-abutments.

Sometimes shortened to butment.

abutment-crane (ą-but'ment-krān), n. [< abutment + crane, 2.] A hoisting-crane or derrick used in building piers, towers, chimneys, etc. It stands at the edge of a platform resting on the top of the work, and may be gradually raised as the work proceeds.

Abutment-crane.
A, lattice post of building; B, rolled I-beam; C, wooden abutment fastened to B; D, stay-bolt holding C, C to beam B.

★abuttal (ą-but'al), n. That part of a piece of land which abuts on or is contiguous to another; a boundary; line of contact: used mostly in the plural.

abutter (ą-but'ėr), n. One whose property abuts: as, the abutters on the street.

abutua (ą-bö'tö-ą), n. [Tupi abútua, bútua.] The root of a tall woody menispermaceous shrub-like vine, Abuta rufescens, which is also called butua and white pareira. This root is used in the preparation of the curari poison. See curari.

abuy† (ą-bī'), v. t. [A more consistent spelling of aby[1], which is composed of a-[1] and buy.] To pay the penalty of.

When a holy man abuys so dearly such a slight frailty, of a credulous mistaking, what shall become of our heinous and presumptuous sins?
Bp. Hall, Seduced Prophet (Ord. MS.).

abuzz, abuz (ą-buz'), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3], prep., on, + buzz, n.] Buzzing; filled with buzzing sounds.

The court was all astir and abuzz.
Dickens, Tale of Two Cities, ix.

abvacuation† (ab-vak-ū-ā'shọn), n. [< L. ab, from, + vacuatio(n-): see abevacuation.] Same as abevacuation.

abvolation (ab-vō-lā'shọn), n. [See avolation.] The act of flying from or away. [Rare.]

aby[1]† (ą-bī'), v. t.; pret. and pp. abought or abied, ppr. abying. [< ME. abyen, abien, abyggen, abuggen, etc. (pret. aboughte), < AS. ābycgan, pay for, buy off, < ā- + bycgan, buy: see a-[1] and buy.] To give or pay an equivalent for; pay the penalty of; atone for; suffer for. Also spelled abye and abuy.

Ye shul it deere abeye. Chaucer, Doctor's Tale, l. 100.

My lord has most justly sent me to abye the consequences of a fault, of which he is as innocent as a sleeping man's dreams can be of a waking man's actions.
Scott, Kenilworth, I. xv.

aby[2]† (ą-bī'), v. i. [A corrupt form of abide[1], through influence of aby[1]. Cf. abide[2], suffer for, a corrupt form of aby[1], through influence of abide[1], continue.] To hold out; endure.

But nought that wanteth rest can long aby.
Spenser, F. Q., III. vii. 3.

Abyla (ab'i-lą), n. [NL.; prob. after Abyla (Gr. Ἄβιλη), a promontory in Africa opposite the Rock of Gibraltar.] A genus of calycophoran oceanic hydrozoans of the family Diphyidæ. Quoy and Gaimard. Also called Abyles. See cut under diphyzooid.

abyme†, n. Same as abysm.

abysm† (ą-bizm'), n. [< OF. abisme (later abime, F. abîme) = Pr. abisme = Sp. Pg. abismo, < ML. abissimus*, a superl. form of ML. abissus, < L. abyssus, an abyss: see abyss. The spelling abysm (with y instead of i) is sophisticated, to bring it nearer the Greek.] A gulf; an abyss: as, "the abysm of hell," Shak., A. and C., iii. 11.

abysmal (ą-biz'mal), a. [< abysm + -al; = Sp. Pg. abismal.] 1. Pertaining to an abyss; bottomless; profound; fathomless; immeasurable.

Let me hear thy voice through this deep and black Abysmal night. Whittier, My Soul and I.

The . . . Jews were struck dumb with abysmal terror.
Merivale, Hist. Rom., V. 410.

Specifically—2. Pertaining to great depths in the ocean: thus, species of plants found only at great depths are called abysmal species, and also abyssal (which see).

abysmally (ą-biz'mal-i), adv. Unfathomably. George Eliot.

abyss (ą-bis'), n. [< L. abyssus, ML. abissus (> Pg. It. abisso), a bottomless gulf, < Gr. ἄβυσσος, without bottom, < ἀ- priv. + βυσσός, depth, akin to βυθός and βάθος, depth, < βαθύς, deep: see bathos.] 1. A bottomless gulf; any deep, immeasurable space; anything profound and unfathomable, whether literally or figuratively; specifically, hell; the bottomless pit.

Some laboured to fathom the abysses of metaphysical theology. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., iii.

2. In her., the center of an escutcheon; the fesse-point.

abyss (ą-bis'), v. t. [< abyss, n.] To engulf.

The drooping sea-weed hears, in night abyssed,
Far and more far the wave's receding shocks.
Lowell, Sea-weed.

★abyssal (ą-bis'al), a. 1. Relating to or like an abyss; abysmal.—2. Inhabiting or belonging to the depths of the ocean: as, an abyssal mollusk.

Both classes of animals, the pelagic and the abyssal, . . . possess the feature of phosphorescence.
The American, V. 285.

Abyssal zone, in phys. geog., the lowest of eight biological zones into which Professor E. Forbes divided the bottom of the Ægean sea when describing its plants and animals; the zone furthest from the shore, and more than 105 fathoms deep.

Abyssine†, a. and n. [Also Abissine, Abassine; as a noun, usually in pl. Abyssines, etc., = F. Abyssins = Sp. Abisinos = Pg. Abexins; < ML. Abissini, Abassini, Abyssinians (> Abissinia, Abassinia, Abyssinia), < Abassia, < Ar. Habasha, Abyssinia, Habash, an Abyssinian, said to have reference to the mixed composition of the people, < habash, mixture. The natives call themselves Itiopyavan, their country Itiopia, i. e., ★Ethiopia.] Same as Abyssinian.

Abyssinian (ab-i-sin'i-ąn), a. and n. [< Abyssine (Abyssinia) + -ian.] I. a. Belonging to Abyssinia, a country of eastern Africa, lying to the south of Nubia, or to its inhabitants.

II. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Abyssinia. Specifically—2. A member of the Abyssinian Church. This church was organized about the middle of the fourth century by Frumentius, a missionary from Alexandria. In doctrine it is Monophysite (which see). It observes the Jewish Sabbath together with the Christian Sunday, forbids eating the flesh of unclean beasts, retains as an object of worship the model of a sacred ark called the ark of Zion, practises a form of circumcision, and celebrates a yearly feast of lustration, at which all the people are rebaptized. The Abyssinians honor saints and pictures, but not images; crosses, but not crucifixes. Pontius Pilate is accounted by them a saint because he washed his hands of innocent blood. The priests may be married men, but may not marry after ordination. The abuna, or head of the Abyssinian Church, is appointed by the patriarch of Alexandria.

abzug (ab'zög; G. pron. äp'tsöch), n. [G., < abziehen, draw off, < ab-, = E. off, + ziehen, related to E. tug and tow[1].] In metal., the first scum appearing on the surface of lead in the cupel. Nearly equivalent to abstrich (which see).

act, n. [Early ME. ac, < AS. āc, oak: see oak.] The early form of oak, preserved (through the shortening of the vowel before two consonants) in certain place-names (whence surnames): as, Acton [< AS. Actūn], literally, oak-town, or an inclosure with oaks; Ackley or Ackley, also Oakley [< AS. Ācleá], literally, oak-lea.

ac-. A prefix, assimilated form of ad- before c and q, as in accede, acquire, etc.; also an accommodated form of other prefixes, as in accurse, accloy, accumber, etc. See these words.

-ac. [= F. -aque, < L. -ac-us, Gr. -ακος: see -ic.] An adjective-suffix of Greek or Latin origin, as in cardiac, maniac, iliac, etc. It is always preceded by -i- and, like -ic, may take the additional suffix -al.

A. C. An abbreviation of (1) Latin ante Christum, before Christ, used in chronology in the same sense as B. C.; (2) army-corps.

acacia (ą-kā'shią), n. [= Sp. Pg. It. D. acacia = G. acacie, < L. acacia, < Gr. ἀκακία, the acacia; prob. a foreign name, but associated with Gr. ἀκίς, a point, thorn, ἀκή, a thorn, L. acus, needle, etc.: see acute.] 1. [cap.] A large genus of shrubby or arboreous leguminous plants belonging to the family Mimosaceæ, natives of the warm regions of both hemispheres, especially of Australia and Africa. It numbers about 450 species, and is the largest genus of the family, excepting Astragalus. It is distinguished by small regular flowers in globose heads or cylindrical spikes, and very numerous free stamens. The leaves are bipinnate, or in very many of the Australian species are reduced to phyllodia, with their edges always vertical. Several species are valuable for the gum which they exude. The bark and pods are frequently used in tanning, and the aqueous extract of the wood of some Indian species forms the catechu of commerce. Many species furnish excellent timber, and many others are cultivated for ornament—A. Farnesiana both for ornament and for the perfume of its flowers.

Acacia Arabica.

2. A plant of the genus Acacia.—3. The popular name for several plants of other genera. The green-barked acacia of Arizona is Cercidium Torreyanum (Parkinsonia Torreyana of Watson). False and bastard acacia are names sometimes applied to the locust-tree, Robinia Pseudacacia. The rose or bristly acacia is Robinia hispida. The name three-thorned acacia is sometimes given to the honey-locust, Gleditsia triacanthos.

4. In med., the inspissated juice of several species of Acacia, popularly known as gum arabic (which see, under gum[2]).—5. A name given by antiquaries to an object resembling a roll of cloth, seen in the hands of consuls and emperors of the Lower Empire as represented on medals. It is supposed to have been unfurled by them at festivals as a signal for the games to begin.

Acacian (ą-kā'shiąn), n. [The proper name Acacius, Gr. Ἀκάκιος, is equiv. to Innocent, < Gr. ἀκακος, innocent, guileless: see acacy.] In eccles. hist., a member of a sect or school of moderate Arians of the fourth century, named Acacians from their leader, Acacius, bishop of Cæsarea. Some of the Acacians maintained that the Son, though similar to the Father, was not the same; others, that he was both distinct and dissimilar. As a body they finally accepted the Nicene doctrine.

acacia-tree (ą-kā'shią-trē), n. A name sometimes applied to the false acacia or locust-tree, Robinia Pseudacacia.

acacin, acacine (ak'ą-sin), n. [< acacia + -in[2], -ine[2].] Gum arabic. Watts.

acacio (ą-kā'shiō), n. [A form of acajou, apparently a simulation of acacia, with which it has no connection.] Same as acajou, 3.

acacy† (ak'ā-si), n. [< L. as if acacia*, < Gr. ἀκακία, guilelessness, < ἄκακος, innocent, < ἀ- priv. + κακός, bad.] Freedom from malice. Bailey.

Academe (ak'ā-dēm), n. [< L. academia: see academy.] 1. The grove and gymnasium near Athens where Plato taught; the Academy; figuratively, any place of similar character.

> The softer Adams of your Academe.
> Tennyson, Princess, ii.

Hence—2. [l. c.] An academy; a place for philosophic and literary intercourse or instruction.

> Nor hath fair Europe her vast bounds throughout > An academe of note I found not out. Howell.

academial (ak-ā-dē'mi-āl), a. Pertaining to an academy; academical. Johnson. [Rare.]

academian† (ak-ā-dē'mi-ān), n. A member of an academy; a student in a university or college.

> Marston, Scourge of Vill., iii. 6.

★academic (ak-ā-dem'ik), a. and n. [= F. académique = Sp. Pg. academico = It. accademico, < L. academicus, < Gr. Ἀκαδημεικός, pertaining to the Ἀκαδήμεια: see academy.] I. a. 1. [cap.] Pertaining to the Academy of Athens, or to Plato and his followers, from his having taught there: as, the Academic groves; the Academic school or philosophy.—2. Pertaining to an advanced institution of learning, as a college, a university, or an academy; relating to or connected with higher education: in this and the following senses often, and in the third generally, written academical: as, academic studies; an academical degree.

> These products of dreaming indolence . . . no more constituted a literature than a succession of academic studies from the pupils of a royal institution can constitute a school of fine arts. De Quincey, Style, iii.

3. Pertaining to that department of a college or university which is concerned with classical, mathematical, and general literary studies, as distinguished from the professional and scientific departments; designed for general as opposed to special instruction. [U. S.]—4. Of or pertaining to an academy or association of adepts; marked by or belonging to the character or methods of such an academy; hence, conforming to set rules and traditions; speculative; formal; conventional: as, academical proceedings; an academical controversy; an academic figure (in art).

> The tone of Lord Chesterfield has always been the tone of our old aristocracy; a tone of elegance and propriety, above all things free from the stiffness of pedantry or academic rigor. De Quincey, Style, i.

> For the question is no longer the academic one: "Is it wise to give every man the ballot?" but rather the practical one: "Is it prudent to deprive whole classes of it any longer?" Lowell, Democracy.

Figure of academic proportions, in painting, a figure of a little less than half the natural size, such as it is the custom for pupils to draw from the antique and from life; also, a figure in an attitude resembling those chosen by instructors in studies from life, for the purpose of displaying muscular action, form, and color to the best advantage; hence, an academic figure, composition, etc., is one which appears conventional or unspontaneous, and smacks of practice-work or adherence to formulas and traditions.

II. n. 1. [cap.] One who professed to adhere to the philosophy of Plato.—2. A student in a college or university: as, "a young academic," Watts, Imp. of Mind.

academical (ak-ā-dem'i-kal), a. and n. I. a. Same as academic, but very rare in sense 1.

II. n. 1. A member of an academy.—2. pl. The cap and gown worn by the students, graduates, and officials of a college or university.

> At first he caught up his cap and gown, as though he were going out. . . . On second thoughts, however, he threw his academicals back on to the sofa.
> T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, xix.

academically (ak-ā-dem'i-kal-i), adv. In an academical manner; as an academic.

academician (ā-kad-ē-mish'an), n. [< F. académicien, < NL. academicianus*, < L. academicus: see academic.] A member of an academy or a society for promoting arts and sciences. Particularly—(a) A member of the British Royal Academy of Arts: commonly called Royal Academician, and abbreviated R. A. (b) A member of the French Academy. (c) A full member of the National Academy of Design of New York. (d) A member of the National Academy of Sciences. ★[U. S.] See associate, 4, and academy, 3.

academicism (ak-ā-dem'i-sizm), n. The mode of teaching or of procedure in an academy; an academical mannerism, as of painting.

Academics (ak-ā-dem'iks), n. [Pl. of academic.] The Platonic philosophy; Platonism.

Academism (ā-kad'ē-mizm), n. The doctrines of the Academic philosophers; Platonism.

academist (ā-kad'ē-mist), n. [< academy + -ist; = F. académiste, academist, = It. accademista = Pg. academista, a pupil in a riding-school.] 1. [cap.] An Academic philosopher.—2. A member of or a student in an academy.

> Had the poor vulgar rout only been abused into such idolatrous superstitions, as to adore a marble or a golden deity, it might not so much be wondered at; but for the Academy to own such a paradox,—this was without excuse. South, Sermons, II. 245.

2. A superior school or institution of learning. Specifically—(a) A school for instruction in a particular art or science: as, a military or naval academy. (b) In the United States, a school or seminary holding a rank between a university or college and an elementary school. 3. An association of adepts for the promotion of literature, science, or art, established sometimes by government, and sometimes by the voluntary union of private individuals. The members (academicians), who are usually divided into ordinary, honorary, and corresponding members, either select their own departments or follow those prescribed by the constitution of the society, and at regular meetings communicate the results of their labors in papers, of which the more important are afterward printed. Among the most noted institutions of this name are the five academies composing the National Institute of France (the French Academy, the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres, the Academy of the Fine Arts, the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences, and the Academy of Sciences), the Royal Academy of Arts in London, the Academy of Sciences of Berlin, the Imperial Academy of Sciences of St. Petersburg, the National Academy of Sciences in Washington, etc. The chief object of the French Academy, as also of the celebrated Italian Academy della Crusca and of the Spanish Academy, is to regulate and purify the vernacular tongue.—Academy board, a paper board, the surface of which is prepared for drawing or painting.—Academy figure, academy study, an academic study; a drawing or painting of the human figure, especially of the nude, made for practice only. See figure of academic proportions, under academic.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Acadia or Nova Scotia; specifically, one of the original French settlers of Acadia, or of the descendants of those who were expelled in a body by the English in 1755, many of whom formed communities in Louisiana, then a French colony, and have retained the name.

acajou[1] (ak-ā-jö' or -zhö'), n. [< F. acajou = It. acagiu, < Pg. acaju, appar. another use of acajou[2]. Cf. also Sp. caoba, caobana, < Haitian caoba, cahoba, mahogany.] A kind of mahogany, the wood of Cedrela fissilis: also applied to the true mahogany and other similar woods.

★acajou[2] (ak-ā-jö' or -zhö'), n. [F. acajou = It. acaju, acagiu, < Pg. acajou, acaju = Sp. acaju, < Tupi acajú, the cashew-tree, acajúiba (Sp. acayoiba, NL. acajuba), its fruit. See also cashew[1].] 1. The fruit of the tree Anacardium occidentale. See cashew-nut, cashew-tree.—2. A gum or resin extracted from the bark of Anacardium occidentale.

acaleph (ak'ā-lef), n. One of the Acalephæ or sea-nettles. Also spelled acalephe.

Acalephs.
1, Rhizostoma cuvieri. 2, Medusa pellucens.

Acalepha (ak-a-lē'fā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of acalephus*, adj., < Gr. ἀκαλήφη, a nettle, a sea-nettle. Cf. Acalephæ.] In Cuvier's system of classification, the third class of Radiata, a heterogeneous group now broken up or retained in a much modified and restricted sense. See Acalephæ. The leading genera of Cuvierian acalephs were Medusa, Cyanea, Rhizostoma, Astoma, Beroë, and Cestum, composing the Acalepha simplicia, with Physalia, Physophora, and Diphyes, constituting the Acalepha hydrostatica.

acalephan (ak-a-lē'fan), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Acalephæ.

II. n. An acaleph.

acalephe (ak'a-lēf), n. See acaleph.

Acanthisittidæ (a-kan-thi-sit′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Acanthisitta, the typical genus (⟨ Gr. ἀκανθίς, the goldfinch or the linnet, + σίττη, the nuthatch, Sitta europæa), + -idæ.] Same as Xenicidæ.

acanthite (a-kan′thīt), n. [⟨ Gr. ἄκανθα, a thorn, + -ite[2].] A mineral, a sulphid of silver having the same composition as argentite, but differing in crystalline form: found at Freiberg, Saxony.

acantho-. The combining form of Greek ἄκανθα, thorn, meaning "thorn" or "thorny."

acanthobolus (ak-an-thob′ō-lus), n.; pl. acanthoboli (-lī). [NL., less correctly acanthabolus, contr. acanthalus; also in E. and F. form acanthobole, less correctly acanthabole; ⟨ Gr. ἀκανθοβόλος, a surgical instrument for extracting bones, also lit., as adj., shooting thorns, pricking, ⟨ ἄκανθα, a thorn, spine, + βάλλειν, throw.] An instrument used for extracting splinters from a wound. Formerly called volsella.

Acanthobranchiata (a-kan″thō-brang-ki-ā′tä), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἄκανθα, thorn, spine, + βράγχια, L. branchiæ, gills, + -ata.] A suborder of nudibranchiate gastropods with spicules in the bases of the branchial tentacles. It includes the families Doridida and Polyceridæ (which see). M. Sars.

Echinorhynchus of the Flounder, illustrating Acanthocephala.

A, diagrammatic representation of the structure: a, proboscis; b, its stem; c, anterior enlargement of the body; f, neck, or constriction between the foregoing and d, the rest of the body; e, posterior funnel; g, lemniscus; h, superior oblique tubular bands; k, inferior muscles of proboscis; l, m, genitalia; o, penis or vulva. B, lower extremity of stem of the proboscis: a, ganglion; b, vascular space; c, inner wall; d, outer coat; e, tubular band, with the nerve; h, f, muscular bands; g, suspensorium of genitalia.

acanthocarpous (a-kan-thō-kär′-pus), a. [⟨ Gr. ἄκανθα, a thorn, + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., having the fruit covered with spines.

Acanthocephala (a-kan-thō-sef′-a-lä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of acanthocephalus: see acanthocephalous.] An order of worm-like internal parasites or entozoa, which have neither mouth nor alimentary canal, but have recurved hooks on a retractile proboscis at the anterior end of the body, by which they attach themselves to the tissues of animals. These entozoans belong to the class Nematelmintha. The embryos are gregarina-like, and become encysted as in Cestoda, in which state they are swallowed by various animals, in the bodies of which they are developed. A species occurs in the liver of the cat, and another in the alimentary canal of the hog. There are about 100 species, all referable to the family Echinorhynchidæ.

The Acanthocephala undoubtedly present certain resemblances to the Nematoidea, and more particularly to the Gordiacea, but the fundamental differences in the structure of the muscular and nervous systems, and in that of the reproductive organs, are so great that it is impossible to regard them as Nematoids which have undergone a retrogressive metamorphosis.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 558.

acanthocephalan (a-kan-thō-sef′a-lan), n. One of the Acanthocephala.

Acanthocephali (a-kan-thō-sef′a-lī), n. pl. Same as Acanthocephala.

Acanthocephalidæ (a-kan-thō-sef-a-lī′dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Acanthocephalus + -idæ.] A division of hemipterous insects, of the superfamily Coreoidea.

acanthocephalous (a-kan-thō-sef′a-lus), a. [⟨ NL. acanthocephalus, ⟨ Gr. ἄκανθα, a spine, + κεφαλή, the head.] 1. Having spines on the head.—2. Pertaining to the Acanthocephala.

Acanthocephalus (a-kan-thō-sef′a-lus), n. [NL.: see acanthocephalous.] In entom., the typical genus of the Acanthocephalidæ (which see). A. declivis is a large bug of the extreme southern United States; A. alata is another example of this genus.

acanthocladous (ak-an-thok′la-dus), a. [⟨ Gr. ἄκανθα, a spine, + κλάδος, a shoot, branch.] In bot., having spiny branches.

acanthoclinid (ak-an-thok′li-nid), n. [⟨ Acanthoclinidæ.] One of the Acanthoclinidæ.

Acanthoclinidæ (a-kan-thō-klin′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Acanthoclinus + -idæ.] In Günther's system of classification, a family of blenniiform acanthopterygian fishes, having numerous anal spines. Only one genus, Acanthoclinus, is known; it is peculiar to the Pacific ocean, the typical species, A. littoreus, being found in New Zealand.

Acanthoclinus (a-kan-thō-klī′nus), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἄκανθα, a spine, + NL. clinus, a blennioid fish: see Clinus.] A genus of fishes representing the family Acanthoclinidæ (which see). Jenyns, 1842.

Acanthoclinus littoreus. (From "Zoölogy of the Beagle.") acanthodean (ak-an-thō′dē-an), a. Having the character of or pertaining to Acanthodes: as, the acanthodean family of fishes; acanthodean ★scales. Egerton, 1861.

Acanthodei (ak-an-thō′dē-ī), n. pl. [NL.: see Acanthodes.] The name given by Agassiz to the family Acanthodidæ: now an order.

Acanthodes (ak-an-thō′dēz), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἀκανθώδης, thorny, spinous, ⟨ ἄκανθα, thorn, spine, + εἶδος, form.] 1. The representative genus of the family Acanthodidæ. Agassiz, 1833.—2. A genus of crustaceans.—3. A genus of coleopterous insects.—4. A genus of zoantharian polyps. Dybowski, 1873.

Acanthodidæ (ak-an-thod′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Acanthodes + -idæ.] A family of extinct fishes of the order Acanthodei, typified by the genus Acanthodes. They had a compressed claviform body, single dorsal fin nearly opposite to the anus, prolonged upper tail-lobe, and well-developed spines in front of the fins. The only species known are from the Devonian and Carboniferous formations. Also used by Huxley as a subordinal name for the Acanthodoidea.

Acanthodini (a-kan-thō-dī′nī), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Acanthodes + -ini.] An order of fossil fishes of the Devonian and Carboniferous periods, connecting the ganoids and selachians, having a partly calcified skeleton, heterocercal tail, small rhomboidal scales, and a spine before each fin. It includes the genera Acanthodes, Chiracanthus, Diplacanthus, etc.

Acanthodoidea (a-kan-thō-doi′dē-ä), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Acanthodes.] An order of extinct fishes of the ganoid series, with a partly calcified skeleton, heterocercal caudal fin, shagreen-like scales, no opercular bones, and the external rays of the pectoral and ventral fins developed as spines. The chief family is Acanthodidæ.

Acanthoganoidei (a-kan″thō-ga-noi′dē-ī), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἄκανθα, spine, + γάνος, luster, + εἶδος, form: see ganoid.] A superorder of extinct paleozoic fishes, consisting only of the order Acanthodoidea.

Acanthoglossus (a-kan-thō-glos′us), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἄκανθα, a thorn, + γλῶσσα, a tongue.] A genus of aculeated monotrematous ant-eaters of the family Tachyglossidæ. It differs from Tachyglossus in the vertebral formula (which is cervical 7, dorsal 17, lumbar 4, sacral 3, caudal 12), in having ungual phalanges and claws only on the three middle digits of each foot, in the much-lengthened and decurved snout, and in the spatulate tongue with three rows of recurved spines. The type and only species is A. bruijni, lately discovered in New Guinea. The generic name is antedated by Zaglossus of Gill. Gervais, 1877.

acanthoid (a-kan′thoid), a. [⟨ acantha, spine, + -oid. Cf. Acanthodes.] Spiny; spinous.

Acanthoidea (ak-an-thoi′dē-ä), n. pl. [NL.: see acanthoid and Acanthodes.] In conch., regular Chitonidæ, with insertion-plates sharp and grooved externally, eaves furrowed beneath, and mucro posteriorly extended. Dall.

acanthological (a-kan-thō-loj′i-kal), a. [⟨ ★acanthology, ⟨ Gr. ἄκανθα, thorn, spine, + λογία: see -ology.] Of or pertaining to the study of spines.

acantholysis (ak-an-thol′i-sis), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἄκανθα, thorn, spine, + λύσις, dissolution, ⟨ λύειν, loose.] In pathol., atrophy of the stratum spinosum (prickle-cells) of the epidermis.

acanthoma (a-kan-thō′mä), n.; pl. acanthomata (-ma-tä). [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἄκανθα, thorn, spine, + -oma. Cf. acanthosis.] In pathol., a neoplasm or tumor of the stratum spinosum of the epidermis, which invades the corium; a skin-cancer.

Acanthometra (a-kan-thō-met′rä), n. [NL., fem. of acanthometrus: see acanthometrous.] 1. The typical genus of the Acanthometridæ. Müller, 1855.—2. A genus of dipterous insects.

Acanthometræ (a-kan-thō-met′rē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Acanthometra.] A suborder of acantharian radiolarians, whose skeleton is composed merely of radial spicules, and does not form a fenestrated shell. Haeckel.

Acanthometrida (a-kan-thō-met′ri-dä), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Acanthometra + -ida.] In Mivart's system of classification, a division of radiolarians having a well-developed radial skeleton, the rays meeting in the center of the capsule, and no test or shell-covering.

Acanthometridæ (a-kan-thō-met′ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Acanthometra + -idæ.] A family of acantharians having the skeleton composed of 20 radial spicules, regularly arranged according to J. Müller's law in 5 zones, each containing 4 spicules. It consists of a group of genera of deep-sea forms. Haeckel.

acanthometrous (a-kan-thō-met′rus), a. [⟨ NL. acanthometrus, ⟨ Gr. ἄκανθα, a thorn, spine, + μέτρον, measure.] Pertaining to the Acanthometræ.

Acanthomys (a-kan′thō-mis), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἄκανθα, spine, + μῦς = E. mouse.] A genus of African murine rodents, having the fur mixed with spines. R. P. Lesson.

Acanthophis (a-kan′thō-fis), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἄκανθα, a thorn, + ὄφις, a serpent: see ophidian.] A genus of venomous serpents, of the family Elapidæ. They are of small size, live on dry land, and feed upon frogs, lizards, and other small animals. The tail is furnished with a horny spur at the end, whence the generic name. A. antarctica, the death-adder of Australia, has long immovable fangs, and is considered the most venomous reptile of that country.

Death-adder of Australia (Acanthophis antarctica).

acanthophorous (ak-an-thof′ō-rus), a. [⟨ Gr. ἀκανθοφόρος, bearing spines or prickles, ⟨ ἄκανθα, a spine or prickle, + -φόρος, ⟨ φέρειν = E. bear[1].] Having or producing spines or prickles. Also spelled acanthopherous.

Acanthophractæ (a-kan-thō-frak'tē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἀκανθα, a thorn, + φρακτός, included, verbal adj. of φράσσειν, fence in, inclose.] A suborder of acantharian radiolarians, having a skeleton of 20 radial spicules regularly grouped according to J. Müller's law, and a fenestrated or solid shell around the central capsule formed by connected transverse processes.

acanthopod (a-kan'thō-pod), a. and n. [⟨ Acanthopoda.] I. a. Having spiny feet.

II. n. An animal with spiny feet; one of the Acanthopoda.

Acanthopoda (ak-an-thop'ō-dä), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἀκανθα, a spine, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] In Latreille's system of classification, a group of clavicorn beetles, the first tribe of the second section of Clavicornes, with broad flattened feet beset outside with spines, short 4-jointed tarsi, depressed body, dilated prosternum, and curved 11-jointed antennæ longer than the head. The group corresponds to the genus Heterocerus of Bosc. These insects burrow in the ground near water.

acanthoptere (ak-an-thop'tēr), n. [See Acanthopteri.] One of the Acanthopteri.

Acanthopteri (ak-an-thop'tē-rī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of acanthopterus: see acanthopterous.] Same as Acanthopterygii (b).

acanthopterous (ak-an-thop'tē-rus), a. [⟨ NL. acanthopterus, ⟨ Gr. ἀκανθα, a spine, + πτερόν, a wing, = E. feather.] 1. Spiny-winged, as the cassowary.—2. Having spiny fins; of the nature of the Acanthopteri or Acanthopterygii; acanthopterygious.—3. Having spines: as, an acanthopterous fin.

acanthopterygian (a-kan″thop-tē-rij'i-an), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Acanthopterygii; having the characters of the Acanthopterygii.

II. n. One of the Acanthopterygii; a fish with spiny fins.

Acanthopterygii (a-kan″thop-tē-rij'i-ī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of acanthopterygius: see acanthopterygious.] A large group of fishes to which various limits and values have been assigned. The name was introduced into systematic ichthyology by Willughby and Ray, adopted by Artedi, and largely used by subsequent naturalists. (a) In Cuvier's system of classification, the first order of fishes, characterized by hard spiny rays in the dorsal fins, as the common perch, bass, and mackerel; the spiny-finned fishes. (b) In Günther's system of classification, an order of teleosts with part of the rays of the dorsal, anal, and ventral fins spiny, and the lower pharyngeals separate. The last character eliminates the labrids and several other families retained by Cuvier, but by Günther referred to a special order Pharyngognathi. (c) In Gill's system of classification, a suborder of Teleocephali with ventrals thoracic or jugular (sometimes suppressed), spines generally in the anterior portion of the dorsal and anal fins and to the outer edges of the ventrals, normal symmetrical head, and pharyngeal bones either separate or united. The pediculate, hemibranchiate, and opisthomous fishes are excluded as different orders, and the Percesoces, Rhegnopteri, Discocephali, Tæniosomi, and Xenopterygii as special suborders. Even thus limited, it comprises more species than any other suborder or order of fishes. The perch, bass, porgy, mackerel, and swordfish are examples.

acanthopterygious (a-kan″thop-tē-rij'i-us), a. [⟨ NL. acanthopterygius, ⟨ Gr. ἀκανθα, a thorn, a spine, + πτερύγιον, the fin of a fish, dim. of πτέρυξ, a wing, a fin, ⟨ πτερόν, a wing, = E. feather.] Having the characters of the Acanthopterygii or spiny-finned fishes; belonging to the Acanthopterygii; acanthopterygian.

Acanthorhini (a-kan-thō-rī'nī), n. pl. [⟨ Gr. ἀκανθα, a spine, + ῥίς, ῥίν, nose.] An ordinal name suggested by Bonaparte, 1831, as a substitute for Holocephala (which see).

Acanthorhynchus (a-kan-thō-ring'kus), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἀκανθα, a thorn, + ῥύγχος, snout.] 1. A genus of Australian birds, of the family Meliphagidæ and subfamily Myzomelinæ: so called from their slender acute bill. The species are A. tenuirostris and A. superciliosus. J. Gould, 1837.—2. A genus of helminths. Diesing, 1850.

acanthosis (ak-an-thō'sis), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἀκανθα, spine, + -osis.] A name applied to any disease affecting primarily the stratum spinosum (prickle-cells) of the epidermis.

Acanthoteuthis (a-kan-thō-tū'this), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἀκανθα, a thorn, + τευθίς, a squid.] A genus of fossil cephalopods, of the family Belemnoteuthidæ, characterized by the almost rudimentary condition of the rostrum and the large penlike form of the proöstracum. It occurs in the Jurassic rocks, and is notable as one of the oldest known cephalopods of the dibranchiate or acetabuliferous order.

Acanthotheca (a-kan-thō-thē'kä), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἀκανθα, a thorn, + θήκη, a case.] Same as Pentastomidea. Also written Acanthotheci.

acanthous (a-kan'thus), a. [⟨ Gr. ἄκανθα, a spine: see acantha and -ous.] Spinous.

acanthurid (ak-an-thū'rid), n. A fish of the family Acanthuridæ.

Acanthuridæ (ak-an-thū'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Acanthurus + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes typified by the genus Acanthurus, to which various limits have been ascribed. See Teuthididæ.

Leaf of Acanthus spinosus.

Acanthurus (ak-an-thū'rus), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἀκανθα, spine, + οὐρά, tail.] 1. The representative genus of the family Acanthuridæ, characterized by spines on the sides of the tail, whence the name. The species are numerous in the tropical seas, and are popularly known as doctors, surgeons, surgeon-fishes, barbers, etc. Also used for the genus Monoceros.

Acanthus, Inflorescence.

2. A genus of reptiles. Daudin.—3. A genus of coleopterous insects. Kirby, 1827.

Acanthus (a-kan'thus), n. [L. (⟩ Sp. It. acanto = Pg. acantho = F. acanthe), ⟨ Gr. ἄκανθος, brankursine, also a thorny Egyptian tree, ⟨ ἀκανθα, a thorn: see acantha.] 1. In bot., a genus of tall herbaceous plants of southern Europe and Africa, of the family Acanthaceæ. They have large spinosely toothed leaves, and are sometimes cultivated for the sake of their beautiful foliage.

2. [l. c.] The common name of plants of this genus.—3. In zoöl., a genus of crustaceans.—4. [l. c.] In arch., a characteristic ornament derived from or resembling the conventionalized foliage or leaves of the acanthus, used in capitals of the Corinthian and Composite orders, and in Roman, Byzantine, medieval, and Renaissance architecture generally, as upon friezes, cornices, modillions, etc.

Acanthus in Roman Architecture.

Acanthyllis (ak-an-thil'is), n. [⟨ L. acanthyllis, ⟨ Gr. ἀκανθυλλίς, the pendulous titmouse, dim. of ἀκανθίς, the goldfinch or linnet, ⟨ ἄκανθα, a thorn: see acantha.] A genus of American, Indian, and Australian birds of the swift family, Cypselidæ; the spine-tailed swifts, now usually referred to the genus Chætura. Usually written Acanthylis. Boie, 1826.

acanticone (a-kan'ti-kōn), n. [Prop. acanthicone*, alluding to the yellow powder, ⟨ Gr. ἀκανθίς, a goldfinch, + κονία, dust.] A variety of epidote; arendalite (which see).

à cappella, alla cappella (ä or äl'lä kä-pel'lä). [It.: a (L. ad), to, according to; alla (= a la), to the; cappella, church, chapel, church musicians: see chapel.] In the style of church or chapel music. Applied to compositions sung without instrumental accompaniment, or with an accompaniment in unison with the vocal part: as, a mass a cappella.

acapsular (a-kap'sū-lär), a. [⟨ Gr. ἀ- priv. + capsule.] Without a capsule.

acardia (a-kär'di-ä), n. [NL.: see acardius.] In teratol., absence of a heart.

acardiac (a-kär'di-ak), a. [⟨ NL. acardiacus, adj., ⟨ Gr. ἀ- priv. + καρδιακός, ⟨ καρδία, the heart: see *a-*18 and cardiac.] Without a heart.

acardiacus (ak-är-dī'a-kus), n.; pl. acardiaci (-sī). [NL.: see acardiac.] In teratol., that parasitic part of a double monster in which the heart is absent or rudimentary. Acardiacus amorphus is a shapeless mass covered with skin. Acardiacus acormus has a head, while the thorax and abdomen are rudimentary. In acardiacus acephalus the head is lacking, the thorax rudimentary, and the pelvis and posterior limbs well developed. Acardiacus anceps has a well-developed trunk and rudimentary head, limbs, and heart.

acardius (a-kär'di-us), n.; pl. acardii (-ī). [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἀκάρδιος, without a heart, ⟨ ἀ- priv. + καρδία = E. heart.] Same as acardiacus.

acarian (a-kā'ri-an), a. [⟨ Acarus, q. v.] Of or pertaining to the order Acarida; belonging to or resembling the genus Acarus.

In some cases of acne, an acarian parasite, called by Owen the Demodex folliculorum, is present in the affected follicle. E. W. Richardson, Prevent. Med., p. 261.

acariasis (ak-a-rī'a-sis), n. [NL., ⟨ Acarus + -iasis.] A skin-disease caused by an acarian parasite.

acaricide (a-kar'i-sīd), n. [⟨ Acarus + L. -cīda, a killer, ⟨ cædere, kill. Cf. homicide, parricide, matricide.] A substance that destroys mites.

acarid (ak'a-rid), n. [⟨ Acarida.] One of the Acarida; a mite.

Acarida (a-kar'i-dä), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Acarus + -ida.] An order of the class Arachnida, including those insects, as the mites, ticks, itch-insects, etc., which are without a definite line of demarkation between the unsegmented abdomen and the cephalothorax, the head, thorax, and abdomen appearing united in one. They are with or without eyes; the mouth is either suctorial or masticatory; the respiration is either tracheal or dermal; and the legs are 8 in number in the adult and 6 in the young, being in some cases terminated by suckers, in others by setæ. There are several families of Acarida, with numerous genera and species, mostly oviparous and generally parasitic, but many are found in excrementitious or decaying animal matter, or on plants, while some are marine and others live in fresh water. Those which live on plants are often very injurious to vegetation, and frequently form a kind of gall, sometimes resembling a fungus or a bird's nest, as the "witch-knot" of the birch, caused by members of the genus Phytoptus. The gardenmites (Trombididæ), including the harvest-tick (Leptus autumnalis), the spider-mites (Gamasidæ), and the woodmites (Oribatidæ) live mostly upon vegetation. The true ticks (Ixodidæ) attach themselves to the bodies of various animals; the water-mites (Hydrarachnidæ) are, at least in part, parasitic upon animals, such as aquatic insects, mollusks, and even mammals. The cheese-mite, Acarus domesticus, is typical of the family Acaridæ and of the whole order. The mange-mite, Demodex folliculorum, type of the family Demodicidæ, is found in the sebaceous follicles of man, as well as in the dog. The itch-mite, which burrows into the skin, is the Sarcoptes scabiei, type of the family Sarcoptidæ. The mites and ticks are also called collectively Acaridea, acaridans, Acarina, and Monomerosomata. See cuts under flour-mite, itch-mite, and harvest-tick.

a, mandibular hooklets; c, hooklets of sternal surface of proboscis; b, d, e, fourth, third, and second joints of the palp; f, base of the suctorial proboscis; g, stigma; h, genital aperture; i, anal valves.

Acaridæ (a-kar'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Acarus + -idæ.] A family of the order Acarida (which see), including the true mites, as the cheese-mite, Acarus domesticus. See Acarus and cheese-mite.

acaridan (a-kar'i-dan), a. and n. I. a. Of or belonging to the Acarida or Acaridæ.

II. n. One of the Acarida.

Acaridea (ak-a-rid'ē-ä), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Acarus + -id-ea.] Same as Acarida.

acarinosis (a-kar-i-nō'sis), n. [NL., ⟨ Acarina + -osis.] A disease, as scabies, produced by the presence of a parasite belonging to the Acarida, or mites.

acaroid (ak'a-roid), a. and n. [⟨ NL. Acarus, q. v., + -oid.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Acarida; resembling the mites; mite-like.—Acaroid gum, a red resin that exudes from the trunks of the Australian grass-tree, Xanthorrhœa hastilis, and other species. Also called Botany Bay resin.—Acaroid resin. Same as acaroid gum.

II. n. One of the Acarida; a mite.

acarpelous (a-kär'pe-lus), a. [⟨ Gr. ἀ- priv. + carpel + -ous.] In bot., having no carpels. Syd. Soc. Lex.

acarpous (a-kär'pus), a. [⟨ Gr. ἄκαρπος, without fruit, ⟨ ἀ- priv. + καρπός, fruit: see carpel.] In bot., not producing fruit; sterile; barren.

Acarus (ak'a-rus), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ἀκαρι, a kind of mite bred in wax, ⟨ ἀκαρής, short, small, tiny; prop. of hair, too short to be cut, ⟨ ἀ- priv. + κείρειν, cut, orig. σκείρειν* = E. shear, q. v.] 1. The typical genus of the family Acaridæ, or true mites.—2. [l. c.] A tick or mite, without regard to its genus. [In this sense it may have a plural form, acari (ak'a-rī).]

The acarus (Myobia coarctata) of the mouse.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 331.

acast† (a-kast'), v. t. [⟨ ME. acasten, akasten, pp. acast, akast, throw away, cast down, ⟨ *a-*1 + casten, cast: see *cast*1.] To cast down; cast off; cast away.

acatalectic (a-kat-a-lek'tik), a. and n. [⟨ L. acatalēcticus, also acatalēctus, ⟨ Gr. ἀκατάληκτος, not stopping, ⟨ ἀ- priv. + κατάληκτος*, καταληκτικός, leaving off, stopping: see catalectic.] I. a. In pros., not halting short; complete; having the complete number of syllables in the last foot: as, an acatalectic verse.

II. n. A verse which has the complete number of syllables in the last foot.

acatalepsy (a-kat'a-lep-si), n. [< Gr. ἀκαταληψία, incomprehensibility, < ἀκατάληπτος, incomprehensible, < ἀ- priv. + κατάληπτος, comprehensible, comprehended, seized: see catalepsy.] 1. Incomprehensibility. A word much used (in its Greek form) by the later Academics and Skeptics (Carneades, Arcesilaus, etc.), who held that human knowledge never amounts to certainty, but only to probability, and who advocated a suspension of judgment upon all questions, even upon the doctrine of acatalepsy itself.

2. In med., uncertainty in the diagnosis or prognosis of diseases.

acataleptic (a-kat-a-lep'tik), a. and n. [< Gr. ἀκατάληπτος, incomprehensible: see acatalepsy.]

I. a. Incomprehensible; not to be known with certainty.

II. n. One who believes that we can know nothing with certainty. See acatalepsy.

All Skeptics and Pyrrhonians were called Acataleptics. Fleming.

acataphasia (a-kat-a-fā'zi-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + καταφάναι, say yes, < κατά, here intensive, + φά-ναι = L. fa-ri, say, speak.] In pathol., faultiness of syntax resulting from disease, as contrasted with the faulty use of individual words. See aphasia.

acataposis (a-ka-tap'ō-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + καταπόσις, a gulping down, deglutition, < καταπίνειν, gulp down, < κατά, down, + πίνειν, drink, πόσις, a drink.] In pathol., difficulty of swallowing; dysphagia.

acate† (a-kāt'), n. [< ME. acate, acat, achate, achat, < OF. acat, assibilated achat, purchase, mod. F. achat (ML. acaptum, accaptum*), < OF. acater, achater, mod. F. acheter, buy, purchase, < ML. accaptare, buy, acquire, < L. ad, to, + captare, take, seize. Cf. accept, of the same origin. Later shortened to cate, cates.] 1. A buying, purchasing, or purchase. Chaucer.— 2. [Usually in pl.] Things purchased; especially, purchased viands or provisions, as opposed to those of home production; hence, especially, dainties, delicacies. Later, cates.

Tout estat est viande aux vers, all states are wormes acates. Cotgrave (under Ver).

Setting before him variety of acates, and those excellently dressed. Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, I. iv. 23.

acater† (a-kā'tėr), n. [< ME. acatour, achatour, -or, < OF. acateor, later achatour, mod. F. acheteur, buyer, < ML. accaptator, buyer, < accaptare, buy: see acate. Later shortened to cater: see cater, n.] A purveyor; a caterer: as, "Robin Hood's bailiff or acater," B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd (dram. pers.). Also written acator, accator, achator, achatour, etc.

A manciple there was of the temple
Of which achators might take ensample. Chaucer.

[The keeper] dressed for him [a prisoner in the Tower of London], from time to time, such pigeons as his acator the cat provided. H. Dixon, Her Majesty's Tower.

acatery†, acatry† (a-kā'tėr-i, -tri), n. [< ME. acatry*, achatry; < acater + -y; later, catery.] 1. Acates in general; provisions purchased. —2. The room or place allotted to the keeping of all such provision as the purveyors purchased for the king.

acatharsia† (ak-ą-thär'si-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκαθαρσία, uncleanness, < ἀκάθαρτος, uncleansed, unpurged, < ἀ- priv. + καθαρτός*, cleansed. Cf. καθαρτικός, fit for cleansing: see cathartic.] In med.: (a) The filth or sordes proceeding from a wound; impurity of blood. (b) Failure to use a purgative; lack of purging.

acatharsy† (ak'ą-thär-si), n. Same as acatharsia.

acathistus (ak-ą-this'tus), n. [ML., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + καθίζειν, sit down, < κατά, down, + ἵζειν = E. sit.] In the Gr. Ch., an office in honor of the Virgin, consisting in a long canon or hymn sung by all standing (whence the name) on the Saturday of the fifth week in Lent, in commemoration of the repulse of the Avars and other barbarians who attacked Constantinople under Heraclius, A. D. 625.

acator†, n. See acater.

acaudal (a-kâ'dąl), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv., a-18, + caudal.] Tailless; anurous. Syd. Soc. Lex.

acaudate (a-kâ'dāt), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv., a-18, + caudate.] Tailless; acaudal; ecaudate.

acaules (a-kâ'lēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + L. caulis, a stem: see caulis.] Plants which have either a very indistinct stalk or none at all, as lichens, fungi, algæ, etc.

acaulescence (ak-â-les'ens), n. [< acaulescent.] In bot., an arrested growth of the main axis, the internodes being so slightly developed that the leaves are crowded into a radial tuft or rosette, as in the dandelion. Also called acaulosia.

acaulescent (ak-â-les'ent), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv., a-18, + caulescent.] In bot., stemless. Applied to a plant in which the stem is apparently absent. Other forms are acauline, acaulose, and acaulous.

acauline (a-kâ'lin), a. [< NL. acaulis (see acaules) + *-ine*1.] Same as acaulescent.

acaulosia (ak-â-lō'zi-ą), n. [NL., < acaulose: see acaulous.] Same as acaulescence.

acaulous, acaulose (a-kâ'lus, -lōs), a. [< NL. acaulis (< Gr. ἀκαυλος, without stalk, < ἀ- priv. + καυλός = L. caulis: see caulis, and cf. acaules) + -ous, -ose.] Same as acaulescent.

acc. An abbreviation (a) of according and according to; (b) of accusative.

acca (ak'ą), n. [Perhaps from Akka (Acre) in Syria, as the seaport whence it was obtained.] A rich figured silk stuff, decorated with gold, used in the fourteenth century.

accable† (a-kā'bl), v. t. [< F. accabler, overwhelm, crush; earlier, in pass. sense, be crushed; < OF. a-, ac- (< L. ad), to, + caable, cadable, < ML. cadabula, a catapult, < Gr. κατα-βολή, a throwing down, < καταβάλλειν, throw down, < κατά, down, + βάλλειν, to throw: see cablish and catapult.] To overwhelm; oppress; overburden.

Honours have no burden but thankfulness, which doth rather raise men's spirits than accable them or press them down. Bacon, vi. 272. (Latham.)

Accad (ak'ad), n. 1. A member of one of the primitive races of Babylonia. The Accads are believed to have been of non-Semitic origin, and to have been the dominant race at the earliest time of which there are contemporaneous records.

The Accadai, or Accads, were "the Highlanders," who had descended from the mountainous region of Elam on the east, and it was to them that the Assyrians ascribed the origin of Chaldean civilization and writing. A. H. Sayce.

2. The language of this race; Accadian. Also spelled Akkad.

Accadian (a-kā'di-an), a. and n. I. a. Belonging to the Accads, the primitive inhabitants of Babylonia.

II. n. 1. An Accad.—2. The language of the Accads, a non-Semitic and perhaps Ural-Altaic language spoken in ancient Babylonia previously to the later and better-known Semitic dialect of the cuneiform inscriptions. A kindred dialect, the Sumerian, seems to have been in use at the same time in Babylonia.

Also spelled Akkadian.

accapitum (a-kap'i-tum), n. [ML., < L. ad, to, + caput, head.] In feudal law, money paid by a vassal upon his admission to a feud; the relief due to the chief lord.

accator†, n. See acater.

accedas ad curiam (ak-sē'das ad kū'ri-am). [L., go thou to the court: see accede, ad-, curia.] In law, a writ directed to the sheriff for the purpose of removing a cause from a lower to a higher court.

accede (ak-sēd'), v. i.; pret. and pp. acceded, ppr. acceding. [= F. accéder = Sp. Pg. acceder = It. accedere, < L. accēdere, earlier adcēdere, move toward, < ad, to, + cēdere, go, move: see cede.] 1. To come, as into union or possession; become adjoined or entitled; attain by approach or succession: now used chiefly of attainment to a possession, office, or dignity: as, he acceded to the estate on his majority; the house of Hanover acceded to the English throne in 1714.

And vain were courage, learning; all,
Till power accede. Shenstone, Ruined Abbey.

2. To come by assent or agreement; give adhesion; yield; give in: as, to accede to one's terms or request.

This obvious reflection convinced me of the absurdity of the treaty of Hanover, in 1725, between France and England, to which the Dutch afterwards acceded.
Chesterfield, Letters, 162.

There are many who would accede without the faintest reluctance to a barbarous custom, but would be quite incapable of an equally barbarous act which custom had not consecrated. Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 305.

= Syn. 1. To succeed, come (to), attain.—2. To agree, assent, yield, consent, comply.

accedence (ak-sē'dens), n. [< F. accédence, < accéder: see accede and -ence.] The act or action of acceding; the act of assenting or agreeing. [Rare.]

accedence†, n. An error for *accidence*1. Milton.

acceder (ak-sē'dėr), n. One who accedes; one who attains to a possession, an office, or a dignity; one who yields or assents.

accelerando (ät-chā-le-rän'dō), adv. [It., ppr. of accelerare, < L. accelerare, hasten: see accelerate.] With gradual increase of speed: a direction in music, indicating that a passage is to be played with increasing rapidity.

accelerate (ak-sel'ę-rāt), v.; pret. and pp. accelerated, ppr. accelerating. [< L. acceleratus, pp. of accelerare, hasten, make haste, < ad, to, + celerare, hasten, < celer, quick.] I. trans. 1. To make quicker; cause to move or advance faster; hasten; add to the velocity of; give a higher rate of progress to: as, to accelerate motion or the rate of motion; to accelerate the transmission of intelligence; to accelerate the growth of a plant, or the progress of knowledge.

Leave to the diamond its ages to grow, nor expect to accelerate the births of the eternal.
Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 191.

2. To bring nearer in time; bring about, or help to bring about, more speedily than would otherwise have been the case: as, to accelerate the ruin of a government; to accelerate death. —Accelerated motion, in mech., that motion the velocity of which is undergoing change. See acceleration.—Accelerating force, the force which produces an accelerated motion, as gravity.—Accelerating gun, a cannon having supplementary powder-chambers, designed to be fired in turn, immediately after the main explosion, to accelerate the speed of the shot; an accelerator. = Syn. See list under quicken, 3.

II. intrans. To become faster; increase in speed.

acceleratedly (ak-sel'ę-rā-ted-li), adv. In an accelerated or accelerating manner; with acceleration or gradual increase of speed.

acceleration (ak-sel-ę-rā'shon), n. [< L. acceleratio(n-), a hastening, < accelerare, hasten: see accelerate.] The act of accelerating, or the state of being accelerated: as—(a) A gradual increase of velocity.

At the present time, and for several thousand years in the future, the variation in the moon's motion has been and will be an acceleration.
Thomson and Tait, Nat. Phil., I. ¶ 830.

(b) In mech., the rate of change of the velocity of a moving body; that is, the increment of velocity (in any direction) in the unit of time which would result were the rate of change to continue uniform for that length of time. The acceleration is said to be uniform if the body gains the same velocity in any constant direction in equal successive portions of time, no matter how small these portions may be taken. A constant force produces uniform acceleration in all cases; but it is sometimes convenient to substitute for some of the forces fictitious "constraints." Thus, gravity (which near the earth's surface is sensibly a constant force) gives a falling body uniformly accelerated motion when the effect of the atmospheric resistance is eliminated; in this case the increment of velocity in each second, which is a little more than 32 feet, is called the acceleration of gravity, and in mechanical formulas is denoted by the letter g. When the velocity of a moving body continually diminishes, the acceleration is termed minus or negative, and the motion is said to be retarded; this is illustrated by the case of a ball thrown upward, the upward component of the velocity of which diminishes at the rate of 32 feet a second. Similarly, the force of friction which resists the motion of a sliding body is said to give it minus or negative acceleration.

Acceleration, like position and velocity, is a relative term, and cannot be interpreted absolutely.
Clerk Maxwell, Matter and Motion, art. xxxv.

(c) The shortening of the time between the present and the happening of any future event; specifically, in law, the shortening of the time before the vesting of a person with the possession of an expected interest. (d) In physiol. and pathol., increased activity of the functions of the body, particularly of the circulation of the fluids.—Acceleration of the moon, the increase of the moon's mean angular velocity about the earth, the moon now moving rather faster than in ancient times. This phenomenon has not been fully explained, but it is known to be partly owing to the slow diminution of the eccentricity of the earth's orbit, from which there results a slight diminution of the sun's influence on the moon's motions.—Acceleration and retardation of the tides, certain deviations between the time of the actual occurrence of high water at any place and what its time would be if it occurred after the lapse of a uniform mean interval. In spring and neap tides the sun's action does not alter the time of high water, as in the former case the solar and lunar tides are synchronous, while in the latter the time of actual or lunar low water and that of solar high water are the same. But in the first and third quarters of the moon there is acceleration or priming of high water, as the solar wave is to the west of the lunar; and in the second and fourth quarters there is retardation or lagging, for an analogous reason.—Diurnal acceleration of the fixed stars, the excess of the apparent diurnal motion of the stars over that of the sun, arising from the fact that the sun's apparent yearly motion takes place in a direction contrary to that of its apparent daily motion. The stars thus seem each day to anticipate the sun by nearly 3 minutes and 56 seconds of mean time.

accelerative (ak-sel'ę-rā-tiv), a. [< accelerate + -ive.] Tending to accelerate; adding to velocity; quickening progression.

accelerator (ak-sel'ę-rā-tọr), n. [NL., etc., < accelerate.] One who or that which accelerates; a hastener. Hence—(a) In England, a post-office van. (b) In anat., a muscle, the accelerator urinæ, which expedites the discharge of urine. (c) In photog.: (1) Any substance or device which shortens the time of exposure of a sensitized plate or paper to the light, in either the camera or the printing-frame. (2) Any chemical which may be added to the developing solution to shorten the time necessary for development, or, by increasing the normal efficiency of the developer, to lessen the requisite time of exposure. (d) An accelerating gun. See accelerate.

acceleratory (ak-sel′e-rā-tō-ri), a. Accelerating or tending to accelerate; quickening motion.

accend† (ak-send′), v. t. [< L. accendĕre, set on fire, burn, < ad, to, + candĕre*, burn, found only in comp. (see incense, v.), allied to candēre, glow: see candid.] To set on fire; kindle; inflame.

Our devotion, if sufficiently accended, would burn up innumerable books of this sort.
Dr. H. More, Decay of Christ. Piety.

accendent (ak-sen′dent), n. [< L. accenden(t-)s, ppr. of accendĕre: see accend.] Same as accensor.

accendibility (ak-sen-di-bil′i-ti), n. [< accendible: see -bility.] The quality of being accendible; inflammability.

accendible (ak-sen′di-bl), a. [< accend + -ible. Cf. L. accensibilis, that may be burned, burning.] Capable of being inflamed or kindled.

accendite (ak-sen′di-tē), n. [L. accendite, 2d pers. pl. impv. of accendĕre, light, kindle: see accend.] A short antiphon formerly chanted in the Roman Catholic Church on lighting the tapers for any special service.

accension (ak-sen′shon), n. [= Pg. accensão = It. accensione, < L. as if accensio(n-)*, < accensus, pp. of accendĕre: see accend.] The act of kindling or setting on fire; the state of being kindled; inflammation; heat. [Rare.]

Comets, . . . besides the light that they may have from the sun, seem to shine with a light that is nothing else but an accension, which they receive from the sun.
Locke, Elem. of Nat. Phil., ii.

★accensor (ak-sen′sor), n. [< ML. accensor, a lamplighter, < L. accendĕre, pp. accensus: see accend.] One who sets on fire or kindles. [Rare.]

★accent (ak′sent), n. [< F. accent = Sp. acento = Pg. It. accento, < L. accentus, accent, tone, LL. also a blast, signal, fig. intensity, < accinere, sing to (see accentor), < L. ad, to, + canere, sing: see cant[2] and chant.] 1. A special effort of utterance by which, in a word of two or more syllables, one syllable is made more prominent than the rest. This prominence is given in part by a raised pitch, in part by increased force or stress of voice, and in part (as a consequence of these) by a fuller pronunciation of the constituents of the syllable. These elements are variously combined in different languages. In English, elevation of pitch is conspicuous when a word is spoken or read by itself as a word, without any reference to a sentence of which it forms or should form a part; but in connected speech the tone and modulation of the sentence dominate those of the individual words composing it, and the change of pitch may be absent, or even reversed, the other elements giving without its aid the required prominence. By the native grammarians of the classical languages of our family (Greek, Latin, and Sanskrit), change of pitch was the recognized constituent of accent. They called a syllable acute if its tone was sharpened or raised, grave if it remained at the general level of utterance, and circumflex if it began at acute pitch and ended at grave. A word of three or more syllables often has in our language, besides its principal accent, another and lighter or secondary one, or even also a third; such secondary accents are denoted in this work by a double accent-mark; thus, val″e-tu-di-na′ri-an, an″te-pe-nul′ti-mate. The vowels of wholly unaccented syllables in English are much modified, being either made briefer and lighter, or else reduced even to the sound of the so-called neutral vowel, the "short u" of but. These two effects are marked in this work by writing respectively a single or a double dot under the vowel, in the respelling for pronunciation. Emphasis differs from accent in being expended upon a word which is to be made prominent in the sentence.

2. A mark or character used in writing to direct the stress of the voice in pronunciation, or to mark a particular tone, length of vowel-sound, or the like. There is commonly only one such sign (′) used to mark the stress or accent in English, except in works on elocution, in which are employed the three Greek accents, namely, the acute (′), the grave (‵), and the circumflex (‾ or ^). In elocution the first shows when the voice is to be raised, and is called the rising inflection; the second, when it is to be depressed, and is called the falling inflection; and the third, when the vowel is to be uttered with an undulating sound, and is called the compound or waving inflection. An accent over the e in -ed is sometimes used in English poetry to denote that it is to be pronounced as a distinct syllable: as, lovèd or lovëd.

3. In printing, an accented or marked letter; a type bearing an accentual or diacritical mark. The accents most generally used in English type (chiefly for foreign words), and regularly furnished in a full font, are the vowels bearing the acute (′), grave (‵), and circumflex (^) accents, and the dieresis (¨), and also the cedilla or French c (ç) and the Spanish n (ñ). Accents for occasional use are the vowels marked long (‾) and short (˘), and other marked letters required for technical works or peculiar to certain languages.

4. Manner of utterance; peculiarity of pronunciation, emphasis, or expression. Specifically, a peculiar modulation of the voice or manner of pronunciation, marked by subtle differences of elocution, characteristic of the spoken language of a given district or a particular rank in society, and especially of each distinct nationality.

Your accent is something finer than you could purchase in so removed a dwelling. Shak., As you Like it, iii. 2.

Mild was his accent, and his action free.
Dryden, Tales from Chaucer, Good Parson, l. 16.

5. Words, or tones and modulations of the voice, expressive of some emotion or passion: as, the accents of prayer; the accent of reproof.

Short-winded accents of new broils.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 1.

The tender accents of a woman's cry. Prior.

6. pl. Words, language, or expressions in general.

Winds! on your wings to heaven her accents bear,
Such words as heaven alone is fit to hear.
Dryden, Virgil's Eclogues, iii.

Deep on their souls the mighty accents fall,
Like lead that pierces through the walls of clay.
Jones Very, Poems, p. 77.

7. In music: (a) In anc. Heb. poetry, certain diacritical marks supposed to indicate habitual vocal inflections, but the meaning of which is lost. (b) In Gregorian music, one of the seven recognized modulations or inflections used in chanting prose liturgical formulæ. (c) An obsolete vocal embellishment equivalent to the appoggiatura or the acciaccatura, or sometimes to the full portamento, or, again, to the aspiration. (d) Stress or emphasis, either that which regularly recurs as a feature of rhythm (often called grammatical accent), or some unusual emphasis called forth by the peculiarity of a phrase or of the harmony (often called rhetorical accent). (e) In notation, a mark added to a letter-name to designate the octave intended. See octave, 2 (e).

The sense comprising rhythm, accent, and numberless delicate gradations. Macfarran, Harmony, i. 4.

8. In math. and mech.: (a) In all literal notation, a mark like an acute accent placed after a letter in order that it may, without confusion, be used to represent different quantities. In this way $a\,b\,c$, $a'\,b'\,c'$, $a''\,b''\,c''$, etc., may stand for magnitudes as different in value as those which, but for the use of the accents, must be represented by different letters. Letters so marked are read thus: a prime or first (a′), a second (a″), a third (a‴), etc. (b) In geom. and trigon., a mark at the right hand of a number indicating minutes of a degree, two such marks indicating seconds: as, $20°\,10'\,30'' = 20$ degrees, 10 minutes, 30 seconds. (c) In mensur. and engin., a mark at the right hand of a number used to denote feet, inches, and lines; thus, $3'\,6''\,7''' = 3$ feet, 6 inches, 7 lines. (d) In plans and drawings, a mark similarly used after repeated letters or figures, to indicate related or corresponding parts, and read as in algebra. See above, (a). = Syn. See emphasis and inflection.

accent (ak-sent′), v. t. [< F. accenter = It. accentare; from the noun. Cf. accentuate.] 1. To express the accent of; pronounce or utter with a particular stress or modulation of the voice: as, to accent a word properly.—2. To give expression to; utter.

Congeal'd with grief, can scarce implore Strength to accent, Here my Albertus lies. W. Wotton.

3. To mark with a written accent or accents: as, to accent a word in order to indicate its pronunciation.—4. To emphasize; dwell upon; accentuate (which see).—Accented letter, in printing, a letter marked with an accent. See accent, n., 3.—Accented parts of a bar, in music, those parts of the bar on which the stress falls, as the first and third parts of the bar in common time.

accentor (ak-sen′tor), n. [LL., one who sings with another, < accinere, sing to or with, < L. ad, to, + canere, sing.] 1. In music, one who sings the leading part.—2. [F. accenteur.] In ornith.: (a) [cap.] A genus of passerine birds, family Sylviidæ, subfamily Accentorinæ. A. modularis is the European hedge-sparrow, hedge-warbler, shuffle-wing, or dunnock. Bechstein, 1802. See hedge-sparrow. (b) A name sometimes applied to the golden-crowned thrush or oven-bird, Siurus auricapillus, a well-known passerine bird of the United States, of the family Sylvicolidæ. Coues.

Hedge-sparrow (Accentor modularis).

Accentorinæ (ak-sen-tō-rī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Accentor + -inæ.] A subfamily of birds, of the order Passeres and family Sylviidæ, including the genus Accentor (which see). G. R. Gray, 1840.

accentual (ak-sen′tū-al), a. and n. [= It. accentuale, < L. as if accentualis*, < accentus, accent.] I. a. Pertaining to accent; rhythmical.

Diderot's choice of prose was dictated and justified by the accentual poverty of his mother-tongue.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 342.

The term figurate which we now employ to distinguish florid from simple melody was used to denote that which was simply rhythmical or accentual.
W. Mason, Essay on Church Music, p. 28.

Accentual feet, meters, etc., those in which the rhythmical beat or ictus coincides with the syllabic accent or stress, as in modern poetry: opposed to quantitative feet, meters, etc., in which the ictus falls upon syllables literally long or prolonged in time, as in ancient Greek and Latin poetry. See quantity.

II. n. An accent-mark.

accentuality (ak-sen-tū-al′i-ti), n. The quality of being accentual.

accentually (ak-sen′tū-al-i), adv. In an accentual manner; with regard to accent.

accentuate (ak-sen′tū-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. accentuated, ppr. accentuating. [< LL. accentuatus, pp. of accentuare (> F. accentuer = Sp. acentuar = Pg. accentuar = It. accentuare), < L. accentus, accent: see accent, n.] 1. To mark or pronounce with an accent or with accents; place an accent or accents on.—2. To lay stress upon; emphasize; give prominence to; mark as of importance: as, he accentuated the views of the party on this question.

Still more to accentuate this effusive welcome to a Turkish official in Turkish waters.
Fortnightly Rev., Oct. 13, 1883, p. 69.

accentuated (ak-sen′tū-ā-ted), p. a. Strongly marked; strong; prominent; very distinct: as, accentuated features; an accentuated fault of manner.

The diagnostic value of an accentuated cardiac second sound. Edin. Med. Jour., June, 1863.

accentuation (ak-sen-tū-ā′shon), n. [< LL. accentuatio(n-), < accentuare: see accentuate.] 1. The act of accentuating or of marking accent or stress in speech or writing; the state of being accented or accentuated.—2. The mode of indicating accent; accentual notation.—3. The act of emphasizing or laying stress; a bringing into prominence.

A perpetual straining after the abstract idea or law of change, the constant accentuation, as it is called, of principle in historical writing, invariably marks a narrow view of truth, a want of mastery over details, and a bias towards foregone conclusions. Stubbs, Const. Hist., III. 518.

There is no accentuation of the distinctively feminine charms [of Athena in the Parthenon frieze]; nay, from one aspect the head is almost boyish in character.
The Century, XXVII. 179.

accentus (ak-sen′tus), n. [ML.: see accent.] In ancient church music, that part of the service which is sung or recited by the priest and his assistants at the altar, in contradistinction to concentus, the part sung by the whole choir.

accept (ak-sept′), v. t. [< ME. accepten, < OF. accepter, acepter, F. accepter = Pr. acceptar = Sp. aceptar = Pg. aceitar = It. accettare, < L. acceptare, receive, a freq. of accipere, pp. acceptus, receive, < ad, to, + capere, take: see caption.] 1. To take or receive (something offered); receive with approbation or favor: as, he made an offer which was accepted.

Bless, Lord, his substance, and accept the work of his hands. Deut. xxxiii. 11.

If you accept them, then their worth is great.
Shak., T. of the S., ii. 1.

2. To take (what presents itself or what befalls one); accommodate one's self to: as, to accept the situation.

They carry it off well, these fair moving mountains, and like all French women accept frankly their natural fortunes. Fraser's Mag.

3. To listen favorably to; grant.

Sweet prince, accept their suit. Shak., Rich. III., iii. 7.

4. To receive or admit and agree to; accede or assent to: as, to accept a treaty, a proposal, an amendment, an excuse: often followed by of: as, I accept of the terms.

He [Wordsworth] accepted the code of freedom and brotherhood as he would have accepted the proclamation of a new and noble king . . . whose reign was to bring in the golden age.
Mrs. Oliphant, Lit. Hist. of 19th Cent., I. vi.

5. To receive in a particular sense; understand: as, how is this phrase to be accepted?—6. In com., to acknowledge, by signature, as calling for payment, and thus to promise to pay: as, to accept a bill of exchange, that is, to acknowledge the obligation to pay it when due. See acceptance.—7. In a deliberative body, to receive as a sufficient performance of the duty with which an officer or a committee has been charged; receive for further action: as, the report of the committee was accepted.—Syn. 1. Take, etc. See receive.

accept† (ak-sept′), p. a. [< ME. accept, < L. acceptus, pp. of accipere, accept: see accept, v.] Accepted.

In tyme accept, or wel plesynge, I haue herd thee.
Wyclif, 2 Cor. vi. 2.

We will suddenly Pass our accept and peremptory answer.
Shak., Hen. V., v. 2.

[In the latter passage the word has been taken to mean acceptance.]

acceptability (ak-sep-ta-bil′i-ti), n. [< acceptable: see -bility.] The quality of being acceptable or agreeable; acceptableness.

acceptable (ak-sep′ta-bl, formerly ak′sep-tā-bl), a. [< ME. acceptable, < L. acceptabilis, worthy of acceptance, < acceptare, receive: see accept.] Capable, worthy, or sure of being accepted or received with pleasure; hence, pleasing to the receiver; gratifying; agreeable; welcome: as, an acceptable present.

What acceptable audit canst thou leave?
Shak., Sonnets, iv.

This woman, whom thou mad'st to be my help, . . .
So fit, so acceptable, so divine. Milton, P. L., x. 139.

acceptableness (ak-sep′ta-bl-nes), n. Same as acceptability.

acceptably (ak-sep′ta-bli), adv. In an acceptable manner; in a manner to please or give satisfaction.

Let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably. Heb. xii. 28.

★acceptance (ak-sep′tans), n. [< OF. acceptance: see acceptant.] 1. The act of accepting, or the fact of being accepted. (a) The act of taking or receiving anything offered; a receiving with approbation or satisfaction; favorable reception.

They shall come up with acceptance on mine altar.
Isa. lx. 7.

Such with him finds no acceptance. Milton, P. L., v. 530.

(b) The act of receiving and assenting to something stated or propounded, as a theory, etc. (c) The act of agreeing to terms or proposals, and thereby becoming bound. Specifically—(1) In law, an agreeing to the offer or contract of another by some act which binds the person in law. Thus, if a person receiving an estate in remainder takes rent on a lease made by his predecessor, this is an acceptance of the terms of the lease, and binds the party receiving to abide by the terms of the lease. (2) In com., an engagement, by the person on whom a bill of exchange is drawn, to pay the bill: usually made by the person writing the word "Accepted" across the bill and signing his name, or simply writing his name across or at the end of the bill. Acceptances are of three principal kinds: general or unqualified, when no limiting or qualifying words are added; special, when expressed as payable at some particular bank; and qualified, when expressed to be for a less sum than that for which the bill was originally drawn, or when some variation in the time or mode of payment is introduced. Acceptance supra protest, or for honor, is acceptance by some third person, after protest for non-acceptance by the drawee, with the view of saving the honor of the drawer or of some particular indorser.

2. A bill of exchange that has been accepted, or the sum contained in it.—3†. The sense in which a word or expression is understood; signification; meaning; acceptation.

An assertion . . . under the common acceptance of it not only false but odious. South.

Acceptance with God, in theol., forgiveness of sins and reception into God's favor.—Syn. Acceptance, Acceptancy, Acceptation. See acceptation.

acceptancy (ak-sep′tan-si), n. The act of accepting; acceptance; willingness to receive or accept.

Here's a proof of gift,
But here's no proof, sir, of acceptancy.
Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, ii. 1057.

—Syn. Acceptancy, Acceptance, Acceptation. See acceptation.

acceptant (ak-sep′tant), a. and n. [< F. acceptant, < L. acceptan(t-)s, ppr. of acceptare: see accept.] I. a. Receptive. N. E. D.

II. n. 1. One who accepts; an accepter. Specifically—2. [cap.] One of the French bishops and clergy who accepted the bull Unigenitus, issued in 1713 by Pope Clement XI. against the Jansenists.

acceptation (ak-sep-tā′shon), n. [= Sp. aceptación = Pg. aceitação = It. accettazione, < L. as if acceptatio(n-)*, < acceptare, receive: see accept.] 1†. The act of accepting or receiving; reception; acceptance: as, the acceptation of a trust.

All are rewarded with like coldness of acceptation.
Sir P. Sidney.

2. The state of being accepted or acceptable; favorable regard; hence, credence; belief.

This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.
1 Tim. i. 15.

Some things . . . are notwithstanding of so great dignity and acceptation with God. Hooker, Eccles. Pol., ii.

[Richard Cromwell] spake also with general acceptation and applause when he made his speech before the Parliament, even far beyond the Lord Fynes.
Quoted by Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 261.

3. The meaning or sense in which a word or statement is taken or understood: as, this term is to be understood in its usual acceptation.

Genius is a word which, in common acceptation, extends much further than to the objects of taste. H. Blair, Lect.

—Syn. Acceptance, Acceptancy, Acceptation. These words have been used interchangeably, but there is a marked tendency to use acceptance for the act of accepting, and acceptation for the state of being accepted, acceptancy having become rare, or being restricted to poetic use.

It is in vain to stand out against the full acceptance of a word which is supported by so much and so respectable authority. Whitney, Lang. and Study of Lang., p. 41.

To reanimate this drooping but Divine truth of human regeneration, by lifting it out of its almost wholly lapsed and lifeless — because merely ritual — private acceptation, and giving it a grander public application.
H. James, Subs. and Shad., p. 154.

accepted (ak-sep′ted), p. a. 1. Acceptable; chosen; appointed.

Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation. 2 Cor. vi. 2.

2. In com., received or acknowledged as binding: often abbreviated to a. or A. See acceptance, 1 (c) (2).

accepter (ak-sep′tėr), n. 1. A person who accepts. Specifically, in com., the person who accepts a bill of exchange so as to bind himself to pay the sum specified in it. [In this specific sense most frequently written acceptor (which see).]

2†. One who favors unduly; a respecter.

God is no accepter of persons; neither riches nor poverty are a means to procure his favour.
Chillingworth, Sermons, iii. § 33.

acceptilate (ak-sep′ti-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. acceptilated, ppr. acceptilating. [< acceptilation.] To discharge (a debt) by acceptilation.

acceptilation (ak-sep-ti-lā′shon), n. [< L. acceptilatio(n-), also written separately accepti latio(n-), a formal discharging from a debt, lit. a bearing of a receipt: accepti, gen. of acceptum, a receipt, pp. neut. of accipere, receive (see accept, v.); latio(n-), a bearing, < latus, pp., associated with ferre = E. bear[1]: see ablative, and cf. legislation.] 1. In civil and Scots law, the verbal extinction of a verbal contract, with a declaration that the debt has been paid when it has not, or the acceptance of something merely imaginary in satisfaction of a verbal contract. Wharton. Hence—2†. In theol., the free forgiveness of sins by God, for Christ's sake. The word (acceptilatio) was used by Duns Scotus, in whose writings it first appears as a theological term, to signify the doctrine that God accepts the sufferings of Christ as a satisfaction to justice, though in strictness they are not so, as opposed to the notion that Christ's sufferings were infinite, and therefore a full and actual satisfaction for the sins of mankind.

Our justification which comes by Christ is by imputation and acceptilation, by grace and favour.
Jer. Taylor, Ans. to Bp. of Rochester.

acception† (ak-sep′shon), n. [< ME. accepcioun, < OF. acception = Sp. acepción = Pg. acepção, < L. acceptio(n-), < accipere, receive: see accept.] 1. Acceptation.

The diverse acceptions of words which the schoolmen call suppositions effect no homonymy.
Burgersdicius, trans. by a Gentleman, I. xxvi. 12.

That this hath been esteemed the due and proper acception of this word, I shall testify.
Hammond, Fundamentals.

2. The act of favoring unequally; preference.

For accepciouns of persoones, that is, to putte oon bifore another withoute desert, is not anentis God.
Wyclif, Rom. ii. 11.

★acceptive† (ak-sep′tiv), a. Ready to accept.

The people generally are very acceptive and apt to applaud any meritable work.
B. Jonson, Case is Altered, ii. 7.

acceptor (ak-sep′tôr or -tėr), n. [After L. acceptor, one who receives, < accipere, receive: see accept, v.] Same as accepter, but more frequent in commercial and legal use.—Acceptor supra protest, a person, not a party to a bill of exchange which has been protested, who accepts it for the honor of the drawer or of an indorser, thereby agreeing to pay it if the drawee does not.

acceptress (ak-sep′tres), n. A female acceptor. [Rare.]

accerse† (ak-sėrs′), v. t. [< L. accersere, commonly arcessere (prefix ar-, < ad-, to), summon, cause to come, < accedere, come: see accede.] To call out or forth; summon, as an army. Hall. [Rare.]

access (ak′ses, formerly ak-ses′), n. [< ME. acces, aksis, axes (nearly always in sense 5), < OF. acces (also spelled aces, acex, aches, axces), approach, attack, F. accès = Sp. acceso = Pg. It. accesso, < L. accessus, approach, passage, increase, < accedere, go to: see accede.] 1. A coming to; near approach; admittance; admission: as, to gain access to a prince.

We are denied access unto his person.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 1.

2. Means of approach or admission; way of entrance or passage to anything: as, the access is through a massive door or a long corridor, or by a neck of land.

All access was throng'd. Milton, P. L., i. 761.

Then closed her access to the wealthier farms.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

3. Admission to sexual intercourse.

During coverture access of the husband shall be presumed, unless the contrary be shown. Blackstone.

4. Addition; increase; accession.

I, from the influence of thy looks, receive Access in every virtue. Milton, P. L., ix. 310.

5. The attack or return of a fit or paroxysm of disease, as of a fever; accession.

Every wight gan waxen for accesse
A leche anon. Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 1578.

The first access looked like an apoplexy.
Bp. Burnet, Hist. of Own Times.

The most efficient and certain means for stimulating the cerebral cortex, in order to provoke an epileptic access, is electrization. Alien. and Neurol., VI. 8.

6. The approach of the priest to the altar for the purpose of celebrating the eucharist.—7. In canon law, a right to a certain benefice at some future time, now in abeyance through lack of required age or some other conditions: if in abeyance through actual possession of another, it is equivalent to the right of succession. See coadjutor. Ingress is a right, in virtue of some previous stipulation, to a benefice resigned before entered upon; regress, to a benefice actually renounced. The Council of Trent and succeeding popes abolished such titles, as tending to make benefices hereditary; since then they have existed in Roman Catholic countries only in particular instances and by a special pontifical privilege. —Prayer of humble access, a prayer said by the celebrant in his own behalf and in that of the people before communicating. In the Roman Catholic and Greek liturgies it is used shortly before the communion of the priest. In the present Book of Common Prayer it precedes the Consecration.

accessarily, accessariness, etc. See accessorily, accessoriness, etc.

accessary (ak-ses′a-ri or ak′ses-ā-ri), n. [< L. as if accessarius*, < accessus, access: see access. Now mixed with accessory, a. and n. Strictly the noun (a person) should be accessary, the adj. (and noun, a thing) accessory; but the distinction is too fine to be maintained. See -ary, -ory.] Same as accessory.

accessibility (ak-ses-i-bil′i-ti), n. [= F. accessibilité = It. accessibilità, < LL. accessibilitā(t-)s, < accessibilis, accessible: see accessible.] The condition or quality of being accessible, or of admitting approach.

accessible (ak-ses′i-bl), a. [= F. accessible = Sp. accesible = Pg. accessivel = It. accessibile, < LL. accessibilis, accessible, < L. accessus, pp. of accedere, go to, approach: see accede.] Capable of being approached or reached; easy of access; approachable; attainable: as, an accessible town or mountain; the place is accessible by a concealed path.

Most frankly accessible, most affable, . . . most sociable.
Barrow, Works, I. 260.

Proofs accessible to all the world.
Buckle, Hist. Civilization, I. i.

accessibly (ak-ses′i-bli), adv. In an accessible manner; so as to be accessible.

accession (ak-sesh′on), n. [= F. accession, < OF. accessioun = Sp. accesión = Pg. accessão = It. accessione, < L. accessio(n-), a going to, an approach, attack, increase, < accessus, pp. of accedere, go to: see accede.] 1. A coming, as into the possession of a right or station; attainment; entrance; induction: as, the accession of the people to political power, or to the ballot; accession to an estate, or to the throne.

The king, at his accession, takes an oath to maintain all the rights, liberties, franchises, and customs, written or unwritten. J. Adams, Works, IV. 376.

2. The act of acceding, as by assent or agreement; consent; junction; adhesion: as, accession to a demand or proposal; their accession to the party or confederacy was a great gain.

Declaring their acquiescence in and accession to the determination made by Congress.
S. Williams, Hist. Vermont, p. 283. (N. E. D.)

3. Increase by something added; that which is added; augmentation; addition: as, an accession of wealth, territory, or numbers.

The only accession which the Roman Empire received was the province of Britain. Gibbon.

The yule log drew an unusually large accession of guests around the Christmas hearth.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 17.

The ship brought but twenty passengers, and quenched all hope of immediate accessions.
Bancroft, Hist. U. S., I. 285.

4. In law, a mode of acquiring property, by which the owner of a corporeal substance which receives an addition by growth or by the application of labor has a right to the thing added or to the improvement, as an addition to a house made by a tenant under an ordinary lease.—5. In med., the attack, approach, or commencement of a disease; access.—6. In the election of a pope, the transference of votes from one candidate to another, when the scrutiny has not resulted in a choice. The opportunity of doing this is called an accessit (which see).—Deed of accession, in Scots law, a deed executed by the creditors of a bankrupt, by which they approve of a trust given by their debtor for the general behoof, and bind themselves to concur in the plans proposed for extricating his affairs.=Syn. 2. Consent, compliance, assent, acquiescence.—3. Increase, addition, increment, extension, augmentation.

accessional (ak-sesh'ọn-al), a. [=Pg. accessional, < L. as if accessionalis*: see accession.] Consisting in or due to accession; giving increase or enlargement; additional.

The specific and accessional perfections which the human understanding derives from it. Coleridge.

I regard that, rather, as a superinduced, collateral, accessional fame, a necessity of greatness.
R. Choate, Addresses, p. 522.

accessit (ak-ses'it), n. [L., he has come near, 3d pers. sing. perf. ind. of accedere, to come to or near: see accede.] 1. In English and other colleges, a certificate or prize awarded to a student of second (or lower) merit: as, second accessit, third, fourth, etc., accessit.—2. In the election of a pope, an opportunity given the members of the conclave, after each ballot, to revise their votes.

Every morning a ballot is cast, followed in the evening by an "accessit"; that is, if the morning ballot has led to no result, any of the electors is allowed to transfer his vote to that one of the candidates whom he can expect thereby to get elected. Schaff-Herzog, Encyc., I. 521.

accessive† (ak-ses'iv), a. [< ML. accessivus (rare, and special sense uncertain, but lit. 'additional'), < L. accessus, addition: see access.] Additional; contributory.

God "opened the eyes of one that was born blind" and had increased this cæcity by his own accessive and excessive wickedness. Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 379.

accessorial (ak-se-sō'ri-al), a. Pertaining to an accessory: as, accessorial agency.

Mere accessorial guilt was not enough to convict him.
R. Choate, Addresses, p. 265.

accessorily (ak-ses'ọ-ri-li or ak'se-sō-ri-li), adv. In the manner of an accessory; not as principal, but as a subordinate agent. Also written accessarily.

accessoriness (ak-ses'ō-ri-nes or ak'se-sō-ri-nes), n. The state of being accessory, or of being or acting as an accessory. Also written ★accessariness.

accessorius (ak-se-sō'ri-us), a. and n.; pl. accessorii (-i). [ML.: see accessory.] In anat., accessory, or an accessory. Applied—(a) To several muscles: as, musculus accessorius ad sacro-lumbalem, the accessory muscle of the sacro-lumbalis, passing, in man, by successive slips, from the six lower to the six upper ribs; accessorii orbicularis superiores, accessorii orbicularis inferiores, certain superior and inferior additional or accessory muscular fibers of the orbicularis oris muscle of man; flexor accessorius, the accessory flexor of the sole of the foot of man, arising by two heads from the os calcis or heel-bone, and inserted into the tendon of the long flexor of the toes (flexor longus digitorum). (b) To the eleventh pair of cranial nerves, also called the spinal accessory nerves. They give filaments to the vagus, ★and innervate the sterno-mastoid and trapezius muscles.

accessory (ak-ses'ọ-ri or ak'se-sō-ri), a. and n. [=F. accessoire = Sp. accesorio = Pg. It. accessorio, < ML. accessorius, < L. accessus, pp. of accedere: see accede, and cf. accessary.] I. a. 1. (Of persons.) Acceding; contributing; aiding in producing some effect, or acting in subordination to the principal agent: usually in a bad sense: as, accessory to a felony. Technically, in law, it implies aiding without being present at the act.—2. (Of things.) (a) Contributing to a general effect; aiding in certain acts or effects in a secondary manner; belonging to something else as principal; accompanying: as, accessory sounds in music; accessory muscles. (b) Additional, or of the nature of an appendage: as, accessory buds are developed by the side of or above the normal axillary bud.—Accessory action, in Scots law, an action in some degree subservient or ancillary to another action.—Accessory contract, one made for the purpose of assuring the performance of a prior contract, either by the same parties or by others, such as a suretyship, a mortgage, or a pledge. Bouvier.—Accessory disk, the thin, slightly dim, and anisotropous disk seen near the intermediate disk in certain forms and conditions of striated muscle-fibers.—Accessory fruits, those fruits a considerable portion of whose substance is distinct from the seed-vessel and formed of the accrescent and succulent calyx, or torus, or receptacle, bracts, etc.—Accessory muscles. See accessorius.—Accessory obligation, an obligation incidental or subordinate to another obligation. Thus, an obligation for the regular payment of interest is accessory to the obligation to pay the principal; a mortgage to secure payment of a bond is accessory to the bond.—Accessory valves, in zoöl., small additional valves, as those placed near the umbones of the genus Pholas among mollusks.—Spinal accessory nerves, in anat., the eleventh pair of cranial nerves. See accessorius.

II. n.; pl. accessories (-riz). 1. In law, one who is guilty of a felony, not by committing the offense in person or as a principal, nor by being present at its commission, but by being in some other way concerned therein, as by advising or inciting another to commit the crime, or by concealing the offender or in any way helping him to escape punishment. An accessory before the fact is one who counsels or incites another to commit a felony, and who is not present when the act is done; after the fact, one who receives and conceals, or in any way assists, the offender, knowing him to have committed a felony. In high treason and misdemeanor, by English law, there are no accessories, all implicated being treated as principals. See abetter.

An accessory is one who participates in a felony too remotely to be deemed a principal. Bishop.

In that state [Massachusetts], too, the aider and abettor, who at common law would have been but a mere accessory, may be indicted and convicted of a substantive felony, without any regard to the indictment or conviction of the principal. Am. Cyc., I. 58.

The prevailing rule of the criminal law, that there may be principals and accessories to a crime, has no application whatever to treason. Am. Cyc., XV. 851.

2. That which accedes or belongs to something else as its principal; a subordinate part or object; an accompaniment.

The wealth of both Indies seems in great part but an accessary to the command of the sea. Bacon, Essays, xxix.

The aspect and accessories of a den of banditti. Carlyle.

3. In the fine arts, an object represented which is not a main motive or center of interest, but is introduced to balance the composition or in some way enhance its artistic effectiveness. In a portrait, for example, everything but the figure is an accessory.

In painting the picture of an Oriental, the pipe and the coffee-cup are indispensable accessories.
B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 178.

[In all uses interchangeable with accessary, but accessory is more common.]=Syn. 1. Abetter, accomplice. See the definitions of these words.

acciaccatura (ät-chäk-kä-tö'rä), n. [It.; lit., the effect of crushing, < acciaccare, bruise, crush, < acciare, mince, hash, < accia, an ax, < L. ascia, an ax: see ax[1].] In music: (a) A grace-note one half step below a principal note, struck at the same time with the principal note and immediately left, while the latter is held. Before a single note it is indicated in the same manner as the short appoggiatura; before a note of a chord it is indicated by a stroke drawn through the chord under the note to which it belongs. It is now used only in organ-music. (b) More frequently, a short appoggiatura. See appoggiatura.

accidence[1] (ak'si-dens), n. [A misspelling of accidents, pl., or an accom. of L. accidentia, neut. pl., as accidence[2] of L. accidentia, fem. sing.: see accident, 6.] 1. That part of grammar which treats of the accidents or inflection of words; a small book containing the rudiments of grammar.

I . . . never yet did learn mine accidence.
John Taylor (the Water-Poet).

We carried an accidence, or a grammar, for form.
Lamb, Christ's Hospital.

Hence—2. The rudiments of any subject.

The poets who were just then learning the accidence of their art. Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 162.

accidence[2]† (ak'si-dens), n. [< ME. accidence, < OF. accidence, < L. accidentia, a chance, a casual event, < acciden(t-)s, ppr. of accidere, happen: see accident.] A fortuitous circumstance; an accident.

accident (ak'si-dent), n. [< ME. accident, < OF. accident, F. accident = Sp. Pg. It. accidente, < L. acciden(t-)s, an accident, chance, misfortune, prop. ppr. of accidere, fall upon, befall, happen, chance, < ad, to, upon, + cadere, fall: see cadence, case[1], and chance.] 1. In general, anything that happens or begins to be without design, or as an unforeseen effect; that which falls out by chance; a fortuitous event or circumstance.

The story of my life,
And the particular accidents gone by,
Since I came to this isle. Shak., Tempest, v. 1.

Whenever words tumble out under the blindest accidents of the moment, those are the words retained.
De Quincey, Style, i.

2. Specifically, an undesirable or unfortunate happening; an undesigned harm or injury; a casualty or mishap. In legal use, an accident is: (a) An event happening without the concurrence of the will of the person by whose agency it was caused. It differs from mistake, in that the latter always supposes the operation of the will of the agent in producing the event, although that will is caused by erroneous impressions on the mind. Edw. Livingston. See mistake. (b) Sometimes, in a loose sense, any event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation. (c) Specifically, in equity practice, an event which is not the result of personal negligence or misconduct.

3. The operation of chance; an undesigned contingency; a happening without intentional causation; chance; fortune: as, it was the result of accident; I was there by accident.

Prizes of accident as oft as merit.
Shak., T. and C., iii. 3.

All of them, in his opinion, owe their being to fate, accident, or the blind action of stupid matter. Dwight.

4†. That which exists or occurs abnormally; something unusual or phenomenal; an uncommon occurrence or appearance.

Noon accident for noon adversitee
Was seyn in her. Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, l. 607.

The accident was loud, and here before thee
With rueful cry. Milton, S. A., l. 1552.

5. Irregularity; unevenness; abruptness. (a) Any chance, unexpected, or unusual quality or circumstance.

The happy accidents of old English houses.
H. James, Jr., Portraits of Places, p. 262.

(b) An irregularity of surface; an undulation: as, the enemy was favored by the accidents of the ground.

6. A non-essential. In logic (translation of Gr. συμβεβηκός): (a) Any predicate, mark, character, or whatever is in a subject or inheres in a substance: in this sense opposed to substance. (b) A character which may be present in or absent from a member of a natural class: in this sense it is one of the five predicables, viz., genus, difference, species, property, accident. Accidents are divided into separable and inseparable. The distinction between an inseparable accident and a property is not clear.

If two or three hundred men are to be found who cannot live out of Madeira, that inability would still be an accident and a peculiarity of each of them.
J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 83.

7. In gram., a variation or inflection of a word, not essential to its primary signification, but marking a modification of its relation, as gender, number, and case. See accidence[1].

[In Malay] the noun has no accidents.
R. N. Cust, Mod. Langs. E. Ind., p. 134.

Chapter of accidents. See chapter.—Conversion by accident. See conversion.—Efficient cause by accident. See cause.—Fallacy of accident. See fallacy.=Syn. 1. Chance, mischance, hap, mishap, fortune, misfortune, luck, bad luck, casualty, calamity, disaster.—6. Property, Attribute, etc. See quality.

accidental (ak-si-den'tal), a. and n. [=F. accidentel = Pr. Sp. Pg. accidental = It. accidentale, < ML. accidentalis, < L. acciden(t-)s, an accident, chance: see accident.] I. a. 1. Happening by chance or accident, or unexpectedly; taking place not according to the usual course of things; casual; fortuitous; unintentional: as, an accidental meeting.—2. Non-essential; not necessarily belonging to the subject; adventitious: as, songs are accidental to a play.

Of your philosophy you make no use,
If you give place to accidental evils.
Shak., J. C., iv. 3.

Accidental being. See being.—Accidental colors, in optics, prismatic complementary colors seen when the eye is turned suddenly to a white or light-colored surface, after it has been fixed for a time on a bright-colored object. If the object is blue, the accidental color is yellow; if red, green, etc. Thus, if we look fixedly at a red wafer on a piece of white paper, and then turn the eye to another part of the paper, a green spot is seen.—Accidental defini- tion, a description.—Accidental distinction, in logic, one which does not concern the definitions of the objects distinguished.—Accidental error, in physics. See error.—Accidental form. See form.—Accidental light, in painting, a secondary light which is not accounted for by the prevalent effect, such as the rays of the sun darting through a cloud, or between the leaves of a thicket, or the effects of moonlight, candle-light, or burning bodies, in a scene which does not owe its chief light to such a source.—Accidental point, in persp., that point in which a right line drawn from the eye parallel to another given right line cuts the picture or plane. Thus, suppose AB to be the line given in perspective, CFE the perspective plane, D the eye, DC the line parallel to AB; then is C the accidental point. = Syn. 1. Accidental, Chance, Casual, Fortuitous, Incidental, Contingent. The first four are the words most commonly used to express occurrence without expectation or design. Accidental is the most common, and expresses that which happens outside of the regular course of events. Chance has about the same force as accidental, but it is not used predicatively. There is a tendency to desynonymize accidental and casual, so as to make the former apply to events that are of more consequence: as, an accidental fall; a casual remark. As to actual connection with the main course of events, casual is the word most opposed to incidental; the connection of what is incidental is real and necessary, but secondary: as, an incidental benefit or evil. An incidental remark is a real part of a discussion; a casual remark is not. Fortuitous is rather a learned word, not applicable in many cases where accidental or even casual could be used; perhaps through its resemblance to fortunate, it is rarely if ever used when speaking of that which is unfavorable or undesired; thus, it would not be proper to speak of a fortuitous shipwreck. It is chiefly used with the more abstract words: as, fortuitous events; a fortuitous resemblance. That which is contingent is dependent upon something else for its happening: as, his recovery is contingent upon the continuance of mild weather. See occasional.

Accidental Point.

Thy sin's not accidental, but a trade.
Shak., M. for M., iii. 1.

But let it not be such as that
You set before chance-comers.
Tennyson, Will Waterproof.

No casual mistress, but a wife.
Tennyson, In Memoriam.

Fortuitous coincidences of sound, . . . in words of wholly independent derivation.
Whitney, Lang. and Study of Lang., p. 387.

By some persons religious duties appear to be regarded as an incidental business. J. Rogers.

With an infinite being nothing can be contingent. Paley.

II. n. 1. Anything happening, occurring, or appearing accidentally, or as if accidentally; a casualty. Specifically—(a) In music, a sign occurring in the course of a piece to indicate a temporary alteration of the pitch of a degree (and of the notes upon it) from that assigned to it by the clef and the signature, or to restore a degree so altered to its original pitch-reference. Five signs are used: the sharp (♯), raising the pitch a half-step; the double sharp (×), raising it two half-steps; the flat (♭), lowering the pitch a half-step; the double flat (♭♭), lowering it two half-steps; and the natural (♮), which sets aside or cancels the effect of a previous sharp or flat, whether in the signature or as an accidental (hence often called a cancel). (b) In med., tissue resulting from morbid action: chiefly employed in this sense by French writers, but adopted by some English authors. (c) In painting, a fortuitous or chance effect resulting from the incidence of luminous rays or accidental lights upon certain objects, whereby the latter are brought into greater emphasis of light and shadow.

2. An unessential property; a mere adjunct or circumstance.

He conceived it just that accidentals . . . should sink with the substance of the accusation. Fuller.

Conceive as much as you can of the essentials of any subject, before you consider its accidentals. Watts, Logic.

★accidentalism (ak-si-den'tal-izm), n. 1. The condition or quality of being accidental; accidental character.—2. That which is accidental; accidental effect; specifically, in painting, the effect produced by accidental rays of light. Ruskin. See accidental, n., 1 (c), and accidental light, under accidental, a.—3. In med., the hypothesis by which disease is regarded as an accidental modification of health. Syd. Soc. Lex.

accidentalist (ak-si-den'tal-ist), n. In med., one who favors accidentalism. Syd. Soc. Lex.

accidentality (ak″si-den-tal'i-ti), n. The state or quality of being accidental; accidental character.

I wish in short to connect by a moral copula natural history with political history, or, in other words, to make history scientific, and science historical—to take from history its accidentality, and from science its fatalism.
Coleridge, Table-Talk.

accidentally (ak-si-den'tal-i), adv. In an accidental manner; by chance; casually; fortuitously; not essentially or intrinsically.

I conclude choler accidentally bitter and acrimonious, but not in itself. Harvey, Consumption.

Despite the comparatively lukewarm piety of the age, the Meccan pilgrimage is religious essentially, accidentally an affair of commerce. R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 402.

accidentalness (ak-si-den'tal-nes), n. The quality of being accidental or fortuitous.

All that accidentalness and mixture of extravagance and penury which is the natural atmosphere of such reckless souls. Mrs. Oliphant, Sheridan, p. 5.

accidentary† (ak-si-den'ta-ri), a. [= Sp. Pg. accidentario, < L. as if accidentarius*, < acciden(t-)s: see accident.] Accidental. Holland.

accidented (ak'si-den-ted), p. a. Characterized by accidents or irregularities of surface; undulating.

I can only compare our progress to a headlong steeplechase over a violently accidented ploughed field.
O'Donovan, Merv, i.

The Brazilian plateau consists in great part of tablelands, which, from the deep excavation of the innumerable river-valleys, have become very much accidented, so as to present a mountainous aspect. Science, V. 273.

accidential† (ak-si-den'shal), a. [< L. accidentia (see accidence[2]) + -al.] Accidental.

The substantiall use of them might remain, when their accidential abuse was removed.
Fuller, Injured Innocence, i. 69.

accidentiary† (ak-si-den'shi-ā-ri), a. [< L. accidentia, the accidence (see accidence[1]), + -ary.] Pertaining to or learning the accidence. [Rare.]

You know the word "sacerdotes" to signify priests, and not the lay-people, which every accidentiary boy in schools knoweth as well as you.
Bp. Morton, Discharge of Imput., p. 186.

accidie†, n. [ME., = OF. accide = Sp. Pg. acidia = It. accidia, < ML. accidia, slothfulness, indolence; also, and better, spelled acedia, q. v.] Sloth; negligence; indolence. Chaucer.

Accipenser, etc. See Acipenser, etc.

accipiter (ak-sip'i-tėr), n.; pl. accipitres (-trēz). [L., a general name for birds of prey, especially the common hawk (Falco palumbarius) and the sparrow-hawk (F. nisus), an appar. (irreg.) deriv. of accipere, take (hence the rare form acceptor, lit. the taker, seizer), but prob. for ācipiter*, < āci-, ācu- (= Gr. ὠκύς), swift, + petrum* (= Gr. πτερόν = E. feather), wing. Cf. Gr. ὠκύπτερος, swift-winged, applied to a hawk (Homer, Il., xiii. 62).] 1. In ornith.: (a) A bird of the order Accipitres or Raptores; an accipitrine or raptorial bird. (b) [cap.] A genus of birds of the family Falconidæ, embracing short-winged, long-tailed hawks, such as the sparrow-hawk of Europe, Accipiter nisus, and the sharp-shinned hawk of North America, A. fuscus, with many other congeneric species. Brisson, 1760. See Raptores.—2. In surg., a bandage applied over the nose: so called from its resemblance to the claw of a hawk.

accipitral (ak-sip'i-tral), a. Of or pertaining to the Accipitres or birds of prey; having the character of a bird of prey; hawk-like.

Of temper most accipitral, hawkish, aquiline, not to say vulturish. Carlyle, Misc., IV. 245.

That they [Hawthorne's eyes] were sometimes accipitral we can readily believe. Harper's Mag., LXII. 271.

accipitrary† (ak-sip'i-trā-ri), n. [< ML. accipitrarius, a falconer, < L. accipiter: see accipiter.] A falconer. Nathan Drake.

Accipitres (ak-sip'i-trēz), n. pl. [L., pl. of accipiter.] Birds of prey; the accipitrine or raptorial birds regarded as an order, now more frequently named Raptores (which see). Linnæus, 1735.

Accipitrinæ (ak-sip-i-trī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Accipiter + -inæ: see accipiter.] In ornith.: (a) A subfamily of Falconidæ, including hawks of such genera as Accipiter and Astur. (b) In Nitzsch's classification of birds, same as Accipitres or Raptores of authors in general. Other forms are Accipitrina, Accipitrini.

accipitrine (ak-sip'i-trin), a. [< NL. Accipitrinæ, < L. accipiter: see accipiter.] Of or pertaining to (a) the Accipitres or raptorial birds, or (b) the hawks proper, of the subfamily Accipitrinæ; hawk-like; rapacious: as, the accipitrine order of birds.

accismus (ak-siz'mus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκκισμός, affectation of indifference, coyness, < ἀκκίζεσθαι, affect indifference, < ἀκκώ, a bugbear.] In rhet., a feigned refusal; an ironical dissimulation. Smart.

accite† (ak-sīt'), v. t. [< L. accitus, pp. of accīre, summon, < ad, to, + cīre, orig. go (= Gr. κίειν, go), but mixed with its causative ciēre, cause to go, summon: see cite and excite.] 1. To call; cite; summon.

He by the senate is accited home.
Shak., Tit. And., i. 1.

2. To excite; prompt; move.

What accites your most worshipful thought to think so?
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 2.

But in my deske what was there to accite
So ravenous and vast an appetite?
B. Jonson, On Vulcan.

acclaim (a-klām'), v. [In imitation of claim, < L. acclamare, cry out at, shout at, either in a hostile or a friendly manner, < ad, to, + clamare, shout: see claim, v.] I. trans. 1. To applaud; greet with words or sounds of joy or approval. [Rare.]

How gladly did they spend their breath in acclaiming thee! Bp. Hall, Contemplation, iv. 25.

2. To declare or salute by acclamation.

While the shouting crowd
Acclaims thee king of traitors. Smollett, Regicide, v. 8.

II. intrans. To make acclamation; shout applause.

acclaim (a-klām'), n. [< acclaim, v.] A shout of joy; acclamation.

The herald ends: the vaulted firmament
With loud acclaims and vast applause is rent.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., I. 1801.

And the roofs were starred with banners,
And the steeples rang acclaim. Whittier, Sycamores.

acclamate† (ak'lā-māt), v. t. [< L. acclamatus, pp. of acclamare: see acclaim, v.] To applaud. Waterhouse. [Rare.]

acclamation (ak-lā-mā'shon), n. [< L. acclamatio(n-), a shouting, either in approval or in disapproval, < acclamare: see acclaim.] 1. A shout or other demonstration of applause, indicating joy, hearty assent, approbation, or good will. Acclamations are expressed by hurrahs, by clapping of hands, and often by repeating such cries as Long live the queen! Vive l'empereur! Er lebe hoch! etc.

The hands
Of a great multitude are upward flung
In acclamation. Bryant, Hymn of the Sea.

2. In deliberative assemblies, the spontaneous approval or adoption of a resolution or measure by a unanimous viva voce vote, in distinction from a formal division or ballot.

When they [the Anglo-Saxons] consented to anything, it was rather in the way of acclamation than by the exercise of a deliberate voice. Burke, Abridg. of Eng. Hist., ii.

In the Rom. Cath. Ch., a method of papal election, said to be by inspiration (per inspirationem), because "all the cardinals, with a sudden and harmonious consent, as though breathed on by the Divine Spirit, proclaim some person pontiff with one voice, without any previous canvassing or negotiation whence fraud or insidious suggestion could be surmised." Vecchiotti.

3. Something expressing praise or joy. Applied specifically—(a) To forms of praise, thanksgiving, or felicitation at the close of ecclesiastical gatherings. (b) To certain short inscriptions in the form of a wish or injunction, found mostly on tombs. (c) To the responses of the congregation in antiphonal singing. (d) In Rom. antiq., to representations in works of art, especially on coins or medals, of popular assent or approval, as of several figures (standing for the whole people, or a class, or a military division, etc.) greeting an official or benefactor.

Acclamation.
Bronze Coin of Hadrian, British Museum. (Size of the original.)

acclamator† (ak'lā-mā-tor), n. [< L. as if acclamator*, < acclamare: see acclaim.] One who expresses joy or applause by acclamation. [Rare.]

Acclamators who had fill'd . . . the aire with "Vive le Roy!" Evelyn, Diary, Sept. 7, 1651.

acclamatory (a-klam'a-tō-ri), a. [< L. as if acclamatorius*.] Expressing joy or applause by acclamation.

acclearment† (a-klēr'ment), n. [Irreg. < ac- + clear + -ment: see clear.] A clearing; a showing; a plea in exculpation. [Rare.]

The acclearment is fair, and the proof nothing.
Bp. Hacket, Life of Abp. Williams, i. 148.

acclimatation (a-klī-mā-tā'shon), n. [< F. acclimatation, < acclimater, acclimate: see acclimate.] Acclimatization: chiefly used in transcription from the French: as, the Acclimatation Society of Nantes.

acclimate (a-klī'māt), v. t.; pret. and pp. acclimated, ppr. acclimating. [< F. acclimater, acclimate, < ac- (L. ad, to) + climat, climate; cf. Pg. acclimar, acclimate, < ac- + clima, climate: see climate.] To habituate to a foreign climate; acclimatize: more especially (of persons), to adapt to new climates: as, to acclimate settlers; to acclimate one's self.

The native inhabitants and acclimated Europeans.
J. Crawfurd, Commixture of Races.

acclimatement (a-klī'māt-ment), n. [< F. acclimatement, acclimation, < acclimater: see acclimate.] Acclimation. [Rare.]

acclimation (ak-li-mā′shon), n. [< acclimate + -ion. Cf. Pg. acclimação, < acclimar, acclimate.] The process of acclimating, or the state of being acclimated; acclimatization.

acclimatisation, acclimatise, etc. See acclimatization, etc.

acclimatizable (a-klī′mā-tī-za-bl), a. Capable of being acclimatized; suitable for acclimatizing: as, acclimatizable animals. Also spelled acclimatisable.

acclimatization (a-klī″mā-ti-zā′shon), n. The act or process of acclimatizing, or state of being acclimatized; the modification of physical constitution which enables a race or an individual to live in health in a foreign climate. Some writers use this word with regard to brute animals and plants only, using acclimation when speaking of man. Also spelled acclimatisation.

Acclimatization is the process of adaptation by which animals and plants are gradually rendered capable of surviving and flourishing in countries remote from their original habitats, or under meteorological conditions different from those which they have usually to endure, and which are at first injurious to them.
A. R. Wallace, Encyc. Brit., I. 84.

★acclimatize (a-klī′mā-tīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. acclimatized, ppr. acclimatizing. [< ac- (< L. ad, to) + climate + -ize; after acclimate from F.] To accustom or habituate to a foreign climate; adapt for existence in a foreign climate: especially used of adapting a race or stock for permanent existence and propagation: as, to acclimatize plants or animals. Also spelled acclimatise.

Young soldiers, not yet acclimatized, die rapidly here.
London Times.

A domesticated animal or a cultivated plant need not necessarily be acclimatised; that is, it need not be capable of enduring the severity of the seasons without protection. The canary-bird is domesticated but not acclimatised, and many of our most extensively cultivated plants are in the same category.
A. R. Wallace, Encyc. Brit., I. 84.

acclimatizer (a-klī′mā-tī-zėr), n. One who introduces and acclimatizes foreign species. Also spelled acclimatiser.

Some of these [birds] . . . cannot fail to become permanent settlers equally with those for the transportation of which the would-be acclimatizers might find themselves excused.
Encyc. Brit., III. 736.

acclimature (a-klī′mā-tūr), n. The act of acclimating, or the state of being acclimated. [Rare.]

acclinal (a-klī′nal), a. [< L. acclīnis, leaning on or against; cf. acclīnāre, lean on or against, < ad, to, upon, + clinare* = E. lean[1]: see incline.] In geol., leaning against, as one stratum of rock against another, both being turned up at an angle: nearly equivalent to overlying. [Rare.]

acclinate (ak′li-nāt), a. [< L. acclinatus, pp. of acclinare (see acclinal); on the model of declinate: see decline.] In zoöl., bending or sloping upward: the opposite of declinate.

acclive† (a-klīv′), a. [= Pg. It. acclive, < L. acclivis, also less frequently acclivus, steep, < ad, to, + clivus, a hill, prop. sloping, from same root as clinare* = E. lean[1]: see acclinal.] Rising; steep. [Rare.]

The way easily ascending, hardly so acclive as a desk.
Aubrey, Letters, II. 231.

acclivitous (a-kliv′i-tus), a. Rising with a slope; acclivous.

acclivity (a-kliv′i-ti), n.; pl. acclivities (-tiz). [< L. acclivita(t-)s, an acclivity, < acclivis, sloping: see acclive.] 1. An upward slope or inclination of the earth, as the side of a hill: opposed to declivity, or a slope considered as descending.

Far up the green acclivity I met a man and two young women making their way slowly down.
The Century, XXVII. 420.

2. Specifically, in fort., the talus of a rampart.

acclivous (a-klī′vus), a. [< L. acclivus, less frequent form of acclivis, sloping: see acclive.] Rising, as the slope of a hill: the opposite of declivous.

accloy† (a-kloi′), v. t. [< ME. acloien, acloyen, var. of encloyen, < OF. encloyer, earlier encloer (F. enclouer), < ML. inclavare, drive in a nail, < L. in, in, + clavare, nail, < clavus, a nail: see cloy[1] and clove[4].] 1. To prick with a nail in shoeing: used by farriers. Langland, Piers the Plowman.—2. To injure; harm; impair.

And whoso doth, ful foule hymself acloyith.
Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 517.

3. To cloy; encumber; embarrass with superfluity; obstruct.

[Filth] with uncomely weedes the gentle wave accloyes.
Spenser, F. Q., II. vii. 15.

accoast† (a-kōst′), v. i. [A diff. spelling of accost in its orig. sense 'come alongside of'; OF. acoster, touch, graze: see accost and coast.] To fly near the earth. [Rare.]

Ne is there hauke which mantleth her on pearch, Whether high towring or accoasting low.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. ii. 32.

accoil† (a-koil′), v. t. [< OF. acoillir, gather, assemble (F. accueillir, receive), < ML. accolligere, < L. ad, to, + colligere, gather: see coil[1], cull[1], and collect.] To gather together; crowd.

About the caudron many Cookes accoyld.
Spenser, F. Q., II. ix. 30.

accoil (a-koil′), n. [< OF. acoil, F. accueil; from the verb.] Welcome; reception. Southey. (N. E. D.) accol† (a-kol′), v. t. [< ME. acolen, < OF. acoler (F. accoler), embrace, = Sp. acolar, arrange two coats of arms under the same crown, shield, etc., = It. accollare, embrace, mod. join, yoke, < ML. accollare*, embrace, < L. ad, to, + collum (> OF. col, F. cou = OSp. collo, Sp. cuello = It. collo), neck: see collar.] To embrace round the neck. Surrey.

accolade (ak-ō-lād′ or -lad′), n. [< F. accolade, an embrace, a kiss (after It. accollata, prop. fem. pp. of accollare, embrace), < accoler, OF. acoler: see accol.] 1. A ceremony used in conferring knighthood, anciently consisting in an embrace, afterward in giving the candidate a blow upon the shoulder with the flat of a sword, the latter being the present method; hence, the blow itself.

We felt our shoulders tingle with the accolade, and heard the clink of golden spurs at our heels.
Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 58.

2. In music, a brace or couplet connecting Accolade, early 16th century (France).

several staves.—3. In arch., an ornament composed of two ogee curves meeting in the middle, each concave toward its outer extremity and convex toward the point at which it meets the other. Such accolades are either plain or adorned with rich moldings, and are a frequent motive of decoration on the lintels of doors and windows of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, especially in secular architecture. Viollet-le-Duc.

4. In Roman and early monastic MSS., the curved stroke made by the copyist around a final word written below the line to which it belonged, in order to avoid carrying it on to the next.

accolated (ak′ō-lā-ted), p. a. [< ML. accol(l)atus, pp. of accol(l)are, embrace: see accol.] In numis., containing two or more profile heads so arranged that one partially overlaps the next: as, an accolated shilling.

Accolated Shilling of William III. and Mary. (Size of the original.)

accollé (ak-ol-ā′), p. a. [< AF. accollé, F. accolé, pp. of accoler = It. accollare, > accollata, > F. and E. accolade: see accolade and accol.] In her.: (a) Gorged; collared: applied to animals with collars, etc., about their necks. (b) Touching by their corners, as lozenges or fusils on a shield. (c) Placed side by side, as two shields. (d) Surrounded by the collar of an order, as the shield of a knight of that order. Also spelled accolé.—Têtes accollées, or accollé heads, in decorative art, profile heads shown in relief, one behind and partly concealed by another, as often in cameos and on medallions or coins where a sovereign and his wife are shown together. See cut under accolated.

accombination (a-kom-bi-nā′shon), n. The act of combining together. Quarterly Rev.

accommodable (a-kom′ō-da-bl), a. [< F. accommodable = Sp. acomodable = Pg. accommodavel = It. accomodabile, < L. as if accommodabilis*, < accommodare, accommodate: see accommodate, v.] Capable of being accommodated, or made suitable; adaptable. [Rare.]

Rules accommodable to all this variety.
Watts, Logic, v. § 64.

accommodableness (a-kom′ō-da-bl-nes), n. The state or condition of being accommodable. Todd. [Rare.]

accommodate (a-kom′ō-dāt), v.; pret. and pp. accommodated, ppr. accommodating. [< L. accommodatus, pp. of accommodare, < ad, to, + commodare, fit, < commodus, fit: see commodious and mode[1].] I. trans. 1. To make suitable, correspondent, or consistent; fit; adapt: as, to accommodate ourselves to circumstances; to accommodate the choice of subjects to the occasion; to accommodate a Latin word, in form or use, to English analogies.

'Twas his misfortune to light upon an hypothesis that could not be accommodated to the nature of things and human affairs.
Locke.

Undoubtedly the highest function of statesmanship is by degrees to accommodate the conduct of communities to ethical laws, and to subordinate the conflicting interests of the day to higher and more permanent concerns.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 165.

2. To show fitness or agreement in; reconcile, as things which are at variance or which seem inconsistent; bring into harmony or concord: as, to accommodate prophecy to events.

Part know how to accommodate St. James and St. Paul better than some late reconcilers.
Norris.

3. To adjust; settle: as, to accommodate differences.

Sir Lucius shall explain himself—and I dare say matters may be accommodated.
Sheridan, The Rivals, iv. 3.

4. To supply or furnish; provide with certain conveniences; give accommodation to: as, my house can accommodate a large number of guests: followed by with when what is supplied is expressly mentioned: as, to accommodate a man with apartments; to accommodate a friend with money.

Better accommodated!—it is good; yea, indeed, is it: good phrases are surely, and ever were, very commendable. Accommodated! it comes of accommodo: very good; a good phrase.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iii. 2.

5. To suit; serve; convenience; oblige; do a kindness or favor to: as, he is always delighted to accommodate a friend.

The Indians were much given to long talks, and the Dutch to long silence—in this particular, therefore, they accommodated each other completely.
Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 101.

=Syn. 1. To suit, adapt, fit, conform, adjust, reconcile.—4. To furnish, supply, provide for.—5. To serve, oblige, assist, aid.

II. intrans. To be conformable; specifically, in physiol., to be in or come to adjustment. See accommodation, 4 (b).

Their motor seem regulated by their retinal functions, so that, according to Ludwig, if the retinæ are extirpated, the eyes often cease to rotate, then to accommodate, then to wink together.
Mind, IX. 94.

accommodate (a-kom′ō-dāt), a. [< L. accommodatus, pp., adapted: see accommodate, v.] Suitable; fit; adapted; accommodated.

Means accommodate to the end.
Sir R. L'Estrange.

Accommodate distribution, in logic, the acceptation of a term to include everything it naturally denotes except the subject of the sentence: as, Samson was stronger than any man (that is, than any other man).

accommodated (a-kom′ō-dā-ted), p. a. Made fit; made suitable; adapted; modified.

We sometimes use the term [religion] in an accommodated sense, i. e., to express the spiritual results with which religion is fraught, rather than the mere carnal embodiment it first of all offers to such results.
H. James, Subs. and Shad., p. 5.

accommodately† (a-kom′ō-dāt-li), adv. Suitably; fitly.

Of all these [causes] Moses . . . held fit to give an account accommodately to the capacity of the people.
Dr. H. More, Def. of Lit. Cabbala, p. 3.

accommodateness† (a-kom′ō-dāt-nes), n. Fitness.

Aptness and accommodateness to the great purpose of men's salvation.
Hallywell, Saving of Souls, p. 80.

accommodating (a-kom′ō-dā-ting), p. a. Obliging; yielding to the desires of others; disposed to comply and to oblige another: as, an accommodating man; an accommodating disposition.

★accommodation (a-kom-ō-dā′shon), n. [< L. accommodatio(n-), < accommodare, adapt: see accommodate, v.] 1. The act of accommodating: as—(a) Adjustment; adaptation; especially, the adaptation or application of one thing to another by analogy, as the words of a prophecy to a subsequent event.

The law of adaptation which we thus discern and trace alike in every instance of organic development and function, we discern and trace also in the accommodation of the individual to his social surroundings and in the consequent modification of his character.

Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 96.

Many of these quotations were probably intended as nothing more than accommodations. Paley.

(b) Adjustment of differences; reconciliation, as of parties in dispute.

The conformity and analogy of which I speak . . . has a strong tendency to facilitate accommodation, and to produce a generous oblivion of the rancour of their quarrels.
Burke, On a Regicide Peace, i.

To come to terms of accommodation. Macaulay.

(c) Convenience; the supplying of a want; aid.

St. James's Church had recently been opened for the accommodation of the inhabitants of this new quarter.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., iii.

2. The state of being accommodated; fitness; state of adaptation: followed by to, sometimes by with.

The organization of the body with accommodation to its functions. Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 53.

Socinus' main design . . . was to bring all the mysteries of Christianity to a full accommodation with the general notions of man's reason. South, Works, V. iii.

3. Anything which supplies a want, as in respect of ease, refreshment, and the like; anything furnished for use; a convenience: chiefly applied to lodgings: as, accommodation for man and beast: often used in the plural.

They probably thought of the coach with some contempt, as an accommodation for people who had not their own gigs. George Eliot, Felix Holt, iv.

Outside of the larger cities on the Continent you can get as wretched accommodations as you could desire for an enemy. T. B. Aldrich, Ponkapog to Pesth, p. 65.

Specifically—4. (a) In com., pecuniary aid in an emergency; a loan of money, either directly or by becoming security for the repayment of a sum advanced by another, as by a banker. (b) In physiol., the automatic adjustment of the eye, or its power of adjusting itself to distinct vision at different distances, or of the ear to higher or lower tones. In the eye accommodation is effected by an alteration of the convexity of the crystalline lens (which see), and in the ear by an increased tension of the tympanic membrane for higher tones.—Accommodation bill or note, paper, or indorsement, a bill of exchange or note, etc., drawn, accepted, or indorsed by one or more parties to enable another or others to obtain credit by or raise money on it, and not given like business paper in payment of a debt, but merely intended to accommodate the drawer: colloquially called in Scotland a wind-bill, and in England a kite.—Accommodation cramp. See cramp.—Accommodation ladder, a stairway fixed on the outside of a ship at the gangway, to facilitate ascending from or descending to boats.—Accommodation lands or land. (a) Lands bought by a builder or speculator, who erects houses upon them and then leases portions of them upon an improved ground-rent. [Eng.] (b) Land acquired for the purpose of being added to other land for its improvement. Rapalje and Lawrence.—Accommodation road, a road constructed to give access to a particular piece of land. Rapalje and Lawrence. [Eng.]—Accommodation train, a railway-train which stops at all or nearly all the stations on the road: called in Great Britain a parliamentary train: opposed to express-train.—Accommodation works, works which an English railway company is required by 8 and 9 Vict. xx. to make and maintain for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers of land adjoining the railway, as gates, bridges, culverts, fences, etc.

accommodative (a-kom′ō-dā-tiv), a. [< accommodate + -ive; = It. accomodativo.] Disposed or tending to accommodate, or to be accommodating; adaptive.

accommodet (ak-ǫ-mōd′), v. t. [< F. accommoder = It. accomodare, < L. accommodare: see accommodate.] To accommodate. [Rare.]

accompanable† (a-kum′pa-na-bl), a. [Also accompaniable; < F. accompagnable, "sociable, easie to be conversed with" (Cotgrave), < accompagner + -able: see accompany.] Sociable. Sir P. Sidney.

accompanier (a-kum′pa-ni-ėr), n. One who or that which accompanies. [Rare.]

Dear, cracked spinnet of dearer Louisa! Without mention of mine, be dumb, thou thin accompanier of her thinner warble! Lamb, Elia.

★accompaniment (a-kum′pa-ni-ment), n. [< accompany, q. v., + -ment; after F. accompagnement, OF. acompaignement = Sp. acompañamiento = Pg. acompanhamento = It. accompagnamento.] Something that attends another as a circumstance; something incidental or added to the principal thing as a concomitant, by way of ornament, for the sake of symmetry, or the like.

Elaboration of some one organ may be a necessary accompaniment of Degeneration in all the others.
E. R. Lankester, Degeneration, p. 32.

Specifically—(a) In music, the subordinate part or parts added to a solo or concerted composition to enhance the effect, and also, if it be a vocal composition, to sustain the voices and keep them true to the pitch. The accompaniment may be given to one or more instruments, or to a chorus of voices. Instead of writing accompaniments in full, as is now done, the older composers were accustomed merely to indicate the harmonies to be employed by means of a figured bass, which could be performed in a great variety of ways, more or less elaborate, according to the musical knowledge, taste, and skill of the executant. (b) In painting, an object accessory to the principal object, and serving for its ornament or illustration: generally termed an accessory (which see). (c) In her., anything added to a shield by way of ornament, as the belt, mantling, supporters, etc.—Accompaniment of the scale, in music, the harmony assigned to the series of notes forming the diatonic scale, ascending and descending.—Additional accompaniments, parts of a musical composition not written by the original composer, but added by another: as, Mozart's additional accompaniments to Handel's "Messiah." Such additions are justified in most cases on the ground that some instruments have become obsolete, others have been invented, and the constitution of the orchestra has been much changed since the time of the original composer.

accompanist (a-kum′pa-nist), n. In music, one who plays an accompaniment.

accompany (a-kum′pa-ni), v.; pret. and pp. accompanied, ppr. accompanying. accompletive (a-kom′plē-tiv), a. Disposed or tending to accomplish or fulfil. [Rare.]

accomplice (a-kom′plis), n. [An extension (due perhaps to a supposed connection with accomplish or accompany), by prefixing ac-, of the older form complice, in same sense, < F. complice, an associate, particularly in crime, < L. complicem, acc. of complex, adj., confederate, participant, < complicare, fold together, < com-, together, + plicare, fold: see complex and complicate.] 1. A partner or coöperator: not in a bad sense.

Success unto our valiant general,
And happiness to his accomplices!
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 2.

One fellow standing at the beginning of a century, and stretching out his hand as an accomplice towards another fellow standing at the end of it, without either having known of the other's existence.
De Quincey, Secret Societies, i.

More commonly—2. An associate in a crime; a partner or partaker in guilt. Technically, in law, any participator in an offense, whether as principal or as accessory: sometimes used of accessories only, in contradistinction to principals. It is followed by of or with before a person, and in or of before the crime: as, A was an accomplice with B in the murder of C.

Thou, the cursed accomplice of his treason.
Johnson, Irene, v. 1.

He is . . . an accomplice if he is intimately bound up in the project and responsibility of the schemes as a prime mover. C. J. Smith, Synonyms, p. 7.

Sometimes used with to before a thing.

We free-statesmen, as accomplices to the guilt [of slavery, are] ever in the power of the grand offender.

II. intrans. 1. To render an account or relation of particulars; answer in a responsible character: followed by with or to before a person, and by for before a thing: as, an officer must account with or to the treasurer for money received.

They must account to me for these things, which I miss so greatly. Lamb, Old Benchers.

2. To furnish or assign a reason or reasons; give an explanation: with for: as, idleness accounts for poverty.

You'll not let me speak—I say the lady can account for this much better than I can. Sheridan, The Rivals, iv. 2.

3†. To reckon; count.

Calendar months, . . . by which months we still account.
Holder, On Time.

To account of†, to make account of; esteem.

It [silver] was nothing accounted of in the days of Solomon. 1 Ki. x. 21.

I account of her beauty. Shak., T. G. of V., ii. 1.

★account (a-kount'), n. [< ME. acount, acunt, acont, conte, < OF. acunt, acont (< a- + cont, < L. computum, a calculation), acunte, aconte (later OF. and ME. acompt, acompte: see accompt), < OF. acunter, aconter: see account, v.] 1. A reckoning, an enumeration, or a computation; method of computing: as, the Julian account of time.

That . . .
I might in virtues, beauties, livings, friends, Exceed account. Shak., M. of V., iii. 2.

2. A reckoning of money or business; a statement or record of financial or pecuniary transactions, with their debits and credits, or of money received and paid and the balance on hand or due: as, to keep accounts; to make out an account.—3. A course of business dealings or relations requiring the keeping of records: as, to have an account with the bank.—4. On the stock exchange, that part of the transactions between buyer and seller to be settled on the fortnightly or monthly settling-day: as, I have sold A. B. 500 shares for the account.—5. Narrative; relation; statement of facts; a recital, verbal or written, of particular transactions and events: as, an account of the revolution in France.

The account which Thucydides has given of the retreat from Syracuse is among narratives what Vandyke's Lord Strafford is among paintings. Macaulay, Hist. Eng.

6. A statement of reasons, causes, grounds, etc., explanatory of some event: as, no satisfactory account has yet been given of these phenomena.—7. An explanatory statement or vindication of one's conduct, such as is given to a superior.

Give an account of thy stewardship. Luke xvi. 2.

8. Reason or consideration; ground: used with on: as, on all accounts; on every account; on account of.

He [Bacon] valued geometry chiefly, if not solely, on account of those uses, which to Plato appeared so base.
Macaulay, Lord Bacon.

9. Estimation; esteem; distinction; dignity; consequence or importance.

There never was a time when men wrote so much and so well, and that without being of any great account themselves. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 293.

10. Profit; advantage: as, to find one's account in a pursuit; to turn anything to account.

Why deprive us of a malady by which such numbers find their account? Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 5.

11. Regard; behalf; sake: as, all this trouble I have incurred on your account.

Sometimes spelled accompt.

Account current, open account, a course of business dealings still continuing between two parties, or an account not stated.—Account rendered, a statement presented by a creditor to his debtor, showing the charges of the former against the latter.—Account sales (an abbreviation of account of the sales), a separate account rendered to his principal by a factor or broker, showing the goods sold, the prices obtained, and the net result after deduction of expenses, etc.—Account stated, an account or statement showing the result of a course of transactions, for adjustment between the parties. Sometimes called a state.—Action of account, or writ of account, in law, an action or writ which the plaintiff brings, demanding that the defendant shall render his just account, or show good cause to the contrary.—For account of, on behalf of: as, sold for account of A. B., that is, disposed of by sale, and to be accounted for to A. B.—For the account, for settlement on the regular settling-day, and not for cash or ready money: used on the stock exchange. See above, 4.—In account with, having business dealings with (some one), requiring the keeping of an account.—Money of account, a denomination of money used in reckoning, but not current as coins: thus, in China, the tael or ounce-weight of silver is a money of account.—On or to account, as an instalment or interim payment.—On one's own account, for one's self; for one's own interest and at one's own risk: as, he has gone into business on his own account.—To go on the account†, to join a piratical expedition; turn pirate: probably from the parties sharing as in a commercial venture.

I hope it is no new thing for gentlemen of fortune who are going on the account, to change a captain now and then. Scott.

To make account†, to form an expectation; judge; reckon.

This other part . . . makes account to find no slender arguments for this assertion out of those very Scriptures which are commonly urged against it. Milton.

They made no account but that the navy should be absolutely master of the seas.
Bacon, Consid. of War with Spain.

To make account of, to hold in estimation or esteem; value: generally with an adjective of quantity, as much, little, no, etc.: as, he makes no account of difficulties.

What is . . . the son of man, that thou makest account of him! Ps. cxliv. 3.

We never make much account of objections [to war] which merely respect the actual state of the world at this moment, but which admit the general expediency and permanent excellence of the project.
Emerson, Misc., p. 189.

To open an account with, to begin a course of dealings with, requiring the keeping of an account.—To take into account, to take into consideration; make a part of the reckoning or estimate. = Syn. 5. Account, Relation, Narration, Narrative, Recital, Description, Story, statement, rehearsal, chronicle, history, tale, report. These words agree in denoting the rehearsal of an event or of a series of events. Account directs attention to the facts related rather than to the relater; it is the most general term. Relation is also general in its meaning, but implies more directly a relater; it is less used in this sense than the corresponding verb relate. It holds a middle place between account and narrative. Narration is the act of narrating; the meaning "the thing narrated" has by desynonymization been given up to narrative. A narrative sets forth a series of incidents dependent upon each other for meaning and value, and generally drawn from the personal knowledge of the narrator. A recital is a narrative, usually of events that peculiarly affect the interests or the feelings of the reciter; hence it is generally more detailed: as, the recital of one's wrongs, griefs, troubles. A description is an account addressed to the imagination, a picture in words. A story is by derivation a short history, and by development a narrative designed to interest and please. There may be an account of a battle or a burglary; a relation of an adventure; a man of extraordinary powers of narration, so that his narrative is exact and vivid; a recital of one's personal sufferings; a description of a scene or an incident; a story of a life.

account† (a-kount'), pp. [Reduced from accounted.] Accounted; reckoned.

accredit (a-kred′it), v. t. [< F. accréditer, earlier acrediter, accredit, < ac- (L. ad), to, + crédit, n., credit (see credit, n.); = Sp. Pg. acreditar = It. accreditare, accredit, similarly formed.] 1. To give credit or credence to; repose confidence in; trust; esteem.

Such were the principal terms of the surrender of Granada, as authenticated by the most accredited Castilian and Arabic authorities. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., i. 15.

His party will . . . protect and accredit him, in spite of conduct the most contradictory to their own principles. Scott.

2. To confer credit or authority on; stamp with authority.

With the best writers of our age, accredit is "invest with credit or authority," to which may be added its diplomatic sense, "send with letters credential." F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 284.

I am better pleased indeed that he censures some things than I should have been with unmixed commendation; for his censure will . . . accredit his praises. Cowper, Letters, xliii.

Hence, specifically — 3. To send with credentials, as an envoy.

According to their rank, some agents of foreign governments are directly accredited to a sovereign, and others to his minister of foreign affairs. Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, § 91.

4. To believe; accept as true.

He accredited and repeated stories of apparitions, and witchcraft, and possession, so silly, as well as monstrous, that they might have nauseated the coarsest appetite for wonder. Southey, Life of Wesley, II. 198.

5. To ascribe or attribute to; invest with the credit of: followed by with.

Mr. Bright himself was accredited with having said that his own effort to arouse a reforming spirit . . . was like flogging a dead horse. McCarthy, Hist. Own Times, xl.

accreditate† (a-kred′i-tāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. accreditated, ppr. accreditating. [As accredit + -ate[2].] Same as accredit.

She bowed, kissing the Thracian's hands, who would not resist it, to accreditate the beginnings of his Love to be of estimation. Sir A. Cokaine, tr. of Loredano, Dianea, IV. § 3. (N. E. D.) accrementitial (ak″rē-men-tish′al), a. [< L. as if accrementum* (found once, but a false reading), addition (< accrescere, increase: see accrescе, and cf. excrement, increment), + E. -itial.] In physiol., of or pertaining to the process of accrementition.

accrementition (ak″rē-men-tish′on), n. [< L. as if accrementum*, on analogy of accrementitial, q. v. The regular form would be accrementation*.] In physiol., the production or development of a new individual by the separation of a part of the parent; gemmation.

accrescet† (a-kres′), v. i. [Later form of accrease, q. v., after orig. L. accrescere, increase, < ad, to, + crescere, grow: see crescent, and cf. accrue.] 1. To increase; grow. [Rare.] — 2. To accrue. See accrue, v., 2.

accrescence (a-kres′ens), n. [< accrescent; = Sp. acrecencia = It. accrescenza, increase.] 1. The act of increasing; gradual growth or increase; accretion.

The silent accrescence of belief from the unwatched depositions of a general, never contradicted, hearsay. Coleridge, Statesman's Manual (1839), App. B, p. 296.

2. That by which anything is increased; an increment.

accrescent (a-kres′ent), a. [< L. accrescen(t-)s, ppr. of accrescere, grow: see accrescе.] Increasing; growing. Specifically, in bot., applied to parts connected with the flower which increase in size after flowering, as frequently occurs with the calyx, involucre, etc.

accrescimento (äk-kresh-i-men′tō), n. [It.: see accrescе.] In music, the increase of the duration of a sound by one half, indicated by a dot after the note.

accrete (a-krēt′), v.; pret. and pp. accreted, ppr. accreting. [< L. accretus, pp. of accrescere: see accrescе.] I. intrans. 1. To grow by accretion; gather additions from without. [Rare.]

We see everywhere wasted cliffs and denuded shores, or accreted shingle-banks and sand-hills. N. and Q., 7th ser., II. 62.

2. To be added; adhere; become attached by a process of accretion.

Centres about which thought has accreted, instead of crystallizing into its own free forms. G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 161.

★ II. trans. To cause to grow or unite.

★ accrete (a-krēt′), a. [< L. accretus, pp. of accrescere: see accrescе.] Grown together; formed by accretion; accreted.

★ accretion (a-krē′shon), n. [< L. accretio(n-), < accretus, pp. of accrescere, grow: see accrescе and accrete.] 1. The act of accreting or accreting; a growing to; an increase by natural growth; an addition; specifically, an increase by an accession of parts externally.

The phrase "living language," used with reference to facts, must import perpetual excretion and accretion of substance, involving or producing assimilation, development, and renewal. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 18.

A mineral or unorganized body can undergo no change save by the operation of mechanical or chemical forces; and any increase of its bulk is due to the addition of like particles to its exterior: it augments not by growth but by accretion. Owen, Comp. Anat., i.

2. In pathol., the growing together of parts normally separate, as the fingers or toes. — 3. The thing added; an extraneous addition; an accession: commonly used in the plural, and restricted to accessions made slowly and gradually by some external force.

He strove to pare away the accretions of age. Merivale, Hist. Romans, V. 150.

4. In law: (a) The increase or growth of property by external accessions, as by alluvium naturally added to land situated on the bank of a river, or on the seashore. When the accretion takes place by small and imperceptible degrees it belongs to the owner of the land immediately behind, but if it is sudden and considerable it may belong to the state. (b) In Scots law, the completion of an originally defective or imperfect right by some subsequent act on the part of the person from whom the right was derived.

accretive (a-krē′tiv), a. Of or pertaining to accretion; increasing or adding by growth; growing; accrescent: as, "the accretive motion of plants," Glanville, Scep. Sci., ix. 60.

accrew†, accrewe†, n. and v. Obsolete spellings of accrue. The spelling is retained in the clipped form crew[1] (which see).

accriminate† (a-krim′i-nāt), v. t. [< ac- + criminate (cf. Sp. acriminar, exaggerate a crime, accuse): see criminate.] To charge with a crime.

accroach† (a-krōch′), v. t. [< ME. acrochen, < OF. accrocher, fix on a hook, hook up, < a- (L. ad), to, + croc, a hook, a crook: see crook and crochet. Cf. encroach.] 1. To hook, or draw to one's self as with a hook. — 2. In old laws, to usurp: as, to accroach royal power to one's self.

accroachment† (a-krōch′ment), n. The act of accroaching; encroachment; usurpation, as of sovereign power.

accrual (a-krö′al), n. The act or process of accruing; accretion.

accrue (a-krö′), n. [Also written accrew (now obs.), < late ME. acrewe*, found only in the clipped form crewe (> E. crew), and in the verb acrewe, accrue; < OF. acrewe, acreue, that which grows up, to the profit of the owner, on the earth or in a wood, later "accreve, a growth, increase, eeking, augmentation" (Cotgrave), orig. fem. of acreu, "accreu, growne, increased" (Cotgrave), (AF. acru), pp. of acreistre (AF. acrestre), later accroistre, mod. F. accroître, < L. accrescere, grow, accrease, accrescе, increase: see accrease, accrescе. Hence by abbr. crue, crew: see crew[1], and cf. recruit.] 1†. An accession; addition; reinforcement.

The towne of Calis and the forts thereabouts were not supplied with anie new accrewes of soldiers. Holinshed, Chron., III. 1135 1.

Should be able . . . to oppose the French by the accrue of Scotland. M. Godwyn, Annals Eng., III. 283. (N. E. D.)

2. A loop or stitch forming an extra mesh in network.

There are also accrues, false meshes, or quarterings, which are loops inserted in any given row, by which the number of meshes is increased. Encyc. Brit., XVII. 359.

accrue (a-krö′), v. i.; pret. and pp. accrued, ppr. accruing. [Also written accrew (now obs.), < ME. acrewe, v., < acrewe*, n.: see accrue, n.] 1†. To grow; increase; augment.

And, though powre faild, her courage did accrew. Spenser, F. Q., V. v. 7.

2. To happen or result as a natural growth; come or fall as an addition or increment, as of profit or loss, advantage or damage; arise in due course: as, a profit accrues to government from the coinage of copper; the natural increase accrues to the common benefit.

To no one can any benefit accrue from such aërial speculations . . . as crowd almost every book in our language that we turn to. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., Pref.

That pleasure which accrues from good actions. J. F. Clarke, Ten Great Relig., ii. 5.

3. In law, to become a present and enforcible right or demand. Thus the right to set up the statute of limitations against a claim accrues by lapse of time; a cause of action on a note does not accrue till the note becomes payable.

accrued (a-kröd′), p. a. In her., full-grown: an epithet applied to trees.

accruement (a-krö′ment), n. 1. Accrual. — 2. That which accrues; an addition; increment.

accruer (a-krö′er), n. [< accrue + -er[5], as in user, trover, waiver, and other law terms, where -er represents the F. inf. suffix.] In law, the act or fact of accruing; accrual. — Clause of accruer, a clause in a deed or bequest to several persons, directing to whom, in case of the death of one or more, his or their shares shall go or accrue.

acct. curt. In com., a contraction of account current. Originally written $\frac{a}{c}$, a symbol now almost exclusively used for account.

accubation (ak-ū-bā′shon), n. [< L. accubatio(n-), < accubare, lie near, esp. recline at table, < ad, to, + cubare, lie down. See incubate and accumb.] 1. The act of lying down or reclining; specifically, the ancient practice, derived from the Orient, of eating meals in a recumbent posture. Among the Greeks at the time of the Homeric poems this practice had not yet been adopted; but in historical times it obtained in general among both Greeks and Romans, and it is illustrated in early vase-paintings. It was customary to eat reclining diagonally toward the table, resting on couches, either flat on the breast or supported on the left elbow in a semi-sitting position. Cushions were provided to relieve the strain upon the elbow and the back. The table was usually a little lower than the couches, for convenience in reaching the food. See triclinium.

Accubation.—An ancient dinner.

Which gesture . . . cannot be avoided in the laws of accubation. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 6.

2. In med., lying-in; confinement; accouchement. Syd. Soc. Lex.

accumb† (a-kumb′), v. i. [< L. accumbere, lie near, esp. recline at table, < ad, to, + cumbere* (in comp.), a nasalized form of cubare, lie down. See accubation.] To recline, according to the ancient fashion at table. See accubation. Bailey.

accumbency† (a-kum′ben-si), n. [< accumbent: see -cy.] The state of being accumbent or of reclining.

★ accumbent (a-kum′bent), a. and n. [< L. accumben(t-)s, ppr. of accumbere: see accumb.] I. a. 1. Leaning or reclining, in the manner of the ancients at their meals. See accubation.

Accumbent Ovule (Thlaspi arvense).

The Roman recumbent (or more properly accumbent) posture in eating was introduced after the first Punic war. Arbuthnot, Anc. Coins, p. 134.

2. In bot., lying against: applied to the cotyle-dons of an embryo when their edges lie against or are opposed to the radicle.

II.† n. One who reclines, as at meals; one at table, whether reclining or sitting.

A penance must be done by every accumbent in sitting out the passage through all these dishes.
Bp. Hall, Occas. Med., No. 81.

accumber† (a-kum′bėr), v. t. [< ME. acumbren, acombren, for earlier encumbren, encombren: see encumber, and a-[16] and en-[1].] To encumber; clog.

And lette his sheep acombred in the mire.
Chaucer, Prol. Parson's Tale.

Accumbred with carriage of women and children.
Campion, Hist. Ireland, p. 28.

accumulate (ạ-kū′mū-lāt), v.; pret. and pp. accumulated, ppr. accumulating. [< L. accumulatus, pp. of accumulare, heap up, < ad, to, + cumulare, heap, < cumulus, a heap: see cumulate and cumulus.] I. trans. 1. To heap up; collect or bring together; make a pile, mass, or aggregation of: as, to accumulate earth or stones; to accumulate money or sorrows.

Never pray more; abandon all remorse;
On horror's head horrors accumulate.
Shak., Othello, iii. 3.

2. To form by heaping up or collecting the parts or elements of; obtain by gathering in; amass: as, to accumulate wealth. [Rare in the physical sense, as in the first extract.]

Soon the young captive prince shall roll in fire,
And all his race accumulate the pyre.
J. Barlow, Columbiad, iii. 362. (N. E. D.)

In the seventeenth century a statesman who was at the head of affairs might easily, and without giving scandal, accumulate in no long time an estate amply sufficient to support a dukedom. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., iii.

A weak mind does not accumulate force enough to hurt itself. O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, ii.

II. intrans. 1. To grow in size, number, or quantity; go on increasing by successive additions: as, public evils accumulate.

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates, and men decay.
Goldsmith, Des. Vil., l. 52.

We are the heirs to an inheritance of truth, grandly accumulating from generation to generation.
Sumner, Orations, I. 51.

2. To take degrees by accumulation, as in some English universities. See accumulation.

accumulate† (ạ-kū′mū-lāt), p. a. [< L. accumulatus, pp.: see accumulate, v.] Collected into a mass or quantity; increased; intensified.

A more accumulate degree of felicity.
South, Sermons, viii. 147.

Haply made sweeter by the accumulate thrill.
Lowell, Cathedral.

accumulation (ạ-kū-mū-lā′shọn), n. [< L. accumulatio(n-), < accumulare: see accumulate, v.] 1. The act of accumulating, or state of being accumulated; an amassing; a collecting together.

It is essential to the idea of wealth to be susceptible of accumulation; things which cannot, after being produced, be kept for some time before being used are never, I think, regarded as wealth. J. S. Mill.

2. Growth by continuous additions, as the addition of interest to principal. Specifically, in law: (a) The adding of the interest or income of a fund to the principal, pursuant to the provisions of a will or deed preventing its being expended. The law imposes restrictions on the power of a testator or creator of a trust to prohibit thus the present beneficial enjoyment of a fund in order to increase it for a future generation. (b) The concurrence of several titles to the same thing, or of several circumstances to the same proof: more correctly, cumulation.

3. That which is accumulated; a heap, mass, or aggregation: as, a great accumulation of sand at the mouth of a river.

Our days become considerable, like petty sums by minute accumulations. Sir T. Browne, Urn-burial, v.

Accumulation of degrees, in some of the English universities, the taking of a higher and a lower degree together, or at shorter intervals than is usual or is generally allowed by the rules.—Accumulation of power, that amount of force or capacity for motion which some machines possess at the end of intervals of time, during which the velocity of the moving body has been constantly accelerated.

accumulative (ạ-kū′mū-lā-tiv), a. [< accumulate + -ive; = Sp. acumulativo (in adv. acumulativamente) = Pg. accumulativo.] Tending to or arising from accumulation; cumulative.—Accumulative judgment, in law, a second judgment against a person, the effect of which is to begin after the first has expired.

accumulatively (ạ-kū′mū-lā-tiv-li), adv. In an accumulative manner; by heaping; in heaps.

accumulativeness (ạ-kū′mū-lā-tiv-nes), n. The quality of being accumulative; tendency to accumulate.

accumulator (ạ-kū′mū-lā-tọr), n. [< L. accumulator, < accumulare, accumulate.] 1. One who or that which gathers, accumulates, or amasses. —2. One who takes university degrees by accumulation (which see).—3. Anything used for collecting and storing energy, etc. Specifically, in mech.: (a) An india-rubber spring serving for the storage of energy to be utilized for lifting and other purposes. (b) An elastic section of a dredge-line, so placed as to prevent a sudden breaking strain. (c) An apparatus used principally in connection with hydraulic machines as an equalizer of pressure, or for the accumulation of energy to be expended intermittently, as in hydraulic cranes, elevators, riveters, etc. It consists of a cylinder fitted with a plunger, having at its upper end a cross-head or cap, to which are secured the weights necessary for the desired pressure. The water forced into the cylinder raises the plunger, whose weight, reacting upon the water, transmits this pressure to the operating machinery. The total force, less friction, which can be expended is measured by the product of the weight of the plunger and its load into the distance traversed by it. The joint capacity of the force-pumps which supply the cylinder is such as will, by continuous running, accumulate in the cylinder during periods of inaction an amount equal to that expended during a maximum effort. In another form, called the hydro-pneumatic accumulator, the water within the cylinder compresses air, which reacts upon it, thus serving as a substitute for the weights. Instead of dead-weights the plunger of the accumulator may be forced into its cylinder a by a piston of large area attached to its outer or free end; against this piston on its outer surface is maintained a constant pressure of water or air or steam, producing an effect equivalent to the weight in the other form. Such accumulators have the advantages of lightness and need not stand vertical. (d) In elect.: (1) A condenser (which see). (2) A storage battery (which see, under battery).—Hydro-pneumatic accumulator, an apparatus intended to be used with hydrostatic lifts and presses, and employing compressed air as the source of power. See above, 3 (c).

Hydraulic Accumulator.

a, cylinder; b, plunger; c, gland; d, weight-case; e, cross-head; f, bolt; g, framework; h, i, pipes.

accuracy (ak′ū-rā-si), n. [< accura(te) + -cy, as if < L. accuratia*. The sense is that of the rare L. accuratio.] The condition or quality of being accurate; extreme precision or exactness; exact conformity to truth, or to a rule or model; correctness: as, the value of testimony depends on its accuracy; copies of legal instruments should be taken with accuracy.

The schoolmen tried to reason mathematically about things which had not been, and perhaps could not be, defined with mathematical accuracy.
Macaulay, Utilitarian Theory of Government.

= Syn. Accurateness, exactness, exactitude, precision, carefulness, care, niceness, nicety.

accurate (ak′ū-rāt), a. [= Pg. accurado = It. accurato, < L. accuratus, prepared with care, exact, pp. of accurare, prepare with care, < ad, to, + curare, take care, < cura, care, pains: see cure.] 1. Characterized by extreme care; hence, in exact conformity to truth, or to a standard or rule, or to a model; free from error or defect; exact: as, an accurate account; accurate measure; an accurate expression; an accurate calculator or observer.

Our American character is marked by a more than average delight in accurate perception, which is shown by the currency of the byword, "No mistake."
Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 207.

2†. Determinate; precisely fixed.

Those conceive the celestial bodies have more accurate influences upon these things below. Bacon.

= Syn. 1. Accurate, Correct, Exact, Precise, Nice, careful, particular, true, faithful, strict, painstaking, unerring. Of these words correct is the feeblest; it is barely more than not faulty, as tested by some standard or rule. Accurate implies careful and successful endeavor to be correct: as, an accurate accountant, and, by extension of the meaning, accurate accounts; an accurate likeness. Exact is stronger, carrying the accuracy down to minute details: as, an exact likeness. It is more commonly used of things, while precise is used of persons: as, the exact truth; he is very precise in his ways. Precise may represent an excess of nicety, but exact and accurate rarely do so: as, she is prim and precise. As applied more specifically to the processes and results of thought and investigation, exact means absolutely true; accurate, up to a limited standard of truth; precise, as closely true as the utmost care will secure. Thus, the exact ratio of the circumference to the diameter cannot be stated, but the value 3.14159265 is accurate to eight places of decimals, which is sufficiently precise for the most refined measurements. Nice emphasizes the attention paid to minute and delicate points, often in a disparaging sense: as, he is more nice than wise.

What is told in the fullest and most accurate annals bears an infinitely small proportion to that which is suppressed. Macaulay, Hist. Eng.

But we all know that speech, correct speech, is not thus easily and readily acquired.
R. G. White, Every-day English, p. 130.

It [the map] presents no scene to the imagination; but it gives us exact information as to the bearings of the various points. Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

A winning wave, deserving note,
In the tempestuous petticoat,—
A careless shoe-string, in whose tie
I see a wild civility,—
Do more bewitch me, than when art
Is too precise in every part. Herrick.

He is fastidiously nice in his choice of language, and a fondness for dainty and delicate epithets too often gives to his style an appearance of prettiness.
Whipple, Ess. and Rev., I. 82.

accurately (ak′ū-rāt-li), adv. In an accurate manner; with precision; without error or defect; exactly: as, a writing accurately copied.

Nature lays the ground-plan of each creature accurately —sternly fit for all his functions; then veils it scrupulously. Emerson, Success.

For no two seconds together does any possible ellipse accurately represent the orbit [of a planet].
W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 78.

accurateness (ak′ū-rāt-nes), n. The state or quality of being accurate; accuracy; exactness; nicety; precision.

accurse (a-kėrs′), v. t.; pret. and pp. accursed, ppr. accursing. [A wrong spelling, in imitation of L. words with prefix ac-, of acurse, < ME. acursien, acorsien, < a-[1] (< AS. ā-) + cursien, corsien, < AS. cursian, curse: see curse, v.] To imprecate misery or evil upon; call down curses on; curse. [Now hardly used except in the past participle as an adjective: see below.]

Hildebrand accursed and cast down from his throne Henry IV. Raleigh, Essays.

accursed, accurst (a-kėrs′ or a-kėr′sed, a-kėrst′), p. a. [< ME. acursed, akursed, acorsed, pp.: see accurse.] 1. Subject to a curse; doomed to harm or misfortune; blasted; ruined.

The city shall be accursed. Josh. vi. 17.

Thro' you my life will be accurst.
Tennyson, The Letters, v.

2. Worthy of curses or execrations; detestable; execrable; cursed: as, "deeds accursed," Collins, Ode to Fear.

Thus cursed steel, and more accursed gold,
Gave mischief birth, and made that mischief bold.
Dryden, Ovid's Metamorph., i. 179.

accursedly (a-kėr′sed-li), adv. In an accursed manner.

accursedness (a-kėr′sed-nes), n. The state or quality of being accursed.

accusable (ạ-kū′zạ-bl), a. [= F. accusable = Sp. acusable = Pg. accusavel = It. accusabile (in E. sense), < L. accusabilis (found once in Cicero), blameworthy, < accusare, accuse, blame: see accuse.] Liable to be accused or censured; chargeable; blamable: as, accusable of a crime.

Nature's improvision were justly accusable, if animals, so subject unto diseases from bilious causes, should want a proper conveyance for choler.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 2.

accusal (ạ-kū′zal), n. Accusation. N. E. D.

accusant† (ạ-kū′zạnt), n. [= Pg. It. accusante, an accuser, < L. accusan(t-)s, ppr. of accusare, accuse: see accuse.] One who accuses; an accuser.

The accusant must hold him to the proof of the charge.
Bp. Hall, Remains, Life, p. 531.

accusation (ak-ū-zā′shọn), n. [< ME. accusacion, -ciоun, < OF. acusation, F. accusation = Sp. acusación = Pg. accusação = It. accusazione, < L. accusatio(n-), an accusation, < accusare, accuse: see accuse.] 1. A charge of wrong-doing; a declaration of the commission of crime or error; imputation of guilt or blame.

Wrote they unto him an accusation against the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem. Ezra iv. 6.

The breath
Of accusation kills an innocent name.
Shelley, The Cenci, iv. 4.

2. That which is imputed as a crime or wrong; the specific guilt or error charged, as in a statement or indictment: as, what is the accusation against me? the accusation is murder.

And set up over his head his accusation. Mat. xxvii. 37.

3. The act of accusing or charging; crimination.

Thus they in mutual accusation spent
The fruitless hours. Milton, P. L., ix. 1187.

= Syn. Charge, impeachment, arraignment, indictment, crimination, imputation.

accusatival (ạ-kū-zạ-tī′vạl), a. Pertaining to the accusative case. Jour. of Philology.

accusative (ạ-kū′zạ-tiv), a. and n. [= F. accusatif = Sp. acusativo = Pg. It. accusativo, all in the sense of accusative case, Pg. also in sense of censuring, < L. accusativus, prop. belonging to an accusation, but used only in the grammatical sense (with or without casus, case), being a translation of Gr. αἰτιατική (sc. πτῶσις, casus), regarded as 'the case of accusing,' fem. of αἰτιατικός, usually translated 'of or for accusation,' but rather '(the case) of the effect,' or terminal cause of the action of the verb, < αἰτιατόν, effect, neut. of αἰτιατός, effected, < αἰτιᾶσθαι, allege as the cause, charge, accuse, < αἰτία, a cause, occasion, charge.] I. a. 1†. Producing accusations; accusatory.

This hath been a very accusative age.
Sir E. Dering, Speeches, p. 112.

2. In gram., noting especially the direct object of a verb, and to a considerable extent (and probably primarily) destination or goal of motion: applied to a case forming part of the original Indo-European declension (as of the case-systems of other languages), and retained as a distinct form by the older languages of the family, and by some of the modern. In English grammar it is usually called the objective case. Its abbreviation is acc.

II. n. Short for accusative case. See I., 2.

accusatively (a-kū'za-tiv-li), adv. 1†. In an accusative manner; by way of accusation.—2. In gram., in the position or relation of the accusative case.

accusatorial (a-kū-za-tō'ri-al), a. [< L. accusatorius, < accusator, accuser: see accusatory.] Of or pertaining to an accuser or a prosecutor: as, accusatorial functions. [Rare.]

accusatorially (a-kū-za-tō'ri-al-i), adv. In an accusatorial manner.

accusatory (a-kū'za-tō-ri), a. [< L. accusatorius, < accusator, accuser, < accusare: see accuse.] Accusing; containing an accusation: as, an accusatory libel.

I would say a word now on two portions of his public life, one of which has been the subject of accusatory, the other of disparaging, criticism.
R. Choate, Addresses, p. 284.

accuse (a-kūz'), v. t.; pret. and pp. accused, ppr. accusing. [< ME. accusen, acusen, < OF. acuser, F. accuser = Pr. acusar, accusar = Sp. acusar = Pg. accusar = It. accusare, < L. accusare, call one to account, < ad, to, + causa, a cause, reason, account, suit at law: see cause.] 1. To make an imputation against, as of a crime, fault, or error; charge with guilt or blame; affect with specific censure: used either absolutely or with of before the thing charged, and sometimes with for before the subject of censure: as, to accuse one of high crimes, or as an accomplice in crime; to accuse nature for our misfortunes.

Accuse not nature; she hath done her part.
Milton, P. L., viii. 561.

The accusing spirit, which flew up to heaven's chancery with the oath, blushed as he gave it in.
Sterne, Tristram Shandy, vii. 7.

The professors are accused of the ill practices.
Addison.

The Romanists accuse the Protestants for their indifference.
Southey, Quarterly Rev., I. 193.

2. To indicate; evince; show; manifest; show signs of. [A Gallicism, now rare.]

Amphialus answered . . . with such excusing himself that more and more accused his love to Philoclea.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, ii.

=Syn. 1. Accuse, Charge, Indict, Arraign, Impeach, Incriminate, criminate, inculpate, tax with, taunt with, impute to. Of these words charge is the most general, and may be the weakest, being used of any sort of imputation, large or small, against persons or things formally or informally, publicly or privately. Accuse commonly, though not invariably, expresses something more formal and grave than charge. Indict is a purely legal term, restricted to the action of a grand jury when it makes a formal complaint against a supposed offender, in order that he may be brought to trial. Arraign has primarily the same meaning with indict, but is freer in figurative use: as, to arraign a political party at the bar of public sentiment. Impeach is to bring to answer before some legislative body for wrong-doing in a public office, and has been so long associated with the peculiar dignity, solemnity, and impressiveness of such trials that it has been lifted into corresponding importance in its figurative uses. Incriminate is obsolescent except in the special meaning of involving another with one's self: as, in his confession he incriminated several persons hitherto unsuspected. To charge with a fault; to accuse of dishonesty; to indict for felony and arraign before the court; to impeach a magistrate or one's motives or veracity; to incriminate others with one's self in a confession of guilt.

And from rebellion shall derive his name,
Though of rebellion others he accuse.
Milton, P. L., xii. 37.

Charging the Scripture with obscurity and imperfection.
Stillingfleet.

It is held that the power of impeachment extends only to such offenders as may afterward be indicted and punished according to law: that is, that the house can only impeach, the senate remove, for indictable offenses.
Cyc. Pol. Sci., II. 481.

Day by day the men who guide public affairs are arraigned before the judgment-seat of the race.
Bancroft, Hist. Const., I. 5.

accuse† (a-kūz'), n. [=It. accusa, charge; from the verb.] Accusation.

York . . .
By false accuse doth level at my life.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 1.

accusement† (a-kūz'ment), n. [< ME. acusement, < OF. acusement, accusement*, < acuser, accuse.] Accusation.

By forged accusements . . . were condemned.
Holinshed.

accuser (a-kū'zėr), n. [< ME. accuser, acusour, < AF. accusour, OF. acusor, acuseor, F. accusateur, < L. accusator, accuser, < accusare: see accuse, v.] One who accuses or blames; specifically, a person who formally accuses another of an offense before a magistrate or a tribunal of any kind.

accusingly (a-kū'zing-li), adv. In an accusing manner.

accustom (a-kus'tom), v. [< late ME. acustome, acustume, < OF. acoustumer, acostumer (F. accoutumer = Sp. acostumbrar = Pg. acostumar = It. accostumare), < a (L. ad), to, + coustume (F. coutume), custom: see custom.] I. trans. To familiarize by custom or use; habituate or inure: as, to accustom one's self to a spare diet; time may accustom one to almost anything; to be accustomed to hard work.

So accustomed to his freaks and follies, that she viewed them all as matters of course.
Hawthorne, Twice-Told Tales, I. 176.

We are not accustomed to express our thoughts or emotions by symbolical actions.
Emerson, Misc., p. 24.

=Syn. To habituate, familiarize, inure, harden, train.

II.† intrans. 1. To be wont; be in the habit of doing.

A boat, over-freighted, sunk, and all drowned, saving one woman, in her first popping up again, which most living things accustom, got hold of the boat.
Carew.

2. To consort or cohabit.

Much better do we Britons fulfil the work of nature than you Romans; we, with the best men, accustom openly; you, with the basest, commit private adultery.
Milton, Hist. Eng., iii.

accustom† (a-kus'tom), n. [< accustom, v.] Custom: as, "individual accustom of life," Milton, Tetrachordon (ed. 1851), p. 171.

accustomable† (a-kus'tom-a-bl), a. [< accustom + -able.] Of long custom; habitual; customary: as, "accustomable residence," Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, xx.

accustomably† (a-kus'tom-a-bli), adv. According to custom or habit; habitually.

Kings' fines accustomably paid.
Bacon, Alienations.

accustomance† (a-kus'tom-ans), n. [< ME. acustumaunce, accustomance, < OF. acoustumance (F. accoutumance: cf. Pr. It. costumanza), < acoustumer, acostumer, accustom: see accustom, v. Cf. custom.] Custom; habitual use or practice.

Through accustomance and negligence.
Boyle.

accustomarily† (a-kus'tom-ā-ri-li), adv. According to custom or common practice; customarily.

accustomary† (a-kus'tom-ā-ri), a. [< accustom + -ary. Cf. customary.] Usual; customary.

Usual and accustomary swearing.
Dr. Featley, Dippers Dipt, p. 160.

accustomed (a-kus'tomd), p. a. [< ME. acustomed; pp. of accustom.] 1. Often practised or used; customary; habitual; made familiar through use; usual; wonted: as, in their accustomed manner.

It is an accustomed action with her.
Shak., Macb., v. 1.

My old accustomed corner here is,
The table still is in the nook;
Ah! vanished many a busy year is
This well-known chair since last I took.
Thackeray, Ballad of Bouillabaisse.

2†. Having custom or patronage; frequented.

A well-accustom'd house, a handsome barkeeper, with clean obliging drawers, soon get the master an estate.
Mrs. Centlivre, Bold Stroke, i. 1.

accustomedness (a-kus'tomd-nes), n. Familiarity; wontedness; the quality of being accustomed (to). [Rare.]

Accustomedness to sin hardens the heart.
Bp. Pearce, Sermons, p. 230.

Freedom from that bad accustomedness to evil and wrong.
The American, VII. 164.

★ace (ās), n. [< ME. as, aas, < OF. as, an ace, F. as = Sp. as = Pg. az = It. asso = G. ass = D. aas = Icel. āss = Sw. ess = Dan. es, < L. as (acc. assem), a unit, a pound, a foot, usually but prob. erroneously derived from ἀς, said to be the Tarentine form of Gr. εἷς (acc. ἕνα), one, a unit; akin to L. sem-el and E. same: see same.] 1. A unit; specifically, a single pip on a card or die, or a card or die marked with a single pip. —2. A very small quantity; a particle; an atom; a trifle: as, the creditor will not abate an ace of his demand.

I'll not wag an ace farther.
Dryden, Spanish Friar.

-ace. [< F. -ace, < It. -azzo, -accio, m., -azza, -accia, f., an aug. or depreciative suffix.] A noun-suffix occurring in populace, pinnace, etc. (which see). It is not used as an English formative. In menace, grimace, and other words, the suffix is of different origin.

-acea. [L., neut. pl. of -aceus: see -aceous.] A suffix used in New Latin to form names of classes or orders of animals, as Cetacea, Crustacea, etc., these names being properly adjectives, agreeing with Latin animalia (animals) understood.

-aceæ. [L., fem. pl. of -aceus: see -aceous.] A suffix used in New Latin to form names of families of plants, as Araceæ, Liliaceæ, Rosaceæ, etc., these names being properly adjectives, agreeing with Latin plantæ (plants) understood.

-acean. [< L. -ace-us + -an.] A suffix of adjectives, equivalent to -aceous (which see); also of nouns to supply a singular to collective plurals in -acea, as cetacean, crustacean, etc.

acedia (a-sē'di-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκηδία, collateral form of ἀκήδεια, indifference, heedlessness, in eccl. use 'sloth,' < ἀκηδής, indifferent, heedless, < ἀ- priv. + κῆδος, care, distress, κήδεσθαι, be troubled or distressed; in ML. corrupted to accidia, > ME. accidie, q. v.] An abnormal mental condition, characterized by carelessness, listlessness, fatigue, and want of interest in affairs.

A melancholy leading to desperation, and known to theologians under the name of acedia, was not uncommon in monasteries, and most of the recorded instances of mediæval suicides in Catholicism were by monks.
Lecky, Europ. Morals, II. 55.

acedy (as'ē-di), n. Same as acedia.

Aceldama (a-sel'dā-mä), n. [ME. (Wyclif) Achildemah, Acheldemah; < L. Aceldama, < Gr. Ἀκελδαμά, representing W. Aram. ḥaqel demā, 'field of blood.'] 1. A field said to have been situated south of Jerusalem, the potter's field, purchased with the bribe which Judas took for betraying his Master, and therefore called the "field of blood." It was appropriated to the interment of strangers. Hence—2. Figuratively, any place stained by slaughter.

The system of warfare . . . which had already converted immense tracts into one universal Aceldama.
De Quincey.

Acemetæ, Acemeti, n. pl. See Acœmetæ, Acœmeti.

Acemetic (as-ē-met'ik), a. [< Acemeti: see Acœmetæ.] Belonging to or resembling the Acemetæ or Acœmetæ; hence, sleepless.

That proposition [that one of the Trinity was made flesh] . . . was impugned by the Acemetic monks alone.
Mullock, tr. of Liguori, p. 173.

acensuada (Sp. pron. ä-then-sö-ä'dä), n. [Sp., pp. of acensuar, to lease out for a certain rent, < a- (< L. ad, to) + censo, rent: see censo.] In Mexican law, property subject to the lien of a censo (which see).

acentric (a-sen'trik), a. [< Gr. ἀκεντρος, not central, < ἀ- priv. + κέντρον, center: see center.] Not centric; having no center.

-aceous. [Accom. of L. -ācē-us, -a, -um, a compound adj. termination, as in herb-āceus, rosāceus, gallin-āceus, cret-āceus, test-āceus, etc.: see the corresponding E. forms.] An adjective-suffix, as in herbaceous, cretaceous, etc., used especially in botany and zoölogy, forming English adjectives to accord with New Latin nouns in -aceæ, -acea (which see), as rosaceous, liliaceous, cetaceous, crustaceous, etc.

Acephala (a-sef'a-lä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀκέφαλα, neut. pl. of ἀκέφαλος, headless: see acephalus.] 1. A term introduced by Cuvier into systematic zoölogy, and applied by him as a class name to a combination of the conchiferous lamellibranchiate mollusks and the tunicates. Later writers apply it to the lamellibranchiate mollusks alone, which constitute a natural class, distinguished by Lamarck as the Conchifera. All the ordinary bivalves belong to this class. The Acephala or Acéphales of Cuvier were at first (1789) the third order of Mollusca, and included cirripeds, tunicates, and brachiopods with ordinary bivalve mollusks, being thus equivalent to Cirripedia, Tunicata, and Conchifera of Lamarck. In 1804 Cuvier excluded the cirripeds and brachiopods, and made Acephala a class of Mollusca. In the "Règne Animal" (1817–1829) Acephala are Cuvier's fourth class of Mollusca, with two orders, Acephala testacea, or shelled acephals, the ordinary bivalve mollusks, and Acephala nuda, or shell-less acephals, the tunicates.

2. Same as Acrania.—3. In Latreille's system of classification (1795), one of seven orders of the Linnean Aptera, containing the spiders, etc., corresponding to the Arachnides palpistes of Lamarck, and synonymous with Arachnida.—4. In Haeckel's classification, a group of Mollusca composed of the Spirobranchia, or Brachiopoda, and the Lamellibranchia.

Acephalæa (a-sef-ạ-lē′ạ), n. pl. [NL., a modification of Acephala, after Gr. κεφάλαιος (neut. pl. κεφάλαια), belonging to the head, ‹ κεφαλή, head: see Acephala.] A modification by Lamarck of the name Acephala, given at first to that group as an ordinal name, and later to the bivalve shells as a class name. In Lamarck's system of classification of 1801 the Acephalæa were the second order of Mollusca, the Acephala of Cuvier, 1789, including cirripeds, tunicates, and brachiopods with ordinary bivalve mollusks. In 1809 Lamarck excluded the cirripeds, and in 1812 he excluded the tunicates, making Acephalæa a class of Evertebrata, with two orders, Monomyaria and Dimyaria. See Conchifera.

acephalan (a-sef′ạ-lạn), a. and n. [‹ Acephala.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Acephala or to an acephal.

II. n. One of the Acephala; an acephal.

Acephali (a-sef′ạ-lī), n. pl. [LL., pl. of acephalus: see acephalus.] 1. Literally, those who have no head or chief. In eccles. hist.: (a) Those members of the Council of Ephesus who refused to follow either St. Cyril or John of Antioch. (b) An Egyptian Monophysite sect of the fifth and sixth centuries, composed of those who refused to follow the patriarch of Alexandria in subscribing the edict of union issued by the Emperor Zeno. (c) Those who took part in the sessions of the General Council of Basle that were not presided over by the papal legates. (d) A name given to the Flagellants, because of their separation from the authority of the Roman Church. (e) Before the Council of Trent, a class of priests belonging to no diocese.

2. A class of levelers, mentioned in the laws of Henry I. of England, who would acknowledge no head or superior.—3. A fabulous nation in Africa, reported by ancient writers to have no heads: identified by some with the Blemmyes, a historical race.

acephalia (as-e-fā′li-ạ), n. [NL., ‹ Gr. ἀκέφαλος, headless: see acephalus.] In teratol., the absence of the head.

acephalist† (a-sef′ạ-list), n. [As Acephali + -ist.] One who acknowledges no head or superior; specifically, in eccles. hist., one of the Acephali.

These acephalists, who will endure no head but that upon their own shoulders.
Bp. Gauden, Tears of the Church (1659), p. 464.

Acephalite (a-sef′ạ-līt), n. [As Acephali + -ite[1].] One of the Acephali, in any of the senses of that word.

acephalobrachia (a-sef″ạ-lō-brā′ki-ạ), n. [NL.: see acephalobrachius.] In teratol., absence of both head and arms.

acephalobrachius (a-sef″ạ-lō-brā′ki-us), n.; pl. acephalobrachii (-ī). [NL., ‹ Gr. ἀκέφαλος, without a head, + βραχίων, L. brachium, arm.] In teratol., a monster without head or arms.

acephalocardia (a-sef″ạ-lō-kär′di-ạ), n. [NL.: see acephalocardius.] In teratol., absence of both head and heart.

acephalocardius (a-sef″ạ-lō-kär′di-us), n.; pl. acephalocardii (-ī). [NL., ‹ Gr. ἀκέφαλος, without a head, + καρδία = E. heart.] In teratol., a monster without head and heart.

acephalochiria (a-sef″ạ-lō-kī′ri-ạ), n. [NL.: see acephalochirus.] In teratol., absence of both head and hands. Also spelled acephalocheiria.

acephalochirus (a-sef″ạ-lō-kī′rus), n.; pl. acephalochiri (-rī). [NL., ‹ Gr. ἀκέφαλος, without a head, + χείρ, hand.] In teratol., a monster without head and hands. Also spelled ★acephalocheirus.

acephalocyst (a-sef′ạ-lō-sist), n. [‹ NL. acephalocystis, ‹ Gr. ἀκέφαλος, headless (see acephalous), + κύστις, a bag: see cyst[1].] A hydatid; a member of a supposed genus Acephalocystis, instituted by Hunter for the hydatid or encysted stage of Tænia echinococcus. See Tænia.

acephalocystic (a-sef″ạ-lō-sis′tik), a. Pertaining to acephalocysts; having the character of an acephalocyst.

acephalogaster (a-sef′ạ-lō-gas-tėr), n. [NL., ‹ Gr. ἀκέφαλος, without a head, + γαστήρ, belly.] In teratol., a monster destitute of head, chest, and superior parts of the belly.

acephalogasteria (a-sef″ạ-lō-gas-tē′ri-ạ), n. [NL., ‹ acephalogaster.] In teratol., absence of the head and superior parts of the trunk.

Acephalophora (a-sef-ạ-lof′ō-rạ), n. pl. [NL., ‹ Gr. ἀ- priv. + κεφαλή, head, + -φόρος, -bearing, ‹ φέρειν = E. bear[1].] A name proposed by De Blainville, 1814, for the acephalous mollusks of Cuvier, including the lamellibranchiates and tunicates together with the brachiopods. In De Blainville's system of classification, the Acephalophora were the third class of Malacozoa, divided into the orders Palliobranchiata, Rudista, Lamellibranchiata, and Heterobranchia; thus corresponding inexactly to Cuvier's Acephala, and exactly to Lamarck's Acephalæa of 1809, or Lamarck's later Conchifera and Tunicata together.

acephalophoran (a-sef-ạ-lof′ō-rạn), n. One of the Acephalophora.

acephalopodia (a-sef″ạ-lō-pō′di-ạ), n. [NL.: see acephalopodius.] In teratol., absence of head and feet.

acephalopodius (a-sef″ạ-lō-pō′di-us), n.; pl. acephalopodii (-ī). [NL., ‹ Gr. ἀκέφαλος, without a head, + ποῦς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] In teratol., a monster without head or feet.

acephalorachia (a-sef″ạ-lō-rā′ki-ạ), n. [NL., ‹ Gr. ἀκέφαλος, without a head, + ῥάχις, spine.] In teratol., absence of head and vertebral column.

acephalostomia (a-sef″ạ-lō-stō′mi-ạ), n. [NL.: see acephalostomus.] In teratol., the absence of the head with the presence of a mouth-like opening.

acephalostomus (a-sef-ạ-los′tō-mus), n.; pl. acephalostomi (-mī). [NL., ‹ Gr. ἀκέφαλος, without a head, + στόμα, mouth.] In teratol., a monster without a head, but having in its superior parts an aperture resembling a mouth.

acephalothoracia (a-sef″ạ-lō-thō-rā′si-ạ), n. [NL.: see acephalothorus.] In teratol., absence of head and chest.

acephalothorus (a-sef″ạ-lō-thō′rus), n.; pl. acephalothori (-ī). [NL., short for acephalothoracius* (see above), ‹ Gr. ἀκέφαλος, without a head, + θώραξ, a breast-plate, the chest: see thorax.] In teratol., a monster without head or chest.

acephalous (a-sef′ạ-lus), a. [‹ LL. acephalus, ‹ Gr. ἀκέφαλος, without a head, ‹ ἀ- priv. + κεφαλή, a head: see a-[18] and cephalic.] 1. Without a head; headless: applied—(a) In zoöl., particularly to the members of the class Acephala (which see): opposed to encephalous and cephalous. (b) In bot., to an ovary the style of which springs from its base instead of its apex. (c) In teratol., to a fetus having no head. (d) In pros., to a verse whose scale differs from the regular scale of the same meter by lacking the first syllable of the latter.

2. Without a leader or chief.

The tendency to division was strengthened by the acephalous condition of the Courts. Stubbs, Const. Hist., II. 267.

3. Wanting a distinct beginning; indefinite in subject.

A false or acephalous structure of sentence.
De Quincey, Rhetoric.

acephalus (a-sef′ạ-lus), n.; pl. acephali (-lī). [LL. (see Acephali and acephalous) and NL.] 1. An obsolete name of the tænia or tapeworm.—2. In teratol., a monster without a head.—3. In pros., a verse defective at the beginning.

ace-point (ās′point), n. The single spot on a card or die; the first point of the tables in backgammon.

acequia (ä-thā′kē-ä), n. [Sp.] A canal for irrigation.

Irrigating canals or acequias conduct the water of the Gila over all this cultivated district.
Mowry, Arizona and Sonora, p. 188.

Acer (ā′sėr), n. [L., a maple-tree, prob. so called from its pointed leaves, ‹ √ ac*, be sharp or pointed, appearing in acerb, acetic, acid, acute, Sugar-Maple (Acer Saccharum). a, flowering branch; b, sterile flower; c, stamen; d, fruit with one carpel cut open to show the seed. (From Gray's "Genera of the Plants of the U. S.") etc.] A genus of dicotyledonous trees and shrubs, commonly known as maples, type of the family Aceraceæ, order Sapindales, having opposite simple leaves and the fruit a double-winged samara. It includes about 50 species, of northern temperate regions, many of them valuable timber-trees or widely cultivated for shade and ornament. Sugar is obtained in America from the sap of A. Saccharum, the sugar-maple. See maple.

Acera (as′ẹ-rạ), n. [NL., fem. sing. or neut. pl. of Acerus, ‹ Gr. ἄκερος, without horns: see Acerus and acerous[2].] 1. A genus of mollusks, of the family Bullidæ or Tornatellidæ, belonging to the tectibranchiate division of opisthobranchiate gastropods. These bubble-shells have a thin horny shell, flattened and almost inclosed, with a slit at the suture as in the olive-shells; the head is long and without eyes. The genus was instituted in this form by Lamarck, 1818. A. bullata is an example. Originally spelled Akera. O. F. Müller, 1776.

Acera bullata, one of the Bullidæ.

2. Used as a pl. A group of apterous insects without antennæ. In this sense, the word is now a mere synonym of Arachnida (which see).—3. [Used as a plural.] A group of gastropodous mollusks without tentacles. [Disused.]

Aceraceæ (as-ẹ-rā′sē-ē), n. pl. [‹ Acer.] A family of dicotyledonous trees, distinguished from related families by its opposite leaves and exalbuminous seeds. It embraces the maple (Acer), including the box-elder (Negundo), and a second genus, Dipteronia, of a single species, native of China.

acerate (as′ẹ-rāt), n. [‹ L. acer, maple, + -ate[1].] A salt of aceric acid.

aceratophorous (as″ẹ-rā-tof′ō-rus), a. [‹ Gr. ἀ- priv. + κέρας (κερατ-), horn, + -φόρος, ‹ φέρειν = E. bear[1].] Not bearing horns; hornless: as, an aceratophorous ruminant. [Little used.]

acerb (a-sėrb′), a. [= F. acerbe = Sp. Pg. It. acerbo, ‹ L. acerbus, bitter, sour, ‹ acer, sharp, bitter: see acrid.] Sour, bitter, and harsh to the taste; sour, with astringency or roughness; hence, figuratively, sharp, harsh, etc.

We have a foible for Ritson with his oddities of spelling, his acerb humor, . . . and his obstinate disbelief in Doctor Percy's folio manuscript.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 359.

The dark, acerb, and caustic little professor.
Charlotte Brontë, Villette, xix.

acerbate (a-sėr′bāt or as′ėr-bāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. acerbated, ppr. acerbating. [‹ L. acerbatus, pp. of acerbare, make bitter or sour, ‹ acerbus, bitter, sour: see acerb, and cf. exacerbate.] To make sour, bitter, or harsh to the taste; hence, to embitter or exasperate. [Rare.]

acerbate (a-sėr′bāt or as′ėr-bāt), a. [‹ L. acerbatus, pp.: see the verb.] Embittered; exasperated; severe. N. E. D.

acerbitude (a-sėr′bi-tūd), n. [‹ L. acerbitudo (rare), equiv. in sense to acerbitas: see acerbity.] Sourness; acerbity. Bailey. [Rare.]

acerbity (a-sėr′bi-ti), n.; pl. acerbities (-tiz). [Earlier acerbitie, ‹ F. acerbité = Sp. acerbidad = It. acerbità, ‹ L. acerbita(t-)s, sharpness, sourness, harshness, ‹ acerbus, sharp: see acerb.] 1. Sourness, with roughness or astringency of taste.—2. Poignancy or severity.

It is ever a rule, that any over-great penalty, besides the acerbity of it, deadens the execution of the law.
Bacon, Works, II. 542.

We may imagine what acerbity of pain must be endured by our Lord. Barrow, Sermons, xxvi.

3. Harshness or severity, as of temper or expression.

The lectures of Hazlitt display more than his usual strength, acuteness, and eloquence, with less than the usual acerbities of his temper.
Whipple, Ess. and Rev., II. 10.

acerdese (as′ėr-dēs), n. [F.] Gray oxid of manganese: a name given by Beudant to the mineral manganite.

acere (as′ēr), n. A mollusk of the genus Acera.

aceric (a-ser′ik), a. [‹ L. acer (see Acer) + -ic.] Pertaining to the maple; obtained from the maple.—Aceric acid, an acid found in the juice of Acer campestre, the common European maple.

Acerina (as-ẹ-rī′nạ), n. [NL., as Acerus, q. v., + -ina.] 1. A genus of crustaceans. Rafinesque, 1814.—2. A genus of European river percoid fishes, the popes. Cuvier, 1817.

Acerineæ (as-ẹ-rin′ē-ē), n. pl. [‹ Acer + -in- + -eæ.] A group of the former order Sapindaceæ, distinguished by its opposite leaves and exalbuminous seeds. It included the maple (Acer), the box-elder (Negundo), and a third genus, Dobinea, of a single species, native of the Himalayas. See Aceraceæ.

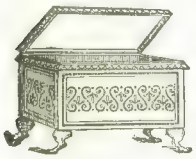
Acerininæ (as″ẹ-ri-ni′nē), n. pl. [‹ Acerina, 2, + -inæ.] A name proposed as a subfamily designation for the genus Acerina, including the ruffe and related percoid fishes having a cavernous head and a single dorsal fin.

acerose (as'ę-rōs), a. [< L. acerosus, chaffy, < acus (acer-) = Gr. ἀχυρον, chaff; akin to E. awn, q. v., and also to L. acer, sharp, and acus, a needle; from a root ac*, be sharp. The second sense seems to rest upon L. acus (acu-), a needle; but the form can be derived only from acus (acer-), chaff.] In bot.: (a) Chaffy; resembling chaff. [Very rare.] (b) Straight, slender, rigid, and sharp-pointed, as the leaves of the pine; needle-shaped.



Acerose Leaves (Pine).

acerote†, a. Probably a misprint for acerose. "Acerote bread, browne bread." Cockeram (1612). "Acerote, browne bread, not ranged, chaffebread, hungrie bread." Minsheu (1625).

acerous[1] (as'ę-rus), a. Same as acerose.

acerra (a-ser'ą), n. [L.] In Rom. antiq.: (a) A box or casket used to hold the incense which was thrown upon the altar during sacrifices. (b) A small portable altar on which incense was burned, especially at funeral ceremonies.

Ancient Acerra.

acertain†, v. t. An occasional and more correct form of ascertain (which see).

Acerus (as'ę-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκερος, without horns: see acerous[2].] 1. In ornith., a genus of hornbills, family Bucerotidæ, having no casque. A. nepalensis is the type and only species. B. R. Hodgson, 1832. Also spelled Aceros.—2. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects. Dejean, 1833.

acerval (a-sėr'val), a. [< L. acervalis, < acervus, a heap, akin to acer, sharp, pointed, and perhaps to acer, a maple-tree.] Pertaining to a heap. [Rare.]

acervate (a-sėr'vāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. acervated, ppr. acervating. [< L. acervatus, pp. of acervare, heap up, < acervus, a heap: see acerval.] To heap up. [Rare.]

acervate (a-sėr'vāt), a. [< L. acervatus, pp.: see the verb.] In bot., heaped; growing in heaps, or in closely compacted clusters.

acervately (a-sėr'vāt-li), adv. In an acervate manner; in heaps. [Rare.]

acervation (as-ėr-vā'shọn), n. [< L. acervatio(n-), < acervare, heap up: see acervate, v.] The act of heaping together. Bullokar, 1676.

acervative (a-sėr'vą-tiv), a. Heaped up; forming a heap. [Rare.]

> Piled together irregularly, or in an acervative manner. W. B. Carpenter.

acervose† (a-sėr'vōs), a. [< L. as if acervosus*, < acervus, a heap.] Full of heaps. Bailey.

Acervulina (a-sėr-vū-lī'nă), n. [NL., < acervulus, q. v., + -ina.] A genus of foraminifers, of the family Nummulinidæ.

Acervulinæ (a-sėr-vū-lī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < acervulus, q. v., + -inæ.] A group of foraminiferous rhizopodous protozoans, in which the spiral form of the shell is so obscured or effaced by the irregular addition of new chambers that the whole appears as if heaped together.

acervuline (a-sėr'vū-lin), a. [< NL. acervulus, q. v., + -ine[1].] 1. Having the form or appearance of little heaps; heaped up. [Rare.]

> The latter . . . are often piled up in an irregular acervuline manner. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 483.

★2. Of or pertaining to the Acervulinæ.

acervulus (a-sėr'vū-lus), n.; pl. acervuli (-lī). [NL., a little heap, dim. of L. acervus, a heap: see acerval.] In anat., a mass of calcareous gritty particles, consisting principally of earthy salts, found within and sometimes on the outside of the conarium or pineal body of the brain; brain-sand. Commonly called acervulus cerebri (acervulus of the brain).

acescence (a-ses'ens), n. [< F. acescence = It. acescenza, < L. as if acescentia*, < acescen(t-)s, ppr. of acescere, become sour: see acescent.] The act or process of becoming acescent or moderately sour.

acescency (a-ses'en-si), n. [See acescence.] The state or quality of being moderately sour; mild acidity.

> Nurses should never give suck after fasting; the milk having an acescency very prejudicial to the . . . recipient. W. Jones, Life of Bp. Horne, p. 350.

acescent (a-ses'ent), a. [< F. acescent = Pg. acescente, < L. acescen(t-)s, ppr. of acescere, become sour, < acere, be sour: see acid.] Turning sour; becoming tart or acid by spontaneous decomposition, as vegetable or animal juices or infusions; hence, slightly sour; acidulous; subacid.

> The vinegar which is most esteemed for culinary purposes is that prepared from wine, from the acescent varieties of which it is extensively manufactured in France. W. A. Miller, Elem. of Chem., § 1277.

Aceste (a-ses'tē), n. [NL., < (?) Gr. ἀκεστή, fem. of ἀκεστός, curable, easily revived, < ἀκέῖσθαι, cure, heal.] A notable genus of spatangoid sea-urchins. A. bellidifera is a species having most of the upper surface occupied by the deeply sunken, odd, anterior ambulacrum, with a narrow fasciole, and large flattened spines incurved over the hollow, in which are a number of great discoidal suckers.

> Aceste may be regarded as a permanent form of the young of Schizaster. Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 176.

acetable† (as'e-tą-bl), n. [< OF. acetabule, < L. acetabulum: see acetabulum.] 1. An acetabulum; a measure of about one eighth of a pint. Holland.—2. In anat., same as acetabulum, 2 (a).

acetabula, n. Plural of acetabulum.

acetabular (as-e-tab'ū-lär), a. Belonging to the acetabulum; of the nature of an acetabulum; cotyloid; cup-like.

Acetabulifera (as-e-tab-ū-lif'ę-rą), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of acetabulifer: see acetabuliferous.] A name introduced by D'Orbigny, 1834, as an ordinal term for the cephalopods with suckers on the inner faces of the arms, that is, the cuttlefishes, squids, and all other living cephalopods except the Nautilidæ. Same as Cryptodibranchiata and Dibranchiata (which see).

acetabuliferous (as-e-tab-ū-lif'ę-rus), a. [< NL. acetabulifer, < L. acetabulum, a sucker, + ferre = E. bear[1].] 1. Having or bearing acetabula.—2. Pertaining to the Acetabulifera; having rows of cup-like suckers, as the cuttlefish.

acetabuliform (as-e-tab'ū-li-fôrm), a. [< L. acetabulum, a cup-shaped vessel, + -formis, < forma, shape.] 1. In bot., having the form of a shallow cup or bowl.—2. Having the form of an acetabulum; sucker-shaped; cup-like; cotyloid.

★acetabulum (as-e-tab'ū-lum), n.; pl. acetabula (-lą). [L., < acetum, vinegar: see acetum.] 1. In Rom. antiq.: (a) A vinegar-cup; a small wide-mouthed vessel of earthenware or metal, sometimes placed on the larger food-dishes, in which vinegar or other condiment was served. (b) A dry or liquid measure, .0677 of a liter. Daremberg et Saglio. (c) A similar cup or vessel used by jugglers in their feats.—2. In anat.: (a) The cavity of the os innominatum, or hip-bone, which receives the head of the femur; the cotyle, or cotyloid cavity, formed at the junction of the ilium, ischium, and pubis. See cuts under sacrarium, quarter, innominate. (b) A cotyledon or lobe of the placenta of ruminating animals. (c) In insects, the socket of the trunk in which the leg is inserted. (d) A cup-like sucker, such as those with which the arms of the cuttlefish and other dibranchiate cephalopodous mollusks are provided. See cut under Sepia. (e) A sessile or pedunculate sucker-like organ on the ventral surface of certain entozoa.—3. In bot.: (a) The cup- or saucer-like fructification of many lichens. (b) The receptacle of certain fungi.—4. In music, an ancient instrument, made either of earthenware or of metal, used like a kettledrum or struck against another acetabulum after the manner of cymbals.

Acetabula (the two small vessels shown as resting on the large dish).

acetal (as'e-tal), n. [< acet-ic + al(cohol).] A colorless mobile liquid, $C_6H_{14}O_2$, with an ether-like odor, produced by the imperfect oxidation of alcohol, under the influence of platinum black.

acetamid, acetamide (a-set'ą-mid or -mīd, or as'e-tą-mid or -mīd), n. [< acet-ate + amid.] A white crystalline solid, $CH_3CO.NH_2$, produced by distilling ammonium acetate, or by heating ethyl acetate with strong aqueous ammonia. It combines with both acids and metals to form unstable compounds.

acetanilide (a-set-an'i-lid), n. [< acet-yl + anilide.] A substance, $C_6H_5NH.C_2H_3O$, formed by heating aniline and glacial acetic acid for several hours, or by the action of acetyl chlorid or acetic anhydrid on aniline. Fownes.

acetary† (as'e-tär), n. [< L. acetaria: see acetary.] A dish of raw herbs with vinegar; a salad.

acetarious (as-ę-tā'ri-us), a. [< L. acetarius*, adj., found only in neut. pl. acetaria, as noun: see acetary.] 1. Containing acetary, as certain fruits.—2. Used in salads, as lettuce, mustard, cress, endive, etc.

acetary (as'e-tą-ri), n. [< L. acetaria (sc. holera, herbs), herbs prepared with vinegar and oil, salad, neut. pl. of acetarius*, < acetum, vinegar: see acetum. Cf. It. acetario, a salad.] An acid pulpy substance in certain fruits, as the pear, inclosed in a congeries of small calculous bodies toward the base of the fruit. Craig.

acetate (as'e-tāt), n. [= F. acétate = Sp. Pg. acetato, < NL. acetatum, < L. acetum, vinegar: see acetum and -ate[1].] In chem., a salt formed by the union of acetic acid with a base.

acetated (as'e-tā-ted), p. a. [As if pp. of acetate*, v.] Combined with acetic acid.

acetation (as-e-tā'shọn), n. [As if < acetate*, v.] Same as acetification.

acetic (a-set'ik or a-sē'tik), a. [= F. acétique = Sp. Pg. acetico, < NL. aceticus, < L. acetum, vinegar: see acetum.] Having the properties of vinegar; sour.—Acetic acid, $CH_3CO.OH$, a colorless liquid with a strongly acid and pungent smell and taste. In the arts it is chiefly prepared by the oxidation of alcohol (acetous fermentation) and by the dry distillation of wood. It is present in vinegar in a dilute and impure form. In its pure state, at temperatures below 62° F., it is a crystalline solid, and is known as glacial or crystalline acetic acid.—Acetic anhydrid, $(CH_3CO)_2O$, a colorless mobile liquid with an odor like that of acetic acid, but more irritating. On standing in contact with water it is gradually converted into acetic acid. Also called acetic oxid.—Acetic esters, compounds consisting of acetates of alcohol radicals. Common acetic ester is a limpid mobile liquid having a penetrating, refreshing smell, and a pleasant burning taste. It is used in medicine, and as a flavoring ingredient in the poorer classes of wines. It is prepared by distilling a mixture of alcohol, oil of vitriol, and sodium acetate.—Acetic ferment, a vinegar ferment, caused by Bacterium aceti and B. Pasteurianum, which is the agent in the production of vinegar in wine, cider, etc., by the oxidation of alcohol.

acetidin (a-set'i-din), n. [< acet-ic + -id + -in.] Same as diacetin.

acetification (a-set″i-fi-kā'shọn), n. [< acetify: see -fication.] The act or process of acetifying or becoming acetous; conversion into vinegar.—Chemical acetification, the conversion of wine, beer, cider, and other alcoholic fluids into vinegar. It has been shown to depend upon the presence of a minute fungus (Mycoderma aceti of Pasteur), which derives its food from the albuminous and mineral matter present in the liquor; it is very rapidly developed, and, absorbing the oxygen of the air, transmits it to the alcohol, which by oxidation is transformed into vinegar. See fermentation.

acetifier (a-set'i-fī-ėr), n. An apparatus for hastening the acetification of fermented liquors by the exposure of large surfaces to the air. The liquor enters the top of a cask or vat containing layers of shavings or brushwood, by which it is divided and distributed, and, as it trickles downward, comes into intimate contact with air which is admitted through perforations in the sides of the vat.

acetify (a-set'i-fī), v.; pret. and pp. acetified, ppr. acetifying. [< L. acetum, vinegar, + E. -fy, make.] I. trans. To convert into vinegar; make acetous.

II. intrans. To become acetous; be converted into vinegar.

acetimeter, acetometer (as-e-tim'e-tėr, -tom'-e-tėr), n. [= F. acétimètre = Pg. acetometro, < L. acetum, vinegar, + Gr. μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the specific gravity of vinegar or acetic acid.

acetimetrical (a-set-i-met'ri-kal), a. [< acetimetric* (< acetimeter) + -al.] Of or pertaining to acetimetry.

> The acetimetrical method employed by the Excise. Ure, Dict., I. 16.

acetimetry (as-e-tim'e-tri), n. The act or process of ascertaining the specific gravity of vinegar or acetic acid.

acetin (as'e-tin), n. [< acet-ic + -in.] A compound obtained by the union of one molecule of glycerin with one, two, or three molecules of acetic acid. The acetins may also be regarded as glycerin in which one, two, or three atoms of hydrogen are replaced by acetyl. They include monoacetin ($C_5H_{10}O_4$), diacetin or acetidin ($C_7H_{12}O_5$), and triacetin ($C_9H_{14}O_6$). Watts.

aceto-. A prefix to names of chemical compounds, signifying the presence of acetic acid or acetyl radical.

aceto-gelatin (as″e-tō-jel'ą-tin), a. Containing acetic acid and gelatin.—Aceto-gelatin emulsion, an emulsion formed of pyroxylin, acetic acid, alcohol, and gelatin; used for coating certain photographic plates.

acetometer, n. See acetimeter.

acetone (as′e-tōn), n. [< acet-ic + -one.] 1. ★A limpid mobile liquid, $(CH_3)_2CO$, with an agreeable odor and burning taste, produced by the destructive distillation of acetates. It is procured on a large scale from the aqueous liquid obtained in the dry distillation of wood.

2. The general name of a class of compounds which may be regarded as consisting of two alcoholic radicals united by the group CO, or as aldehydes in which hydrogen of the group COH has been replaced by an alcoholic radical.

acetonemia (as″e-tō-nē′mi-ạ), n. [NL., < E. acetone + Gr. αἷμα, blood.] In pathol., a diseased condition characterized by the presence of acetone in the blood. It results from various causes, and may be a symptom of various diseases. Also ★spelled acetonæmia.

acetonic (as-e-ton′ik), a. Pertaining to or derived from acetone.

acetose (as′e-tōs), a. Same as acetous, 1.

acetosity† (as-e-tos′i-ti), n. [=F. acétosité = Sp. acetosidad = It. acetosità, < NL. as if acetosita(t-)s,* < acetosus: see acetous and -ity.] The state or quality of being acetous or sour; acidity; sourness; tartness.

> The juice or pulpe of Tamarinds hath a great acetositie. Woodall, Surgeon's Mate, p. 175.

acetous (as′e-tus or a-sē′tus), a. [=F. acéteux = Sp. Pg. It. acetoso, < NL. acetosus, < L. acetum, vinegar: see acetum.] 1. Having a sour taste; vinegary. Boyle. Also written acetose.—2. Of or pertaining to vinegar; causing or connected with acetification.—Acetous acid, a term formerly applied to impure and dilute acetic acid, under the notion that it was composed of carbon and hydrogen in the same proportions as in acetic acid, but with less oxygen. It is now known that no such acid exists, so that this term has fallen into disuse.—Acetous fermentation, the process by which alcoholic liquors, as beer or wine, ★yield acetic acid by oxidation. See fermentation.

acetum (a-sē′tum), n. [L., vinegar, in form pp. neut. (acetum, sc. vinum, soured wine) of acēre, be sour, akin to acer, sharp, sour: see acid and acrid. Hence (from acētum, not from neut. adj. acidum) Goth. akeit = AS. æced, eced = OS. ecid = OD. edick, etick, D. edik, eek = LG. etik = OHG. ezzih, MHG. ezzich, G. essig = Dan. eddike (> Icel. edik) = Sw. ättika, vinegar.] Vinegar (which see).

acetyl (as′e-til), n. [< acet-ic + -yl, < Gr. ὕλη, matter, substance.] A univalent radical supposed to exist in acetic acid and its derivatives. Aldehyde may be regarded as the hydrid, and acetic acid as the hydrate, of acetyl.

acetylene (a-set′i-lēn or as′e-ti-lēn), n. [< acetyl + -ene.] A colorless endothermic gas, C_2H_2, having, when pure, an ethereal odor, and burning with a luminous smoky flame. Illuminating gas contains a small amount of it, and it is probably formed from other gaseous compounds during the combustion of illuminating gas. It is also formed from its elements, carbon and hydrogen, when the electric arc is passed between carbon-points in an atmosphere of hydrogen; and also by the imperfect combustion of illuminating gas and other hydrocarbons. It is prepared on a commercial scale by the decomposition of water with certain metallic carbides, calcium carbide being chiefly used for the purpose. At pressures of less than two atmospheres it is not explosive except by the action of fulminates. Under greater pressure it explodes at low red heat with a violence nearly equal to that of guncotton. With certain metals and metallic salts it forms explosive compounds. The acetylene series of hydrocarbons has the general formula C_nH_{2n-2}; it includes acetylene or ethine, allylene or propine, butine, etc.

acetylic (as-e-til′ik), a. Of or pertaining to acetyl.

acetylization (as″e-til-i-zā′shọn), n. [< acetyl + -ize + -ation.] In chem., the process of combining or causing to combine with the radical acetyl or with acetic acid.

ach[1]†, n. Same as ache[2].

ach[2] (ach), n. [Cf. Hind. āk, gigantic swallow-wort, a sprout of sugar-cane.] An East Indian name of several species of plants of the rubiaceous genus Morinda.

Achæan, a. and n. See Achean.

Achæmenian (ak-ē-mē′ni-ạn), a. [< L. Achæmenius, a., Achæmenes, n., < Gr. Ἀχαιμένης, a Persian king, ancestor of the Achæmenidæ, Gr. Ἀχαιμενίδαι.] Pertaining or relating to the Achæmenidæ, an ancient royal family of Persia, historically beginning with Cyrus, about 558 B. C., and ending with the conquest of the Persian empire by Alexander the Great, 330 B.C.

achænium, n. See achenium.

achænocarp (a-kē′nō-kärp), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ἀ- priv. + χαίνειν, gape, + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., any dry indehiscent fruit.

Achænodon (a-kē′nō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + χαίνειν, gape, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A genus of fossil carnivorous mammals of North America, having a suilline type of dentition, but considered by Cope as allied to the suborder Lemuroidea. There are several species; A. insolens, the type-species, was as large as a large bear. E. D. Cope, 1873.

Achæta (a-kē′tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of achætus: see achætous.] An ordinal name for gephyreans without setæ, with a terminal mouth, dorsal anus, and the anterior region of the body retractile. It includes the families Sipunculidæ and Priapulidæ.

achætous (a-kē′tus), a. [< NL. achætus, < Gr. ἀ- priv. + χαίτη, hair.] Having no setæ; not chætiferous; specifically, pertaining to the Achæta (which see).

achage (ā′kāj), n. [< ache[1] + -age.] The state or condition of having aches. Tennyson, Queen Mary, i. 1. [Rare.]

Achaian (a-kā′yan), a. and n. See Achean.

achar (ạ-chär′), n. [Also acharr, atchaar, achiar, etc.: Pg. achar, < Hind. āchār, achār (whence Malayan achār, etc.), < Pers. āchār.] In the East, a name for pickles of any kind.

Acharinina (ak″ạ-ri-ni′nạ), n. pl. [NL., for acharnina (?), < Acharnes, a genus of fishes, < Gr. ἀχαρνός, ἀχαρνος, ἀχάρνας, a sea-fish.] In Günther's classification of fishes, the third subfamily group of his family Nandidæ, having hidden pseudobranchiæ or false gills, five ventral rays, and teeth on the palate. It is constituted for fresh-water fishes from tropical America which properly belong to the genus Cichla of the family Cichlidæ.

acharnement (a-shärn′mẹnt), n. [F., < acharner, give a taste of flesh (to dogs, etc.), refl. s'acharner, thirst for blood, < L. as if adcarnare,* < ad, to, + caro (carn-), flesh: see carnal.] Bloodthirstiness, as of wild beasts or of infuriated men; ferocity; eagerness for slaughter. [Rare.]

Agate-shell (Achatina variegata).

achate[1]† (ak′āt), n. [< L. achates: see agate.] An agate.

> The christall, jacinth, achate, ruby red. John Taylor.

achate[2]†, n. [Assibilated form of acate, q. v.] See acate.

Achatina (ak-a-tī′nạ), n. [NL., < L. achates, agate: see agate.] A genus of land-snails, of the family Helicidæ. It is typified by the large agate-shells of Africa, and is distinguished by an intorted and abruptly truncate columella. The species of this genus, which comprises some of the largest terrestrial mollusks, live chiefly near water about trees; they are mostly African. The small species formerly referred to Achatina are little related to the genus. Lamarck, 1799. Also Achatium (Link, 1807) and Agathina (Deshayes).

Achatinella (a-kat-i-nel′ạ), n. [NL., dim. of Achatina.] A name used with various limits for a genus of Helicidæ, with shells of moderately small size, resembling those of Achatina. It has numerous representatives peculiar to the Sandwich Islands. W. Swainson, 1828. The genus has also been named Helicteres.

Achatininæ (a-kat-i-ni-nī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Achatina + -inæ.] A subfamily of land-snails, of the family Helicidæ, distinguished from Helicinæ proper by the character of the lingual dentition, the usually sharp lip, truncate columella, swollen body-whorl, and elongate spire. The group includes the largest known pulmonates, some being 10 inches long. Most of the species are African; those of the genus Achatina are known as agate-shells. See cut under Achatina.

achatour†, n. [Assibilated form of acatour, acater: see acater, n.] Same as acater.

ache[1], ake (āk), n. [In this pronunciation prop. spelled ake, < ME. ake; but formerly two pronunciations existed, āk and āch (äk and äch), the latter, prop. indicated by the spelling ache, representing ME. ache, also spelled eche, < AS. ece, n., ache (< acan, v.); the former representing ME. ake, directly < aken, < AS. acan, ache, a strong verb: see ache, v. Cf. stark and starch, both < AS. stearc. The anomalous modern spelling ache, with ch pron. k, has been supposed to rest upon the notion that the word is derived from the Gr. ἄχος, pain, distress; but there is no connection between the two words, nor is there any with the interj. ah = L. ah = G. ach = Dan. ah, ak.] Pain of some duration, in opposition to sudden twinges or spasmodic pain; a continued dull or heavy pain, as in toothache or earache.

> Myself was lost,
> Gone from me like an ache.
> Lowell, Under the Willows.

[The old pronunciation of the noun (āch, formerly ärch) led to a similar pronunciation of the verb. In the following couplet ache, v., is made to rime with patch:

> Or Gellia wore a velvet mastic patch > Upon her temples when no tooth did ache.
> Bp. Hall, Satires, vi. 1.

Thus pronounced, the plural of the noun and the third person singular of the verb were dissyllabic:

> A coming shower your shooting corns presage,
> Old aches throb, your hollow tooth will rage.
> Swift, City Shower

This pronunciation has been used, on the stage at least, even in the present century, being required by the meter in such passages as the following:

> I'll rack thee with old cramps;
> Fill all thy bones with aches; make thee roar.
> Shak., Tempest, i. 2.]

=Syn. See pain, n., and agony.

ache[1], ake (āk), v. i.; pret. and pp. ached, aked, ppr. aching, aking. [In this pronunciation prop. spelled ake, the spelling ache prop. representing a different pronunciation (ăch, formerly ăch) in imitation of the noun: see ache, n.; < ME. aken, eken (never achen*), < AS. acan (strong verb, pret. ōc, pp. acen; like scacan, E. shake, and tacan, E. take), ache, prob. cognate, notwithstanding the wide divergence of meaning, with Icel. aka (strong verb, pret. ōk, pp. ekinn), drive, move, = L. agere = Gr. ἀγειν, drive: see act, agent.] To suffer pain; have or be in pain, or in continued pain; be distressed physically: as, his whole body ached.

> The sense aches at thee. Shak., Othello, iv. 2.
> Those inmost and soul-piercing wounds, which are ever aching while uncured. Raleigh, Hist. World, Pref., p. 1.

ache[2]† (āch), n. [< ME. ache, < OF. ache, "the herb smallage; ache des jardins, parsley" (Cotgrave), F. ache = Sp. It. apio, parsley, < L. apium, parsley (usually referred to apis, a bee, bees being said to be fond of it: see Apis), < Gr. ἄπιον, a species of Euphorbia, perhaps the sun-spurge (or parsley ?). Cf. smallage, i. e., small ache.] A name for smallage, parsley, and several other culinary umbelliferous plants.

Achean, Achæan (a-kē′an), a. and n. [< L. Achæus, < Gr. Ἀχαιός, belonging to Ἀχαία, Achaia, L. Achæa.] I. a. Pertaining to Achæa (Achaia) in the Peloponnesus, to the Acheans (Achæans, Achæi, or Achaioi), or to the confederacy called the Achean League.—The Achean League, originally, a confederation for religious observances formed by the cities of Achæa on the abolition of monarchical government and the establishment of democracy. The league was gradually broken up by the Macedonians, but was renewed by the Acheans on a purely political basis about 280 B. C., when they threw off the Macedonian yoke, constituted an enlightened and purely federal republic, and for over a century stood as an efficient bulwark to the declining liberties of Greece.

II. n. An inhabitant of Achæa (Achaia), or one of the ancient Greek people (Achaioi) from whom that country took its name. The name Achaioi is in Homer used as a generic term for all the Greeks, but was later applied to the most important tribes of eastern Peloponnesus, and was finally restricted, after the Dorian conquest, to the inhabitants of the region on the gulf of Corinth in the northwestern part of the Peloponnesus.

Also spelled Achaian, in closer imitation of the Greek.

achech, n. In Egypt. antiq., a fabulous animal, half lion, half bird, like the Grecian griffin.

acheck†, v. t. [ME. acheken (only in pp. acheked, in passage quoted below), < a-[1] (or a-[6]) + cheken: see check, v.] To check; stop; hinder.

> When they metten in that place,
> They were acheked bothe two.
> Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 2093.

Acheenese (ach-ē-nēs′ or -nēz′), a. and n. See Achinese.

acheilary, etc. See achilary, etc.

acheiria, etc. See achiria, etc.

acheket†, v. t. See achoke.

acheless (āk′les), a. [< ache[1] + -less.] Without ache or throb.

achelor†. A corrupt spelling of ashler.

achene (a-kēn′), n. English form of achenium. Also spelled akene.

achenia, n. Plural of achenium.

achenial (a-kē′ni-ạl), a. Pertaining to an achenium.

achenium (a-kē′ni-um), n.; pl. achenia (-ạ). [NL., also written achænium, irreg. (cf. Gr. ἀχανής, not gaping) < ἀ- priv. + χαίνειν, gape, akin to E. yawn, q. v.] 1. In bot., a small, dry and hard, one-celled, one-seeded, indehiscent fruit; strictly, a single and free carpel of this character, as in the buttercup, avens, etc., but extended to all similar fruits resulting from a compound ovary, even when invested with an adnate calyx, as in the order Compositæ. Also written achene, Achenium. Lettuce and Ranunculus.

achœnium, akene, and akenium.—2. [cap.] In entom., a genus of beetles. W. E. Leach.

achenodium (ak-ē-nō′di-um), n.; pl. achenodia (-ä). [NL., < achenium + -odes, < Gr. -ώδης, -ο-ειδής: see -oid.] In bot., a double achenium, such as is found in the order Umbelliferæ.

Acheron (ak′e-ron), n. [L. Acheron (-ont-), also Acheruns (-unt-), < Gr. Ἀχέρων (-οντ-), in earliest use, one of the rivers of Hades (popularly connected with ἄχος, pain, distress, = E. awe, q. v.), later the name of several rivers of Greece and Italy, which, from their dismal or savage surroundings, or from the fact that a portion of their course is beneath the ground, were believed to be entrances to the infernal regions.] 1. In Gr. and Rom. myth., the name of a river in Hades, over which the souls of the dead were ferried by Charon; hence, a general name for the lower world.

Get you gone,
And at the pit of Acheron
Meet me i' the morning. Shak., Macb., iii. 5.

2. [NL.] A genus of neuropterous insects.

Acherontia (ak-e-ron′shi-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. Ἀχερόντιος, pertaining to Acheron: see Acheron.] A genus of nocturnal lepidopterous insects, of the family Sphingidæ. A. atropos is the death's-head moth, or death's-head hawk-moth. See death's-head.

Acherontic (ak-e-ron′tik), a. [< L. Acheronticus, < Acheron: see Acheron.] Of or pertaining to Acheron or the infernal regions; dark; gloomy: as, Acherontic mists.

acherset†, n. An error for a cherset. See cherset.

achesoun†, n. Same as encheson.

Acheta (ak′e-tä), n. [NL., < L. acheta, the male cicada, < Doric Gr. ἀχέτα, ἀχέτας, Gr. ἠχέτης, the cicada, prop. adj., chirping, < Gr. ἠχεῖν, sound, chirp, < ἠχή, a sound, akin to ἠχώ, a sound, an echo: see echo.] The typical genus of the family Achetidæ: equivalent to Gryllus (which see).

Achetidæ (a-ket′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Acheta + -idæ.] A family of saltatorial orthopterous insects, embracing the crickets, etc., named from the leading genus, Acheta. The name is now little used, the family being generally called Gryllidæ (which see).

Achetina (ak-e-tī′nä), n. pl. [NL., < Acheta + -ina.] A group of orthopterous insects, including the crickets, as distinguished from the grasshoppers, etc.

achevet, v. t. Obsolete form of achieve.

acheweed (āk′wēd), n. [< ache[1] + weed[1].] An old name of the goutweed, Ægopodium podagraria.

achiat (a-chē′ä), n. [Also atchia. Pg. achia (It. acciao).] A perverted form of achar.

achiart, n. A bad spelling of achar or of achia. See achar: "adopted in nearly all the vernaculars of India for acid and salt relishes." Yule and Burnell.

achievable (a-chē′va-bl), a. [< achieve + -able.] Capable of being achieved or performed.

To raise a dead man to life doth not involve contradiction, and is therefore, at least, achievable by Omnipotence. Barrow, Sermons, xxix.

achievance† (a-chē′vans), n. [< OF. achevance, < achever: see achieve and -ance.] Performance; achievement: as, "his noble acts and achievances," Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, iii. 22.

achieve (a-chēv′), v.; pret. and pp. achieved, ppr. achieving. [Formerly also atchieve, < ME. acheven, < OF. achever, achiever, achevir, achiver (F. achever), finish, from the phrase a chief (F. à chef), to an end, to a head; OF. chief (F. chef), an end, a head: see chief. Cf. chieve.]

I. trans. 1. To perform or execute; accomplish, as some great enterprise; finish; carry on to a prosperous close.

And now great deeds
Had been achieved. Milton, P. L., ii. 723.

Enabled him at length to achieve his great enterprise, in the face of every obstacle which man and nature had opposed to it. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., i. 16.

2. To gain or obtain, as the result of exertion; bring about, as by effort.

Show all the spoils by valiant kings achieved. Prior.

He will achieve his greatness. Tennyson, Tiresias.

It is not self-indulgence allowed, but victory achieved, that can make a fit happiness for man.
Bushnell, Sermons for New Life, p. 214.

= Syn. 1. Effect, Accomplish, etc. (see perform), bring about, work out.—2. To acquire, win, obtain, get.

II. intrans. 1†. To come to an end. Chaucer.—2. To accomplish some enterprise; bring about a result intended.

Fights dragon-like, and does achieve as soon
As draw his sword. Shak., Cor., iv. 7.

Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait.
Longfellow, Psalm of Life.

achievement (a-chēv′ment), n. [< F. achèvement, completion, < achever: see achieve and -ment.] 1. The act of achieving or performing; an obtaining by exertion; accomplishment: as, the achievement of one's object.

Capable of high achievement as a writer of romance.
Athenæum, No. 3067, p. 172.

2. That which is achieved; a great or heroic deed; something accomplished by valor, boldness, or superior ability.

How my achievements mock me!
Shak., T. and C., iv. 2.

Illustrious judges have declared that Galileo's conception of the laws of Motion is his greatest achievement.
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, I. i. § 48.

3. In her., an escutcheon or armorial shield. The proper expression is "achievement of arms," and signifies a complete heraldic composition, whether the shield alone or the shield with crest, motto, and supporters, if any. The term achievement is applied especially to the escutcheon of a deceased person displayed at his obsequies, over his tomb, etc., distinctively called a funeral achievement, or more commonly a hatchment (which see). = Syn. 2. Deed, Feat, Exploit, etc. See feat[1].

achiever (a-chē′vėr), n. One who achieves or accomplishes.

We are well accustomed to the sight of a fresh young girl, a close student, a fine achiever, . . . sinking . . . into an aching, ailing, moping creature.
E. S. Phelps, quoted in Sex and Education, p. 133.

achilary (a-kī′lä-ri), a. [As achil-ous + -ary.] Without a lip; specifically, in bot., noting the absence of the labellum or lip in monstrous flowers of the family Orchidaceæ. Also spelled acheilary.

Achilida (a-kil′i-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Achilus + -ida.] A division of the great family of homopterous insects called Fulgoridæ, one of 13 so-called subfamilies, taking name from the genus Achilus.

Achillea (ak-i-lē′ä), n. [L., a plant supposed to be the same as that called in Latin achillēos, milfoil or yarrow, < Gr. Ἀχίλλειος, of Achilles, from a belief that Achilles used this plant in curing Telephus.] A large genus of perennial herbaceous plants, belonging to the Compositæ, of the northern hemisphere and mostly of the old world. Two species are common, the milfoil or yarrow, A. Millefolium, indigenous in both hemispheres and of repute as a bitter tonic, and the sneezewort, A. Ptarmica.

Achillean (ak-i-lē′an), a. [< L. Achilleus, < Gr. Ἀχίλλειος, < Ἀχιλλεύς, L. Achilles.] Of, resembling, or belonging to Achilles, the hero in the war against Troy, noted for his valor, swiftness of foot, etc., but especially for unrelenting wrath; hence, valiant, swift, unrelenting, etc.

I dined with Mr. Landor. . . . I had inferred from his books, or magnified from some anecdotes, an impression of Achillean wrath — an untamable petulance.
Emerson, Prose Works, II. 161.

achilleic (ak-i-lē′ik), a. Pertaining to or derived from Achillea Millefolium.—Achilleic acid, an acid found in the leaves and flowers of milfoil or yarrow, Achillea Millefolium: probably identical with aconitic acid.

achillein (ak-i-lē′in), n. [< Achillea + -in[2].] An amorphous, brownish-red, and very bitter substance, $C_{20}H_{38}N_2O_{15}$, derived from the milfoil, Achillea Millefolium. When used in medicine it is found to produce marked irregularity of the pulse.

Achillis tendo (a-kil′is ten′dō). [L.: Achillis, gen. of Achilles; tendo, tendon.] See tendon of Achilles, under tendon.

achilous (a-kī′lus), a. [Less prop. acheilous, < NL. achilus, < Gr. ἀ- priv. + χεῖλος, lip.] Without lips.

Achilus (a-kī′lus), n. [NL.: see achilous.] A genus of homopterous insects, of the family Cixiidæ, or giving name to a group Achilida (which see). Kirby, 1818.

Achimenes (a-kim′e-nēz), n. [Perhaps from L. achæmenis, < Gr. ἀχαιμενίς, an amber-colored plant in India used in magical arts. Cf. Achæmenian.] A genus of ornamental herbs, of the family Gesneraceæ, belonging to tropical America. They are frequent in greenhouses, and the number of varieties has been largely increased by cultivation.

Achinese (ach-i-nēs′ or -nēz′), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to Achin (also written Acheen, Atchin, and Atcheen), a territory in the northwestern part of the island of Sumatra.

II. n. sing. and pl. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Achin, or the people of Achin.—2. The language used by the Achinese, which belongs to the Malayan family, and is written with Arabic characters.

Also written Acheenese and Atchinese.

aching (ā′king), p. a. [Ppr. of ache[1].] Enduring or causing pain; painful.

What peaceful hours I once enjoy'd!
How sweet their memory still!
But they have left an aching void
The world can never fill.
Cowper, Olney Hymns.

achingly (ā′king-li), adv. With aching; painfully.

achiote (ä-chē-ō′tā), n. [Am. Sp. achiote, achote, Pg. achioti, < Nahuatl achiotl.] The name in Spanish-speaking countries of the arnotto-tree, Bixa Orellana. See arnotto, Orton, The Andes and the Amazon, I. 168.

achira (a-chē′rä), n. [Appar. a native name.] The name on the western coast of South America of the Canna edulis, whose large tuberous roots are used for food, and yield tous-les-mois, a superior large-grained kind of arrow-root.

achiria (a-kī′ri-ä), n. [NL., less prop. acheiria, < Gr. ἀχειρία, < ἄχειρος or ἀχειρ, without hands: see achirous.] In teratol., absence of hands.

achirite (ak′i-rīt), n. [< Achir Mahmed, name of a Bokharian merchant who furnished the specimens that were taken in 1785 to St. Petersburg, + -ite[2].] Emerald copper or dioptase.

achirous (a-kī′rus), a. [Less prop. acheirous, < NL. achirus, < Gr. ἄχειρος or ἀχειρ, handless, < ἀ- priv. + χείρ, hand.] In teratol., handless; without hands.

achirus (a-kī′rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄχειρος, without hands: see achirous.] 1. In teratol., a monster characterized by the absence of hands. Also spelled acheirus.—2. [cap.] In zoöl., a genus of heterosomatous fishes, of the family Soleidæ, having usually no pectoral fins. A. lineatus is an American sole, commonly called hog-choker. Lacépède, 1802. See cut under Soleidæ.

achlamydate (a-klam′i-dāt), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. (a-[18]) + chlamydate, q. v.] Not chlamydate; having no pallium or mantle: said of mollusks.

In the achlamydate forms [of branchiogastropods] true gills are usually absent. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 437.

Achlamydeæ (ak-la-mid′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of achlamydeus: see achlamydeous.] In bot., a term proposed by Lindley for a group of dicotyledonous plants in which both calyx and corolla are wanting, at least in the pistillate flowers, as in willows and birches.

achlamydeous (ak-la-mid′ē-us), a. [< NL. achlamydeus, < Gr. ἀ- priv. + χλαμύς (-υδ-), a mantle: see a-[18] and chlamydeous.] In bot., without a floral envelop: an epithet applied to plants which have neither calyx nor corolla, and whose flowers are consequently naked, or destitute of a covering. It has also been applied to an ovule which consists of the nucleus only, without proper seed-coats, as in the mistletoe.

achlorophyllous (a-klō-rō-fil′us or ak-lō-rof′i-lus), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + χλωρός, green, + φύλλον, leaf: see a-[18], chlorophyl, and -ous.] In bot., destitute of chlorophyl.

achlys (ak′lis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀχλύς, a mist.] Same as caligo.

achmite (ak′mīt), n. Incorrect spelling of acmite.

achoke†, v. t. [< ME. achoken, acheken, < AS. āceocian, choke, < ā- + ceocian*: see choke[1].] To choke; suffocate. Also written acheke.

Whan that Thesus seeth
The beste acheked. Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2008.

Gif thou will achoken the fulfillyng of nature with superfluities. Chaucer, Boëthius, ii. prose 5.

acholia (a-kol′i-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀχολία, < ἄχολος, without bile: see acholous.] In pathol., deficiency or want of bile.

acholithite† (a-kol′i-thīt), n. [Corrupt spelling of acolouthite, q. v.] Same as acolyte.

To see a lazy, dumb acholithite
Armed against a devout fly's despight.
Bp. Hall, Satires, iv. 7.

acholous (ak′ō-lus), a. [< Gr. ἄχολος, without bile, < ἀ- priv. + χολή, bile, gall: see choler.] Wanting or deficient in bile.

achor (ak′ôr or ā′kor), n. [L., < Gr. ἄχωρ, scurf, dandruff.] 1. A name formerly given to certain scaly or crusty cutaneous affections of the head and face in infants, particularly to certain forms of eczema.—2. An individual acuminate pustule.

Achordata (ak-ôr-dā′tä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + χορδή, chord: see a-[18] and Chordata.] A collective name of those animals which have no notochord: opposed to Chordata.

achorion (a-kō′ri-on), n.; pl. achoria (-ä). [NL., < achor.] The name given to one of the three principal dermatophytes, or epiphytes of the skin.

It is the constituent of the crusts of favus (achor), and belongs to the group of fungoid plants denominated Oïdium. It consists of spores, sporidia or tubes filled with spores, and empty branched tubes or mycelium. Erasmus Wilson.

Achras (ak′ras), n. [L., < Gr. ἀχράς, a kind of wild pear-tree.] 1. A genus of plants belonging to the family Sapotaceæ: called Lucuma by some authors. See Lucuma.—2. A name improperly applied to Sapota zapotilla. It is an evergreen tree, with thick shining leaves and milky juice, a native of tropical America, and is often cultivated for its edible fruit, the sapodilla or sapodilla plum. Its bark (Jamaica bark) is astringent.

3. A genus of coleopterous insects.

achroiocythemia, achroiocythæmia (a-kroi″-ō-si-thē′mi-ạ), n. [NL., prop. achrœocythæmia, < Gr. ἀχροος, same as ἄχροος, colorless (see achroous), + κύτος, a cavity (< κύειν, contain), + αἷμα, blood.] In pathol., diminution of the normal amount of hemoglobin in the red blood-corpuscles. Also called oligochromemia.

achroite (ak′rō-īt), n. [< Gr. ἄχροος, colorless, + *-ite*².] A colorless variety of tourmalin found on the island of Elba and elsewhere.

achroma (a-krō′mạ), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + χρῶμα, color: see achromatic.] In pathol., lack of pigment in the skin; achromasia.

achromasia (ak-rō-mā′zi-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀχρώματος, without color: see achromatic.] In pathol., lack of pigment in the skin.

achromatic (ak-rō-mat′ik), a. [< Gr. ἀχρώματος, without color (< ἀ- priv., without, + χρῶμα(τ-), color), + -ic: see chromatic.] Destitute of color; free from coloration; specifically, corrected for chromatic aberration: as, an achromatic lens or telescope.

The human eye is not achromatic. It suffers from chromatic aberration as well as from spherical aberration.
Tyndall, Light and Elect., p. 72.

Achromatic condenser, an achromatic lens placed between the mirror and the stage of a microscope to concentrate the light upon the object when the light from the concave mirror is not sufficiently intense.—Achromatic lens, a lens sensibly free from chromatic aberration. It is usually composed of two lenses made of glass having different refractive and dispersive powers (for example, a double convex lens of crown-glass [a a] and a concavo-convex lens of flint-glass [b b]), the forms of which are so adjusted that one lens very nearly corrects the dispersion of the other without, however, destroying its refraction.—Achromatic telescope or microscope, a telescope or microscope in which the chromatic aberration is prevented by means of an achromatic object-glass.

Achromatic Lens.

achromatically (ak-rō-mat′i-kạl-i), adv. In an achromatic manner.

achromaticity (a-krō-mạ-tis′i-ti), n. [< achromatic + -ity.] The state or quality of being achromatic; achromatism. See equation.

achromatin (a-krō′mạ-tin), n. [< Gr. ἀχρώματος, not colored, + *-in*².] In biol., that portion of the substance of a cell-nucleus which, under the action of staining agents, becomes less highly colored than the rest.

achromatisation, achromatise, etc. See achromatization, achromatize, etc.

achromatism (a-krō′mạ-tizm), n. [< achromatic + -ism. Cf. F. achromatisme.] The state or quality of being achromatic; freedom from chromatic aberration: as, to secure perfect achromatism in a telescope.

achromatization (a-krō″mạ-ti-zā′shọn), n. The act of achromatizing or correcting chromatic aberration. Also spelled achromatisation.

achromatize (a-krō′mạ-tīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. achromatized, ppr. achromatizing. [< achromatic, as if < Gr. ἀ- priv. + χρωματίζειν, to color, < χρῶμα(τ-), color.] To render achromatic; correct, as in an optical system, for chromatic aberration. Also achromatise.

For two kinds of light a flint-glass prism may be achromatized by a second prism of crown-glass.
A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 480.

achromatopsia (a-krō-mạ-top′si-ạ), n. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + χρῶμα(τ-), color, + ὄψις, sight, < ὄψ, the eye, face: see optic.] Color-blindness, or inability to see or distinguish colors. Also called acritochromacy.

achromatopsy (a-krō′mạ-top-si), n. Same as achromatopsia.

achromatosis (a-krō-mạ-tō′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀχρώματος, without color, + -osis.] A name applied to diseases characterized by a lack of pigment in integumental structures, as albinism, vitiligo, or canities.

achromatous (a-krō′mạ-tus), a. [< Gr. ἀχρώματος, without color: see achromatic.] Without color; of a lighter color than normal: as, achromatous spots.

achromophilous (a-krō-mof′i-lus), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. (a-18) + chromophilous.] In biol., not chromophilous (which see). See the extract.

The substance of the ovum [of Ascaris] is also remarkably differentiated,—that of the "polar disk" alone exhibiting a vertical striation, and differentiating into two layers, superficial and subjacent (termed achromophilous and chromophilous respectively). Encyc. Brit., XX. 417.

achromous (a-krō′mus), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + χρῶμα, color.] Colorless; without coloring matter.

achronic, achronical (a-kron′ik, -i-kạl), a. An erroneous spelling of acronych, acronychal.

achroödextrine (ak″rō-ō-deks′trin), n. [< Gr. ἀχροος, colorless (see achroous), + E. dextrine.] Dextrine which is not colored by iodine: contrasted with erythrodextrine.

ach-root (ach′röt), n. [< *ach*² + root.] The root of Morinda tinctoria, used in India as a dye. See *ach*².

achroous (ak′rō-us), a. [< Gr. ἄχροος, also ἄχροιος, colorless, < ἀ- priv. + χρόα, χροιά, color. Cf. achromatic.] Colorless; achromatic.

achylous (a-kī′lus), a. [< Gr. ἄχυλος, < ἀ- priv. + χυλός, chyle.] Without chyle. Syd. Soc. Lex.

Achyrodon (a-kī′rō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄχυρον, pl. ἄχυρα, chaff, bran, husks, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A genus of fossil mammals from the Purbeck beds of England, having teeth of the insectivorous type, and more than eight molars and premolars. Owen, 1871.

acicle (as′i-kl), n. Same as acicula, 2. Dana, Crustacea, I. 434.

acicula (a-sik′ū-lạ), n.; pl. aciculæ (-lē). [L., a needle, a small pin, dim. of acus, a needle, from same root as acer, sharp, acies, an edge, acutus, sharp, etc.: see acid, acute, acerb.] 1. A needle, pin, or bodkin, of wood or bone, used by Roman women as a hair-pin. It was not smaller than an acus (which see), but of inferior material.—2. A spine or prickle of an animal or plant. Also called acicle.—3. [cap.] A name applied to several genera of gastropods, and retained for the representative genus of the family Aciculidæ, inhabiting Europe. A. fusca is the best-known form.—4. [cap.] A genus of worms.

acicula, n. Plural of aciculum.

Aciculacea (a-sik-ū-lā′sē-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Acicula + -acea.] A synonym of Aciculidæ (which see).

acicular (a-sik′ū-lạr), a. [< NL. acicularis, < L. acicula, a needle: see acicula.] Having the shape of a slender needle or stout bristle; having a sharp point like a needle: as, an acicular prism, like those of stibnite; an acicular bill, as that of a humming-bird. Other forms are aciculate, aciculated, aciculiform, and aciculine.

Acicular Crystals, Stibnite.

The silver salt crystallizes from its aqueous solution in small acicular prisms.
E. Frankland, Exper. in Chem., p. 30.

Acicular bismuth. See aikinite.

acicularly (a-sik′ū-lạr-li), adv. In an acicular manner; in the manner of needles or prickles.

aciculate, aciculated (a-sik′ū-lāt, -lā-ted), p. a. [< NL. aciculatus, < L. acicula: see acicula.] Needle-shaped; acicular; aciculiform.

aciculi, n. Plural of aciculus.

aciculid (a-sik′ū-lid), n. A gastropod of the family Aciculidæ.

Aciculidæ (as-i-kū′li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Acicula, q. v., + -idæ.] A family of operculate pulmoniferous mollusks, represented by the European genus Acicula (which see) and the West Indian Geomelania. They have very small turreted shells with few whorls and a thin operculum, the outer lip plain or produced into a tongue, and the eyes on the back of the head.

aciculiform (a-sik′ū-li-fôrm), a. [< L. acicula, needle, + -formis, < forma, form.] Same as acicular.

aciculine (a-sik′ū-lin), a. [< NL. aciculinus, < L. acicula: see acicula.] Same as acicular.

aciculum (a-sik′ū-lum), n.; pl. acicula (-lạ). [NL., a neut. form to acicula, q. v.] In zoöl., one of the slender sharp stylets which are embedded in the parapodia of some annelids, as the Polychæta. The notopodial and the neuropodial divisions of the parapodia each carry one of these acicula.

aciculus (a-sik′ū-lus), n.; pl. aciculi (-lī). [NL., a masc. form of acicula, q. v.] In bot., a strong bristle.

acid (as′id), a. and n. [= F. acide = Sp. Pg. It. acido, < L. acidus, sour, < acēre, be sour (> acetum, q. v.), akin to acer, sharp, acies, edge, Gr. ἀκμή, E. acme, edge, etc., all from √ak*, be sharp, pierce.] I. a. Sour, sharp, or biting to the taste; tasting like vinegar: as, acid fruits or liquors.—Acid rock. See acidic.

II. n. [< NL. acidum, neut. of L. acidus, a.] Originally, a substance possessing a sour taste like that of vinegar; in modern chemical use, a name given to a large number of compounds which do not necessarily possess this property. It does not appear that very great importance was at any time attached to sourness as a characteristic of acids from a chemical point of view. The following properties are common to most acids: 1st, solubility in water; 2d, a sour taste (in some acids, on account of their corrosiveness, this property can be perceived only after dilution with a large quantity of water); 3d, the power of turning vegetable blues to red; 4th, the power of decomposing most carbonates, and displacing the carbonic acid with effervescence; 5th, the power of destroying more or less completely the characteristic properties of alkalis, at the same time losing their own distinguishing characters, forming salts. In modern chemistry an acid may be termed a salt of hydrogen, or it may be defined as a compound containing one or more atoms of hydrogen which may be displaced by a metal, or by a radical possessing to a certain extent metallic functions. An acid containing one such atom of hydrogen is said to be monobasic, one containing two such atoms bibasic, etc. Acids of a greater basicity than unity are frequently termed polybasic acids. When an acid contains oxygen, its name is generally formed by adding the terminal -ic either to the name of the element with which the oxygen is united or to an abbreviation of that name. Thus, sulphur forms with oxygen sulphuric acid; nitrogen, nitric acid; and phosphorus, phosphoric acid. But it frequently happens that the same element forms two acids with oxygen; and in this case the acid that contains the larger amount of oxygen receives the terminal syllable -ic, while that containing less oxygen is made to end in -ous. Thus, we have sulphurous, nitrous, and phosphorous acid, each containing a smaller proportion of oxygen than that necessary to form respectively sulphuric, nitric, and phosphoric acid. In some instances, however, the same element forms more than two acids with oxygen, in which case the two Greek words ὑπό (hypo-), under, and ὑπέρ (hyper-), over, are prefixed to the name of the acid. Thus, an acid of sulphur containing less oxygen than sulphurous acid is termed hyposulphurous acid; and another acid of the same element containing, in proportion to sulphur, more oxygen than sulphurous acid and less than sulphuric, might be named either hypersulphurous or hyposulphuric acid; but the latter term has been adopted. The prefix per- is frequently substituted for hyper-.—Acetic acid, fatty acid, nitric acid, etc. See these adjectives.—Nordhausen acid, brown fuming sulphuric acid, a solution of sulphur trioxid in sulphuric acid, used as a solvent of indigo, and at present in the manufacture of artificial alizarin. It is named from the place where it was first manufactured.

acid-green (as′id-grēn′), n. An acid coal-tar coloring matter. The name is applied to several coloring matters, chiefly sulphonic acid derivatives of the benzaldehyde greens. The principal acid-greens are acid-green GG, Helvetia green, light green S and SF, Guinea green, Neptune green, and wool-green S and BS.

acidic (a-sid′ik), a. 1. Acid: in chem., applied to the acid element, as silicon, in certain salts: opposed to basic.—2. Containing a large amount of the acid element: as, the acidic feldspars, which contain 60 per cent. or more of silica.—Acidic (or acid) rock, a crystalline rock which contains a relatively large amount of silica, through the presence of an acidic feldspar, and sometimes also of free quartz, as a prominent constituent. For example, rhyolite is an acid or acidic rock; basalt, a basic rock.

acidiferous (as-i-dif′ẹ-rus), a. [< NL. acidum, acid, + L. ferre = E. *bear*¹, + -ous.] Bearing, producing, or containing acids, or an acid.—Acidiferous mineral, a mineral which consists of an earth combined with an acid, as calcium carbonate, aluminite, etc.

acidifiable (a-sid′i-fī-ạ-bl), a. [< acidify + -able; = F. acidifiable.] Capable of being acidified, or of being converted into an acid.

acidific (as-i-dif′ik), a. Producing acidity or an acid; acidifying. Said of the element (oxygen, sulphur, etc.) which in a ternary compound is considered as uniting the basic and acidic elements. Thus, in calcium silicate, calcium is called the basic, silicon the acidic, and oxygen the acidific element. Dana.

acidification (a-sid″i-fi-kā′shọn), n. [< acidify; = F. acidification = Sp. acidificación = Pg. acidificação.] The act or process of acidifying, or of changing into an acid.

Acidification . . . is intended to break up, corrode, or carbonize the albuminiferous matters.
W. L. Carpenter, Soap, etc., p. 264.

acidifier (a-sid′i-fī-ẹr), n. One who or that which acidifies; specifically, in chem., that which has the property of imparting an acid quality.

acidify (a-sid′i-fī), v.; pret. and pp. acidified, ppr. acidifying. [< acid + -fy; = F. acidifier = Pg. acidificar.] I. trans. To make acid; convert into an acid; render sour; sour, literally or figuratively.

Such are the plaints of Louvet, his thin existence all acidified with rage and preternatural insight of suspicion. Carlyle, French Rev., III. iii. 181.

★ II. intrans. To become acid or sour.

acidimeter (as-i-dim'e-tėr), n. [= Pg. acidimetro, < NL. acidum, acid, + Gr. μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for determining the strength of acids. See acidimetry.

acidimetrical (as″i-di-met'ri-kạl), a. Of or pertaining to acidimetry.

The acidimetrical process is in every way similar to that practised in alkalimetry. Ure, Dict., I. 19.

acidimetry (as-i-dim'e-tri), n. [= Pg. acidimetria; as acidimeter + -y.] The act or process of measuring the strength of acids. Specifically, the process of estimating the amount of acid in a liquid by finding exactly how much of a standard alkaline solution is required to neutralize a measured quantity of the given solution.

★ acidity (a-sid'i-ti), n. [= F. acidité = It. acidità, < L. acidita(t-)s, sourness, < acidus, sour: see acid.] The quality of being acid or sour; sourness; tartness; sharpness to the taste.

★ acid-magenta (as'id-ma-jen'tạ), n. A coal-tar color, a green metallic-looking powder giving a red color when dissolved in water. It is a mixture of the mono- and disulphonic acids of rosanilin. Also called magenta S. and rubine S. Used for dyeing and for coloring wines. Benedikt and Knecht, Chem. of Coal-tar Colors, p. 96.

acidness (as'id-nes), n. Sourness; acidity.

acidometer (as-i-dom'e-tėr), n. [Cf. acidimeter.] An instrument used to measure the strength of an acid, commonly by the density.

acid-pump (as'id-pump), n. A pump used for drawing corrosive liquids from carboys and other vessels. It has valves and joints, and is convertible into a siphon. A vacuum is created in it by means of an elastic rubber bulb, which controls its action without coming into contact with the acid.

acidulæ (a-sid'ụ-lē), n. pl. [L., fem. pl. (sc. aquæ, waters) of acidulus: see acidulous.] A name formerly given to springs of cold mineral waters, from their sharp and pungent taste. N. E. D.

acidulate (a-sid'ụ-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. acidulated, ppr. acidulating. [< L. as if acidulatus*, pp. of acidulare*, < acidulus, somewhat sour: see acidulous.] 1. To tincture with an acid; render somewhat acid or sourish.

This latter flask is filled partly with mercury, and partly with water acidulated with a tenth part of sulphuric acid. Science, III. 260.

2. Figuratively, to sour, as the mind; embitter; make cross or captious.

Persons . . . were especially liable to diabolical possession when their faculties were impaired by disease and their tempers acidulated by suffering. Lecky, Rationalism, I. 106.

acidulcist (as-i-dul'sis), a. [Contr. of NL. acididulcis*, < L. acidus, sour, acid, + dulcis, sweet: see dulce.] Both sour and sweet.

acidulent (a-sid'ụ-lent), a. [< F. acidulant, ppr. of aciduler, sour slightly, < acidule, slightly sour, < L. acidulus: see acidulous.] Somewhat acid or sour; tart; hence, peevish: as, "anxious ★ acidulent face," Carlyle, French Rev., I. i. 4.

acidulous (a-sid'ụ-lus), a. [< L. acidulus, slightly sour, dim. of acidus, sour: see acid.] 1. Slightly sour; subacid, as cream of tartar, oranges, gooseberries, etc. — 2. Figuratively, sour in feeling or expression; sharp; caustic; harsh.

Acidulous enough to produce effervescence with alkalies. O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, ix.

It is beautiful, therefore, . . . to find a woman, George Eliot, departing utterly out of that mood of hate or even of acidulous satire in which Thackeray so often worked. S. Lanier, The Eng. Novel, p. 207.

acid-yellow (as'id-yel'ō), n. A coal-tar color, consisting of the sodium salts of the sulphonic acids of amino-azobenzene or aniline yellow. It is a yellow powder, easily soluble in water, and is used for dyeing olive, moss-green, and browns. Also sometimes called fast yellow. Benedikt and Knecht, Chem. of Coal-tar Colors, p. 182.

acierage (as'i-ẹ-rāj), n. [< F. aciérage, < acier = Pr. acier = Sp. acero, steel, < ML. aciare, aciarium, steel, < L. acies, edge, sword-edge.] The process of depositing a layer of iron on another metal, by means of electrical action. Stereotype and copper plates are sometimes treated in this way, thus increasing their durability without injury to their artistic character. When thus coated with iron they are said to be "steel-faced."

acierate (as'i-ẹ-rāt), v. t. To convert into steel.

acieration (as″i-ẹ-rā'shọn), n. [< F. acier, steel, + -ation.] Conversion into steel: a word occasionally used by writers on the metallurgy of iron and steel.

Withdrawing trial pieces from time to time and breaking them so as to ascertain to what depth the acieration has proceeded. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 342.

aciform (as'i-fôrm), a. [< L. acus, a needle, + forma, shape.] Shaped like a needle.

aciliate, aciliated (a-sil'i-āt, -ā-ted), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. (-[18]) + ciliated: see cilia.] Not ciliated; having no cilia.

Acilius (a-sil'i-us), n. [NL., < L. Acilius, a Roman name.] A genus of water-beetles of the family Dytiscidæ, containing species of moderate size, with ciliated hind tarsi and round tarsal disks in the male. A. sulcatus is a European species. A. fraternus is a common New England insect, about $\frac{3}{5}$ of an inch long, having the black portions of the elytra closely punctured upon a yellow surface.

acinaceous (as-i-nā'shius), a. [< L. acinus, a berry, esp. a grape, a grape-stone or kernel, + -aceous.] Consisting of or full of small seeds.

acinaces (a-sin'ạ-sēz), n. [L., < Gr. ἀκινάκης, a short, straight sword, < Pers. āhenek (āhanak*), a short sword, < āhen, āhan, a sword, lit. iron, + dim. term. -ek, -ak, now applied only to rational objects (-che to irrational objects).] A short, straight dagger, peculiar to the Medes and Persians. It seems to have been worn on the right side, but perhaps only when a longer weapon was worn on the left. Modern writers have recognized the acinaces in a dagger shown in sculptures at Persepolis, also in the dagger of the Mithra sacrificial groups.

acinacifolious (a-sin″ạ-si-fō'li-us), a. [< L. acinaces, a short sword, + folium, leaf.] Having acinaciform leaves. N. E. D.

acinaciform (a-sin'ạ-si-fôrm), a. [< L. acinaces, a short, straight sword, taken to mean a simitar, + -formis, < forma, shape.] In bot., resembling a simitar in shape: as, an acinaciform leaf, one which has one edge convex and thin, the other straighter and thick, as in species of Mesembryanthemum; an acinaciform pod, as of some beans.

Acinaciform Leaf.

acinarious (as-i-nā'ri-us), a. [< L. acinarius, pertaining to the grape, < acinus, the grape: see acinus.] In bot., covered with little spherical stalked vesicles resembling grape-seeds, as in some algæ.

acinesia (as-i-nē'siạ), n. Same as akinesia.

Acineta (as-i-nē'tạ), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκίνητος, motionless, < ἀ- priv. + κινεῖν, move.] 1. A genus of noble epiphytal orchids, from Central America, much prized as hothouse plants. — 2. A genus of suctorial infusorial protozoans. See Acinetæ and Acinetina. Ehrenberg.

Acinetæ (as-i-nē'tē), n. pl. [NL.: see Acineta.] An order of the class Infusoria (the Infusoria tentaculifera or suctoria), the adult members of which have no cilia and no proper mouth, and are non-locomotive. The body, which is fixed and stalked, is provided with radiating retractile suctorial processes, or tubular tentacles, having at their extremities a knob or disk-like sucker, through which nutrient matter is imbibed.

The Acinetæ multiply by several methods. One of these . . . consists in the development of ciliated embryos in the interior of the body. These embryos result from a separation of a portion of the endoplast, and its conversion into a globular or oval germ, which in some species is wholly covered with vibratile cilia, while in others the cilia are confined to a zone around the middle of the embryo. The germ makes its escape by bursting through the body-wall of its parent. After a short existence (sometimes limited to a few minutes) in the condition of a free-swimming animalcule, provided with an endoplast and a contractile vacuole, but devoid of a mouth, the characteristic knobbed radiating processes make their appearance, the cilia vanish, and the animal passes into the Acineta state. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 94.

acinetan (as-i-nē'tan), n. One of the Acinetæ; a suctorial tentaculiferous infusorian.

Acinetidæ (as-i-net'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Acineta + -idæ.] A family constituting the order Acinetæ. The leading genus is Acineta.

acinetiform (as-i-net'i-fôrm), a. and n. [< NL. Acineta + L. -formis, < forma, shape.] I. a. Having the form of Acinetæ; resembling an acinetan in form.

Balbiani . . . asserts that the acinetiform embryos observed not only in Paramœcium, but in . . . many other ciliated Infusoria, are not embryos at all, but parasitic Acinetæ. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 100.

II. n. An infusorian animalcule resembling an acinetan, whether an embryonic stage of some ciliate infusorian or a member of the order Acinetæ. Also written acineta-form.

Acinetina (as″i-nē-tī'nạ), n. pl. [NL., < Acineta + -ina.] A group of infusorians with a single aperture, and elongate, non-vibratile cilia, originally established by Ehrenberg in 1838 as a division of his Polygastrica: equivalent to Acinetæ (which see).

acini, n. Plural of acinus.

aciniform (as'i-ni-fôrm), a. [< NL. aciniformis, < L. acinus, grape (see acinus), + -formis, < forma, shape.] 1. Having the form of grapes, or being in clusters like grapes; acinose. — 2. In anat., of a deep purplish tint; resembling a grape in color: applied to one of the pigmentary layers of the iris, technically called the tunica aciniformis. See uvea.

acinose (as'i-nōs), a. [< L. acinosus, like grapes, < acinus, a grape.] 1. Resembling a grape or a bunch of grapes; consisting of granular concretions. — 2. Specifically, in anat., consisting of acini. Applied to glands in which the duct enlarges at the distinctly glandular portion into a little spherical vesicle (acinus), or into a little saccule (lobulus), beset with small, round epithelial cysts (acini), or in which the duct branches and ends in more or less numerous lobuli, formed of acini. Acinose glands are distinguished from tubular glands.

acinous (as'i-nus), a. Same as acinose.

acinus (as'i-nus), n.; pl. acini (-nī). [L., a berry, esp. a grape, also a grape-stone, kernel.] 1. In bot.: (a) One of the small drupelets or berries of an aggregate baccate fruit, as the blackberry, etc., or the contained stone or seed. See cut under Rubus. (b) A grape-stone. — 2. In anat.: (a) Formerly, the smallest lobule of a gland. (b) Now, generally, the smallest saccular subdivision of an acinose gland, several of which subdivisions make up a lobule. Also called alveolus. (c) A lobule of the liver.

-acious. [< L. -āci- (nom. -ax, acc. -ācem, > It. -ace, Sp. Pg. -az, F. -ace), a suffix added to verb-stems to form adjectives expressing intensity of physical or mental action, as aud-ax, daring, cap-ax, holding much, fall-ax, deceitful, loqu-ax, talking much, pugn-ax, inclined to fight, etc., + E. -ous. Cf. -acy, 3.] A compound adjective termination of Latin origin, forming, from Latin verb-stems, adjectives expressing intensity of physical or mental action, as in audacious, daring, very bold, capacious, holding much, fallacious, deceitful, loquacious, talking much, pugnacious, inclined to fight, mendacious, ready at lying, vivacious, very lively, voracious, eating much, etc. Such adjectives are accompanied by nouns in -aci-ty, and the nouns rarely by verbs in -aci-t-ate: as, capacious, capacity, capacitate, etc.

Acipenser (as-i-pen'sėr), n. [L., also spelled aquipenser and acipensis (> Gr. ἀκκιπήσιος), the sturgeon; perhaps < aci-* (= Gr. ὠκύς), swift, + a form of penna (OL. pesna), a wing, same as pinna, a wing, a fin. Cf. accipiter and the etymology there suggested.] The typical genus of the family Acipenseridæ, including all the ordinary sturgeons (and with the shovel-nosed sturgeons, Scaphirhynchus, the only other genus, composing the family), characterized by the flattened tapering snout, a spiracle over each eye, and 5 distinct rows of bony plates. The common sturgeon, A. sturio, found in both Europe and North America, sometimes attains a length of 18 feet. The white sturgeon of the Pacific coast is A. transmontanus, the European sterlet A. ruthenus. The largest known species is the Russian sturgeon, the bielaga, huso, or hausen, A. huso, sometimes attaining a length of 25 feet and a weight of 3000 pounds. A. güldenstädti is a fourth example, known as the osseter. Also often spelled Accipenser.

Above, the cartilaginous cranium, shaded, is supposed to be seen through the unshaded cranial bones.

Upper figure: a, ridge formed by spinous processes of vertebræ; b, b, lateral wing-like processes; c, rostrum; Au, site of auditory organ; Na, of nasal sacs; Or, of orbit. The membrane bones of the upper surface are: A, analogue of supraoccipital; B, B, of the epiotics; E, of ethmoid; G, G, of the postfrontals; H, H, of the prefrontals; C, C, of the parietals; D, D are the frontals, and F, F the squamosals; K, anterior dermal scute; I, I, L, L, dermal ossifications connecting the pectoral arch with the skull. Lower figure: a, rostrum; b, nasal chamber; c, auditory region; d, coalesced anterior vertebræ; e, ribs; f, g, h, suspensorium; k, palato-maxillary apparatus; Mn, mandible; Or, orbit.

Acipenseres (as-i-pen'sē-rēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Acipenser.] An ordinal term suggested by Bonaparte, 1837, as a substitute for Sturiones or Chondrostei (which see).

acipenserid (as-i-pen'sē-rid), n. One of the Acipenseridæ; a sturgeon.

Acipenseridæ (as″i-pen-ser'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Acipenser + -idæ.] The sturgeons, a family of chondrosteous ganoid fishes, sometimes including only the genus Acipenser, sometimes also the genus Scaphirhynchus. The body is elongate subcylindric, with 5 rows of bony bucklers; the snout is produced, subspatulate or conical, with the mouth on its lower surface, small, transverse, protractile, and toothless; there are 4 barbels in a transverse series on the lower side of the snout; the ventral fins have a single series of fulcra in front, and the dorsal and anal fins approximate to the caudal, which is heterocercal. See Acipenser.

Acipenserinæ (as-i-pen-sē-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Acipenser + -inæ.] A subfamily of Acipenseridæ, typified by the genus Acipenser. By older ichthyologists it was made coequal with the family. Lately it has been restricted to Acipenseridæ with spiracles, subconic snout, and thick tail, and thus made to include only the true sturgeons.

acipenserine (as-i-pen'sē-rin), n. One of the Acipenserinæ.

acipenseroid (as-i-pen'sē-roid), a. and n. I. a. Having the characters of the Acipenseridæ.

II. n. A fish of the family Acipenseridæ; an acipenserid.

Acipenseroidæ (as-i-pen-sē-roi'dē), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Acipenseridæ.

Acipenseroidei (as-i-pen-sē-roi'dē-ī), n. pl. [< Acipenser + -oid-ei.] A name used by some ichthyologists as a subordinal name in place of Chondrostei.

aciurgy† (as'i-ėr-ji), n. [< Gr. ἀκίς, a point, + -ουργία (< -ο-εργία), in comp., working, < ἔργειν = E. work: see demiurgy and surgery.] Operative surgery.

acker[1]†, n. An obsolete form of acre (Middle English aker, etc.).

acker[2] (ak'er), n. [E. dial. (Sc. aiker in sense 2), < ME. aker, flood-tide, a bore, an eager; prob. a var. of eager[2], q. v.] 1†. Flood-tide; a bore; an eager.

> Akyr [var. aker] of the see flowyng, impetus maris.
> Prompt. Parv.

2. A ripple or furrow on the surface of water. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

acketon†, n. See acton.

ackman (ak'man), n.; pl. ackmen (-men). [< ack-, of unknown origin, + man.] A sailors' name for a fresh-water thief, or one who steals on navigable rivers. Also called ack-pirate.
Sailors' Word-book.

acknow† (ak-nō'), v. t. [< ME. aknowen, know, acknowledge, < AS. oncnāwan, perceive, know, < on- for and- (= Gr. ἀντί, against, back, = Goth. anda-), + cnāwan, know: see a-[5] and know.] To recognize; acknowledge; confess.

> You will not be aknown, sir, why, 'tis wise:
> Thus do all gamesters at all games dissemble.
> B. Jonson, Volpone, v. 6.

acknowledge (ak-nol'ej), v. t.; pret. and pp. acknowledged, ppr. acknowledging. [< ME. knowlechen, knoulechen, cnawlechen, acknowledge, < knowleche, knouleche, cnawleche, knowledge: see knowledge. The prefix ac-, for a-, is due to the frequent ME. verb aknowen: see acknow.] 1. To admit or profess a knowledge of; avow to be within one's knowledge or apprehension; own to be real or true; recognize the existence, truth, or fact of: as, to acknowledge God, or the existence of or belief in a God; to acknowledge the rights of a claimant.

> He that acknowledgeth the Son hath the Father also.
> 1 John ii. 23.

> The Romans that erected a temple to Fortune, acknowledged therein, though in a blinder way, somewhat of divinity. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, i. 18.

> The influence attributed to Cecrops . . . indicates that Athens was acknowledged as the head of this confederacy.
> Thirlwall, Hist. Greece, xi.

2. To express or manifest perception or appreciation of; give evidence of recognizing or realizing: as, to acknowledge an acquaintance by bowing; to acknowledge a favor or one's faults.

> I acknowledged my sin unto thee. . . . I said, I will confess my transgressions. Ps. xxxii. 5.

> They his gifts acknowledged none.
> Milton, P. L., xi. 612.

> These were written with such submissions and professions of his patronage, as I had never seen any more acknowledging. Evelyn, Diary, Aug. 18, 1673.

> With what queenly dignity . . . did the great Zenobia acknowledge the greetings of her people!
> W. Ware, Zenobia, I. 87.

So great a soldier as the old French Marshal Montluc acknowledges that he has often trembled with fear, and recovered courage when he had said a prayer for the occasion. Emerson, Courage.

3. To own the genuineness of; own as binding or of legal force: as, to acknowledge a deed.—4. To admit or certify the receipt of; give information of the arrival of: as, to acknowledge a letter or a remittance.—To acknowledge a deed (or other instrument), in law, to avow before a proper officer or court that one has executed it, for the purpose of having a certificate thereof appended which will qualify the instrument to be admitted in evidence or to record, or both, without further proof of genuineness. As often used, the word implies not only the avowal of the party, but also the procuring of the official certificate. Thus a deed is said to have been acknowledged when it actually bears the certificate. = Syn. Acknowledge, Admit, Confess, Own, Avow, grant, concede, allow, assent to, profess, take cognizance of. To acknowledge is to state one's knowledge of; it may have a personal object: as, he acknowledged her as his wife; as applied to acts, it often implies confession under external pressure. Admit has a similar reference to solicited or forced assent: as, he admitted the charge; he admitted that his opponent was a good man. Confess implies the admission of that which is not creditable, as wrong conduct, and belongs rather to specified things or particular transactions. He acknowledged the authorship of the book; he admitted the truth of the proposition; he confessed that he was guilty of the theft. Confess is the strongest of these words, being applied to actions of more moment than acknowledge, admit, or own. To own is a less formal act; there is a tendency, on account of its brevity, to apply the word to anything that a man takes home to himself. To avow is a bolder act, generally performed in spite of adverse influences, and does not necessarily imply that the action or sentiment avowed is blameworthy. To acknowledge an error, admit a fact, confess a fault, own one's folly, avow a belief.

You must not only acknowledge to God that you are a sinner, but must particularly enumerate the kinds of sin whereof you know yourself guilty. Wake.

I admit, however, the necessity of giving a bounty to genius and learning. Macaulay, Speech on Copyright.

Quotation confesses inferiority.
Emerson, Letters and Social Aims.

Owning her weakness and evil behaviour.
Hood, Bridge of Sighs.

The tempest of passion with which he [Othello] commits his crimes, and the haughty fearlessness with which he avows them, give an extraordinary interest to his character.
Macaulay, Machiavelli.

acknowledgement, n. See acknowledgment.

acknowledger (ak-nol'e-jėr), n. One who acknowledges.

acknowledgment (ak-nol'ej-ment), n. 1. An admission or profession of knowledge or apprehension; a recognition of the existence or truth of anything: as, the acknowledgment of a sovereign power, or of a debt.

Immediately upon the acknowledgment of the Christian faith, the eunuch was baptized by Philip. Hooker.

2. An expression or manifestation of perception or appreciation; recognition, avowal, or confession: as, an acknowledgment of kindness or of one's wrong-doing.

> With this acknowledgment,
> That God fought for us. Shak., Hen. V., iv. 8.

3. Something given or done in return for a favor. Smollett.—4. In law: (a) The certificate of a public officer that an instrument was acknowledged before him by the person who executed it. (b) The act of so acknowledging execution.—5. In com., a receipt.

Also spelled acknowledgement.

Acknowledgment money, in England, money paid according to the customs of some manors by copyhold tenants on the death of the lord of the manor. = Syn. 1. Admission, recognition, acceptance, indorsement, thanks.

ack-pirate (ak'pī-rāt), n. [< ack-, of unknown origin, + pirate.] Same as ackman.

aclastic (a-klas'tik), a. [< Gr. ἀκλαστος, unbroken (< ἀ- priv. + κλαστός, verbal adj. of κλάειν, break), + -ic.] In nat. philos., not refracting: applied to substances which do not refract the rays of light passing through them. N. E. D.

acleidian (a-klī'di-an), a. See aclidian.

aclid (ak'lid), n. A gastropod of the family Aclidæ.

Aclidæ, Aclididæ (ak'li-dē, ak-lid'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Aclis (Aclid-) + -idæ: see aclis, 2.] A family of ptenoglossate pectinibranchiate gastropods typified by the genus Aclis, with a much-curved minute odontophore, densely hirsute, with simple uncinate teeth and a rimate turreted shell. Two genera, Aclis and Hemiaclis, are represented by four species in Norway.

aclide (ak'līd), n. [< L. aclis (aclid-), also spelled aclys: see aclis.] Same as aclis, 1.

aclides, n. Plural of aclis.

aclidian (a-klid'i-an), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + κλείς (κλειδ-), a key, the clavicle.] In zoöl., deficient in or characterized by the absence of clavicles. Also spelled acleidian.

aclinic (a-klin'ik), a. [< Gr. ἀκλινής, not bending to either side, < ἀ- priv. + κλίνειν, incline, lean, = E. lean[1].] Having no inclination.—Aclinic line, the name given by Professor August to an irregular curve located upon the surface of the earth in the neighborhood of the equator, where the magnetic needle balances itself horizontally, having no dip. It has been also termed the magnetic equator.

aclis (ak'lis), n.; pl. aclides (-li-dēz). [< L. aclis, also aclys, a small javelin, said to be a corruption of Gr. ἀγκυλίς, a hook, barb, taken in the sense of ἀγκύλη, a bend, twist, thong of a javelin, the javelin itself, fem. of ἀγκύλος, crooked, bent, = L. angulus, angle: see angle[3].] 1. In Rom. antiq., a heavy missile weapon; an aclide.—2. [cap.] [NL.] The representative genus of the family Aclidæ (which see). Lovén, 1846.

aclys (ak'lis), n. Same as aclis, 1.

Acmæa (ak-mē'ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκμαῖος, at the height or prime, in full bloom, vigorous, < ἀκμή, a point, the highest point: see acme.] A genus of docoglossal gastropods, of the family Patellidæ, or limpets. The genus is commonly regarded as continuing from Silurian seas to those of the present; but it is probable that the earlier forms will prove generically distinct.

acmæid (ak-mē'id), n. A limpet of the family Acmæidæ; a false limpet.

Acmæidæ (ak-mē'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Acmæa + -idæ.] A family of false or single-gilled limpets, or prosobranchiate gastropods having a single cervical gill. Leading genera are Acmæa, Lottia, and Scurria.

Acmæodera (ak-mē-od'e-rä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκμαῖος, at the height or prime, in full bloom, vigorous (< ἀκμή, a point: see acme), + (?) δέρος, skin; allusion not clear.] A genus of buprestid beetles related to Agrilus, but less elongate and with an indistinct scutellum.

acme (ak'mē), n. [< Gr. ἀκμή, edge, point, the highest point, the prime, crisis; akin to ἀκή, point, ἀκίς, point, L. acus, needle, acer, sharp, etc.: see acid.] 1. The top or highest point; the furthest point attained; the utmost reach.

> For beauty's acme hath a term as brief
> As the wave's poise before it break in pearls.
> Lowell, Cathedral.

The independence of the individual, the power to stand alone as regards men and the gods, is the acme of stoical attainment. G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 178.

2†. The maturity or perfection of life.—3. In med.: (a) The height or crisis of a disease. (b) Another, and probably the correct, form of acne.—4. [cap.] In zoöl., a genus of land-shells. Hartmann, 1821.

acmite, akmite (ak'mīt), n. [< Gr. ἀκμή, a point, + -ite[2].] A member of the pyroxene group occurring in acutely pointed crystals (whence the name) of a brownish-black or reddish-brown color. It is essentially a silicate of ferric iron and sodium. The original locality is at Rundemyr, near Kongsberg, Norway. Ægirite (which see) is closely related. Also spelled achmite.

acne (ak'nē), n. [NL., prob. orig. a misprint (being a book-word) for acme, < Gr. ἀκμή, a point: see acme.] An eruption occurring most frequently on the face, and on the shoulders and chest, about the period of puberty. It is a follicular or perifollicular inflammation of the sebaceous glands, resulting in the formation of comedo-bearing papules, which often pass into pustules. The so-called acne rosacea is a hyperemia of the face combined with more or less acne.

acnestis (ak-nes'tis), n.; pl. acnestides (-ti-dēz). [NL., < Gr. ἀκνηστις, the spine or backbone of quadrupeds, < ἀ- priv. + κνηστός, scratched, < κνάειν, scratch, scrape.] That part of the spine in quadrupeds which extends from between the shoulder-blades to the loins, and which the animal cannot reach to scratch.

acnodal (ak-nō'dal), a. Of or pertaining to an acnode. Salmon.

acnode (ak'nōd), n. [Irreg. < L. acus, a needle, + nodus, a node.] In math., a double point belonging to a curve, but separated from other real points of the curve.

Acnodal Cubic. A, acnode.

Acocephalus (ak-ō-sef'a-lus), n. [NL., < L. acus, needle, + Gr. κεφαλή, head.] A genus of homopterous hemipterous insects, of the family Jassidæ or Tettigonidæ, having a boat-shaped form, a coarse surface, shovel-shaped vertex with a thick, smooth margin, and thick wing-covers with strong veins. A. nervosus is a pale-yellowish species, ¼ of an inch long, freckled with brown, and with angular whitish lines, inhabiting Europe and North America.

Acochlides (a-kok'li-dēz), n. pl. [NL. (F. acochlides), < Gr. ἀ- priv. + κοχλίς (κοχλιδ-), dim.

of κόχλος, a shell-fish with a spiral shell, the shell itself; akin to κόγχη, a shell: see conch.] In Latreille's system of classification, 1825, a family of acetabuliferous cephalopods, without a shell. It included most of the octopods.

acock (a-kok'), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3], on, + cock[2].] In a cocked manner: as, he set his hat acock.

a-cockbill (a-kok'bil), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3], on, + cock[2] (condition of being cocked or turned upward: see cock[2]) + bill[2], point or end: see bill[2], 5.] Naut., with the ends pointing upward. Applied (a) to an anchor when it hangs down by its ring from the cathead, and (b) to the yards of a ship when they are tipped up at an angle with the deck.

Man-of-war with Yards a-cockbill.

It was now the close of Lent, and on Good Friday she had all her yards a-cockbill, which is customary among Catholic vessels. R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 147.

acocotl (äk'ō-kot-l), n. [Nahuatl acocotli.] A musical instrument used by the aborigines in Mexico: usually called clarin. It is a thin tube from 8 to 10 feet in length, made of the dry stalk of a plant of the same name. The performer inhales the air through it.

★ S. K. Handbook, Mus. Inst., p. 69.

Acœla (a-sē'lä), n. pl. [NL.: see acœlous.] An order of marine Turbellaria, with no digestive ★ cavity but a spongy digestive parenchyma.

Acœlomata (as-ē-lom'a-tä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + κοίλωμα, a hollow: see cœloma.] A division of Protocœlomata, or sponges, containing the Ascones: so called in allusion to its pores and the absence of cœlomata.

acœlomate (a-sē'lō-māt), a. Same as acœlomatous.

acœlomatous (as-ē-lom'a-tus), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + κοίλωμα, a hollow: see a-[18], cœloma, and cœlomatous.] 1. In zoöl., having no body-cavity or perivisceral space; not cœlomatous.

Although these acœlomatous worms have no body-cavity, no blood, no vascular system, they always have a kidney system. Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), II. 404.

2. Of or pertaining to the Acœlomi; cestoid. Equivalent forms are acœlomate, acœlomous.

Acœlomi (as-ē-lō'mī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + κοίλωμα, a cavity.] Those worms which have no proper body-cavity and no intestinal cavity, and which are also devoid of a blood-vascular system; the cestoids or flat-worms, such as tape-worms. See cuts under Cestoidea and Tænia. The name is nearly synonymous with Plathelminthes, but comprehends not only the actual or existing plathelminths, in a zoölogical sense, but also the hypothetical primitive worms, Archelminthes, supposed to have possessed the same or a similar type of structure. In Haeckel's classification the Acœlomi form one of the classes or main divisions of the animal kingdom. See Cœlomi.

acœlomous (a-sē'lō-mus), a. Same as acœlomatous.

acœlous (a-sē'lus), a. [< NL. acœlus, < Gr. ἀκοιλος, not hollow, < ἀ- priv. + κοῖλος, hollow.] In zoöl., having no intestinal cavity; anenterous.

Acœmeti, Acœmetæ (a-sem'ē-tī, -tē), n. pl. [LL., < Gr. ἀκοίμητοι, masc., ἀκοίμηται, fem., pl. of ἀκοίμητος, -τα, sleepless, < ἀ- priv. + κοιμᾶν, bring to sleep: see cemetery.] An order of monks and nuns in Constantinople under the Eastern Empire, so named because they divided their communities into relays for keeping up perpetual worship. In the sixth century the monks embraced Nestorianism and the order became extinct. The order of nuns, however, existed till the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks in the fifteenth century. Also spelled Acemeti, Acemetæ.

acoie†, v. t. and i. A Middle English form of accoy.

acold† (a-kōld'), a. [< ME. acold, acoled (< AS. ācōled), cold, lit. cooled, pp. of acolen, < AS. ācōlian, become cool or cold, < ā- + cōlian, become cool or cold, < cōl, cool, cold: see cool. The ME. form acold, acoled, would regularly become E. acooled* (akōld); the present ō sound is due to confusion with E. cold, < AS. ceald, which is akin to cōl, and so, remotely, to acold.] Cold.

Poor Tom's a-cold. Shak., Lear, iii. 4.

acollé, p. a. See accollé.

acology (a-kol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. ἄκος, remedy, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The doctrine of remedies, surgical and medical.

Acoloithus (ak-ō-loi'thus), n. [NL., prop. acoluthus, < Gr. ἀκόλουθος, a follower: see acolyth, acolyte.] A genus of moths belonging to the family Pyromorphidæ, founded by Clemens 1860.

Acoloithus americanus.

a, larva; b, pupa; c, cocoon; d, moth; e, moth with outstretched wings.

They are small and delicate and of somber colors. The larvæ are somewhat hairy and feed gregariously, undergoing transformation in some crevice, within tough oval cocoons. They have a habit of feeding together in soldier-like ranks. A. americanus (now placed in Harrisina) destroys grape-leaves.

acolouthite†, n. [< Gr. ἀκόλουθος, acolyth, + -ite[2]: see acolyte.] Same as acolyte.

acolyctin (ak-ō-lik'tin), n. [< NL. Aco(nitum) lyc(oc)t(onum), the plant from which it is derived (see Aconitum), + -in[2].] An alkaloid derived from Aconitum lycoctonum, and identical with napellin.

acolyte (ak'ō-līt), n. [< ME. acolit, acolyt, < OF. acolyte = Sp. acólito = Pg. acolyto = It. accolito, < ML. acolÿtus, acolitus, acolythus (> E. acolyth), acolūtus, prop. acolūthus, an acolyte, < Gr. ἀκόλουθος, a follower, an attendant, < ἀ- copulative + κέλευθος, a way, a journey, from the same root as κέλεσθαι, set in motion, urge on, and κελεύειν, command.] 1. One who waits on a person; an attendant; an assistant.

With such chiefs, and with James and John as acolytes. Motley.

2. In the Rom. Cath. Ch., one ordained to the fourth and highest of the minor orders, ranking immediately below the subdeacon. See orders. His office is to serve those of the superior orders in the ministry of the altar, light the candles, prepare the wine and water, etc. The name is now commonly extended to the boys who exercise these offices without ordination.

3. In astron., an attendant or accompanying star or other heavenly body; a satellite.

But she [the moon] is the earth's nearest neighbor, and therefore conspicuous; her constant acolyte, whose obsequious and rapid motions demand and compel attention. New Princeton Rev., I. 47.

Sometimes written acolyth, and formerly also acholithite, acolythe, acolythist, acolothist.

acolyth, acolythe (ak'ō-lith, -līth), n. [< ML. acolythus, for acoluthus, the correct form of acolytus: see acolyte.] See acolyte.

acolythate (a-kol'i-thāt), n. [< acolyth + -ate[3].] The state, office, or orders of an acolyte.

acolythical (ak-ō-lith'i-kal), a. [< acolythic* + -al.] Belonging or pertaining to an acolyte.

acolythist† (a-kol'i-thist), n. Same as acolyte.

acomber†, v. t. See accumber.

Acomys (ak'ō-mis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκή, a sharp point (or L. acus, a needle), + μῦς = E. mouse.] A genus of rodents, of the family Muridæ and subfamily Murinæ, having sharp flattened spines in the fur. The skull and teeth are as in the genus Mus.

acon (ā'kon), n. [< (?) Gr. ἄκων, a dart.] A boat used for traveling over mud-beds. See extract.

Walton also invented the pousse-pied or acon, a kind of boat which is still in use. The acon is composed of a plank of hard wood, which constitutes the bottom, and is called the sole. This plank is bent in the fore part in such a manner as to form a sort of prow. Three light planks, which are nailed together at the sides and back, complete this simple boat. E. P. Wright, Anim. Life, p. 558.

acondylous, acondylose (a-kon'di-lus, -lōs), a. [< Gr. ἀκόνδυλος, without knuckles or joints, < ἀ- priv. + κόνδυλος, a knuckle, a joint: see a-[18], condyle, and -ous, -ose.] In anat., jointless.

aconella (ak-ō-nel'ä), n. [NL., < acon(itum) + dim. -ella.] In chem., an organic base obtained from the root of Aconitum Napellus, closely resembling if not identical with narcotin.

aconellin (ak-ō-nel'in), n. [< aconella + -in[2].] Same as aconella.

aconin, aconine (ak'ō-nin), n. [< acon(itum) + -in[2].] An organic base derived from aconitin. It is amorphous, hygroscopic, and very bitter.

aconitate (a-kon'i-tāt), n. [< aconite + -ate[1].] A salt formed by the union of aconitic acid aconite (ak'ō-nīt), n. [= F. aconit = Sp. Pg. It. aconito, < L. aconitum: see Aconitum.] The plant wolf's-bane or monk's-hood, Aconitum Napellus. It is used in medicine, especially in cases of fever and neuralgia. See Aconitum. Nepál aconite consists of the roots of A. ferox and probably other species indigenous in the Himalayas; it is also called bikh, bish, and bisk. Winter aconite is a ranunculaceous plant, Cammarum hyemale, of Italy, and one of the earliest spring flowers.

★ with a base.

aconitia (ak-ō-nish'iä), n. [NL., < L. aconitum.] Same as aconitin.

aconitic (ak-ō-nit'ik), a. Of or pertaining to aconite.—Aconitic acid, $C_6H_6O_6$, a tribasic acid found combined with lime in some species of the genus Aconitum, and in a few other plants. It is also obtained by the dry distillation of citric acid. Also called equisetic acid. See achilleic acid, under achilleic.

aconitin, aconitine (a-kon'i-tin), n. [< aconite + -in[2].] A highly poisonous narcotic alkaloid, $C_{34}H_{47}NO_{11}$, obtained from the roots and leaves of several species of Aconitum. It forms white powdery grains, or a compact, vitreous, transparent mass; is bitter, acrid, and very soluble in alcohol. It is an important remedy in neuralgia, especially of the fifth cranial nerve. Also called aconitia and aconitina.

Aconitum (ak-ō-nī'tum), n. [L. aconītum, a poisonous plant, monk's-bane, wolf's-bane, < Gr. ἀκόνιτον, also ἀκόνιτος, a poisonous plant, of uncertain etym.; said by Pliny to be so called because it grew ἐν ἀκόναις, on sharp, steep rocks (Gr. ἀκόνη, a whetstone, < √ ak*, be sharp, pierce). This is improbable. The form is the same as the neut. of Gr. ἀκόνιτος, without dust, < ἀ- priv. + κόνις, dust, but there seems to be no connection between the two words.] A genus of poisonous erect or trailing ranunculaceous herbs, with about 20 species, of the mountains of the northern hemisphere. They have very irregular, showy flowers, and are often found in cultivation, as the common monk's-hood (A. Napellus) and wolf's-bane (A. Lycoctonum). The roots and leaves, chiefly of A. Napellus, are used medicinally. See aconitin. The bikh of Nepál, used in poisoning arrows and also as a source of aconitin, is derived mainly from A. ferox.

Aconite (A. Napellus).

a, flower; b, same, calyx removed.

acontia, n. Plural of acontium.

Acontias (a-kon'ti-as), n. [L., < Gr. ἀκοντίας, a quick-darting serpent, a meteor, < ἄκων, a javelin, dart, < ἀκή, a point.] The leading genus of the family Acontiidæ (which see).

acontiid (a-kon'ti-id), n. A lizard of the family Acontiidæ.

Acontiidæ, Acontiadæ (ak-on-tī'i-dē, -a-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Acontias + -idæ, or -adæ.] A family of saurian or lacertilian reptiles of the scincoid group, related to the Anguidæ, the family to which the well-known slow-worm of Europe belongs. They are weak, timid, and perfectly harmless lizards, resembling snakes in consequence of the apparent absence of limbs. Acontias is the leading genus, giving name to the family; there are numerous species, inhabiting chiefly the warmer or dryer parts of the old world. Acontias meleagris is sometimes called the dart-snake, from its manner of darting upon its prey.

acontium (a-kon'shium), n.; pl. acontia (-shiä). [NL., < Gr. ἀκόντιον, a small dart, dim. of ἄκων (ἀκοντ-), a javelin.] 1. In Gr. antiq.: (a) A dart or javelin, smaller and lighter than the long spear, and thrown by means of a thong or amentum. Hence—(b) The game of hurling the javelin, one of the five exercises of the famous pentathlon (which see) at the Olympian,

Isthmian, and other games.—2. pl. In zoöl., convoluted cords formed in the Actinia and furnished with thread-cells. Pascoe.

acop† (ą-kop′), prep. phr. as adv. [< a[3], on, + cop[1], top.] At the top.

> She weares a hood, but it stands acop.
> B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 6.

Acopa (a-kō′pą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + κώπη, a handle, the handle of an oar, an oar.] 1. A prime division of the Tunicata or Ascidia, in which the ascidians proper are distinguished collectively from the Copelata or Appendicularia. See extract. Compare cuts under Ascidia and Appendicularia.

> These two classes were formerly separated according to whether they had or had not a propelling tail, as the names of the classes showed. I have retained the nomenclature without giving an importance to this character which does not belong to it; the larvæ of many Acopa have the directive organ. A much greater difference between the two divisions is to be found in the characters of their spiracles. In the Copelata these open on to the exterior. In the Acopa they open into a cavity, which is formed from a part of the rudimentary spiracle of the Copelata. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 389.

2. [sing.] A genus of lepidopterous insects.

acopic (a-kop′ik), a. [< Gr. ἄκοπος, removing weariness, < ἀ- priv. + κόπος, weariness, toil, orig. a striking, < κόπ-τ-ειν, strike.] In med., fitted to relieve weariness; restorative. Buchanan, Dict. Sci.

acor (ā′kôr), n. [L., a sour taste, < acere, be sour: see acid.] Acidity, as of the stomach.

acorn (ā′kôrn, often ā′kėrn), n. [Early mod. E. acorn, akorn, eykorn, acron, acquorn, akecorne, oakern, okecorn, okehorne, etc., < late ME. acorn, akorn, accorne, acorun, ocorn, occorn, okecorne, ackerne, akern, hakern, assibilated achorne, acharne, atcherne, etc. The reg. mod. form would be akern*, in ME. akern (assibilated atcherne, improp. aspirated hakern), the other forms being due to the erroneous notion that the word is a derivative of oak, or a compound of oak (ME. ook, ok, oc, earlier ac, < AS. āc) and corn (ME. and AS. corn), or horn (ME. and AS. horn). A similar error has affected the spelling of the word in other languages. ME. akern, < AS. æcern, æcirn, an acorn, orig. any fruit of the field, being prop. an adj. formed (like silvern from silver) < æcer, a field, acre (see acre), + -n (see -en[2]); = D. aker, an acorn, < akker, a field (but now usually eikel, an acorn, < eik, an oak); = LG. ekker, an acorn, < akker, a field (also ek, an acorn, < eke, an oak); = G. ecker (after LG.), an acorn, < acker, a field (also eichel, an acorn, < eiche, an oak); = Icel. akarn, an acorn, < akr, a field (not from eik, an oak); = Norw. aakorn (also aakonn, aakodn, and akall), < aaker, a field (not from eik, an oak); cf. Sw. ekollon, an acorn, < ek, oak, + ollon, an acorn; = Dan. agern, an acorn, < ager, a field (not from eg, an oak); = Goth. akran, fruit in general, < akrs, a field. Thus acorn has nothing to do with either oak or corn.] 1. The fruit of the oak; a one-celled, one-seeded, coriaceous, rounded or elongated nut, the base of which is surrounded by an indurated scaly cup. Acorns have been used for food, and are still eaten in various countries. The sweet acorn is the fruit of the Quercus Ballota of northwestern Africa, and is quite palatable, as are also several American species. All are excellent food for swine.

> Thei weren wont lyghtly to slaken hir hunger at euene with acornes of okes. Chaucer, Boëthius, ii. meter 5.

> Besides the gall which is his proper fruite, hee shootes out oakerns, i. e., ut nunc vocamus acornes, and oakes apples and polypody and moss.
> Sir T. Browne, Works, I. 203 (ed. Bohn).

2. Naut., a small ornamental piece of wood, of a conical or globular shape, sometimes fixed on the point of the spindle above the vane, on a masthead, to keep the vane from being blown off.—3. Any similar ornamental tip.—4. Same as acorn-shell, 2.

Acorn-moth (Holcocera glandulella, Riley).
a, larva within acorn; b, acorn infested with the larva; c, head and thoracic segments of larva; d, one of the abdominal segments of larva, lateral view; e, one of the abdominal segments of larva, dorsal view; f, moth (the cross shows natural size); g, basal joint of antenna in the male moth.

acorn-cup (ā′kôrn-kup), n. The hardened involucre covering the base of an acorn. The acorn-cups of the Quercus Ægilops, under the name valonia, have become an important article of commerce, large quantities being used in tanning. See valonia.

acorned (ā′kôrnd), a. 1. Furnished or loaded with acorns. Specifically, in her., said of an oak represented on a coat of arms as loaded with acorns.

2. Fed with acorns. Shak., Cymbeline, ii. 5.

acorn-moth (ā′kôrn-môth), n. A guest-moth, described as Holcocera glandulella by Riley in 1871, belonging to the family Blastobasidæ and to the group Tineina. Its color is ash-gray, with two distinct spots near the middle of the fore wings and a transverse pale stripe across the basal third. Its larva is grayish-white, with a light-brown head and cervical and caudal shields, and is commonly met with in mast, feeding chiefly on those acorns that have been occupied by the acorn-weevil. See cut in preceding column.

acorn-oil (ā′kôrn-oil), n. A volatile oil, of buttery consistence and pungent odor, obtained from the acorns of Quercus robur.

acorn-shell (ā′kôrn-shel), n. 1. The shell of the acorn.—2. One of the cirripeds of the genus Balanus; a barnacle: called by this name from a supposed resemblance of some of the species to acorns. See Balanus and Cirripedia.

acorn-weevil (ā′kôrn-wē″vl), n. The popular name for certain species of the curculionid genus Balaninus, as B. uniformis (Le Conte), B. rectus (Say), and B. quercus (Horn), which live in the larval state within acorns. The females possess extremely long and slender beaks, by means of which they pierce the rind of the acorn and push an egg into the interior. The larva is a legless grub of elongate curved shape, not differing essentially from other curculionid larvæ. The affected acorn drops prematurely, and the full-grown larva eats its way out to change to a pupa in the ground. See cut under Balaninus.

acorn-worm (ā′kôrn-wėrm), n. A name given to the Balanoglossus, the type and sole member of the order Enteropneusta: so called from the acorn-like shape of the anterior end of its body. See Balanoglossus, Enteropneusta.

Acorus (ak′ō-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄκορος, the sweet-flag.] A small genus of aromatic flag-like araceous plants, consisting of two species. A. Calamus, the Calamus aromaticus of druggists, is native or widely naturalized in northern temperate regions, and is known as sweet-flag or sweet-rush. See sweet-flag.

acosmia† (a-koz′mi-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκοσμία, disorder, < ἄκοσμος, without order, < ἀ- priv. + κόσμος, order: see cosmos.] 1. Irregularity in disease, particularly in crises.—2. Ill health, with loss of color in the face.

acosmism (a-koz′mizm), n. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + κόσμος, world, + -ism. Cf. acosmia.] The denial of the existence of a universe as distinct from God.

acosmist (a-koz′mist), n. [As acosm-ism + -ist.] One who holds the doctrine of acosmism.

acosmistic (ak-oz-mis′tik), a. Pertaining to the doctrine of acosmism.

acotyledon (a-kot-i-lē′dọn), n.; pl. acotyledones, acotyledons (-lē′dọ-nēz, -dọnz). [= F. acotylédone, < NL. acotyledo(n-) (sc. planta), a plant without seed-lobes, < Gr. ἀ- priv. + κοτυληδών, any cup-shaped cavity: see cotyledon.] A plant destitute of a cotyledonous embryo. The name Acotyledones was proposed by A. Laurent de Jussieu for the class of plants which have no proper seed or embryo, now usually and more properly designated as Cryptogamia or cryptogams.

Germinating Spore of an Acotyledonous Plant (Moss), in different stages, Magnified. (From Sachs's "Lehrbuch der Botanik.") acotyledonous (a-kot-i-lē′dọ-nus), a. Without cotyledons, or seed-leaves, as the embryo of Cuscuta; more usually, without embryo (and consequently without cotyledons), as cryptogams.

acou-. For acu-, in words from Greek ἀκούειν, hear: an irregular spelling due to the French spelling of acoustic, the first of these words introduced into English. See acoustic.

acouchi-resin (a-kö′shi-rez″in), n. [Acouchi (alouchi, aluchi, etc.), native name (in F. spelling) in Guiana.] The inspissated juice of Protium Aracouchini, a burseraceous tree of Guiana, and other species of tropical South America. It resembles the elemi-resin of the old world.

acouchy, acouchi (a-kö′shi), n. [Also akouchi, acuchi; < F. acouchi, agouchi, < Galibi akouchy, North Braz. acuchy, acuschi, aguschy. Compare agouti.] An animal belonging to the genus Dasyprocta, family Dasyproctidæ, of the hystricine series of the order Rodentia; the olive agouti or Surinam rat, Dasyprocta acouchy, inhabiting Guiana and some of the West India islands. Related to the cavies, or guinea-pig family. See agouti and Dasyproctidæ.

Acouchy (Dasyprocta acouchy).

acoumeter (ą-kö′- or ą-kou′me-tėr), n. [Also acoumometer, irreg. < Gr. ἀκούειν, hear, + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the power of the sense of hearing. Also called acousimeter.

acoumetry (ą-kö′- or ą-kou′me-tri), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ἀκούειν, hear, + -μετρία, < μέτρον, a measure.] The measuring of the power of hearing.

acousimeter (a-kö- or a-kou-sim′e-tėr), n. [< Gr. ἄκουσις, a hearing (< ἀκούειν, hear), + μέτρον, a measure.] Same as acoumeter.

acousmatic (a-kös- or a-kous-mat′ik), a. and n. [< Gr. ἀκουσματικός, willing to hear (οἱ ἀκουσματικοί, the probationers of Pythagoras), < ἀκουσμα(τ-), a thing heard, < ἀκούειν, hear: see acoustic.] I. a. Hearing; listening: as, acousmatic disciples.

II. n. A name given to such of the disciples of the Greek philosopher Pythagoras as had not completed their years of probation; hence, a professed hearer; a probationer.

An equivalent form is acoustic.

2. That which is acquired; attainment: commonly in the plural.

His acquirements by industry were enriched and enlarged by many excellent endowments of nature.
Sir J. Hayward, Reigne of Edward VI.

=Syn. 1. Gathering, gaining.—2. Acquirements, Acquisitions, Attainments, Accomplishments, Endowments, Enduements; gain, resources. Acquisitions is the most general term, but it is gradually being restricted to material gains. Attainments denotes exclusively intellectual or moral acquisitions: as, a man of great attainments; his spiritual attainments were high. Acquirements has nearly the same meaning as attainments, though it is sometimes loosely used as equivalent to acquisitions; it has more direct reference to particular things acquired: as, skill in boxing was among his acquirements. Accomplishments are attainments or acquirements, particularly such as fit the possessor for society: as, French, dancing, and music were the sum of her accomplishments. Endowments are the gifts of nature, as genius or aptitude. Enduements are endowments, acquirements, or attainments in the field of moral and spiritual life, but they are opposed to attainments in being regarded as gifts from heaven rather than as the result of personal endeavor. See endue[2].

When you are disposed to be vain of your mental acquirements, look up to those who are more accomplished than yourself. Dr. J. Moore.
Interference has been sanctioned, . . . either in the purely domestic concerns of a nation, or with respect to its foreign relations and territorial acquisitions.
Encyc. Brit., XIII. 192.
It is in general more profitable to reckon up our defects than to boast of our attainments. Carlyle, Essays.
I danced the polka and cellarius,
Spun glass, stuffed birds, and modeled flowers in wax,
Because she liked accomplishments in girls.
Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, i. 1.
He ought to think no man valuable but for his public spirit, justice, and integrity; and all other endowments to be esteemed only as they contribute to the exerting those virtues. Steele, Spectator, No. 340.

acquirer (ą-kwīr'ėr), n. One who acquires.

acquiry† (ą-kwīr'i), n. [< acquire + -y, after inquiry.] Acquirement.

Acraspeda, Acraspedota (a-kras'pe-dą, a-kras-pe-dō'tą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + κράσπεδον, a hem or border.] The name given by Gegenbaur to the acalephs proper; that is, to those jelly-fishes and sea-nettles the lobate border of whose disk is not provided with a contractile marginal fold or true velum: nearly synonymous with Discophora (which see): opposed to Craspedota. See cut under acaleph.

acraspedote (a-kras'pe-dōt), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. (a-18) + craspedote, or as Acraspeda + -ote.] Having no velum, as a discophore; of or pertaining to the Acraspeda.

The Hydroidea and Siphonophora are craspedote; the Discophora are supposed to be destitute of a veil, and are therefore acraspedote. Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 94.

acrasy†, acrasia† (ak'rą-si, a-krā'zi-ą), n. [< ML. acrasia, which appears to combine the notions of (1) Gr. ἀκρασία, later form of ἀκράτεια, intemperance, want of self-control (< ἀκρατής, wanting in self-control, intemperate, unbridled, < ἀ- priv. + κράτος, strength, power, akin to E. hard, q. v.); and (2) Gr. ἄκρασία, bad mixture, ill temperature, < ἄκρατος, unmixed, untempered, intemperate, excessive, < ἀ- priv. + κρατός*, mixed: see crater and crasis.] Excess; surfeit; intemperance; incontinence.

Acrasies, whether of the body or mind, occasion great uneasiness. Cornish, Life of Firmin, p. 84.

acratia (a-krā'shią), n. [< Gr. ἀκράτεια, want of power: see acrasy.] In pathol., failure of strength; weakness; debility.

acraze†, acrase† (a-krāz'), v. t. [< F. acraser, "accrazer, break, burst, craze, bruise, crush" (Cotgrave), same as écraser, escraser, "to squash down, beat flat," etc. (Cotgrave): see *a-*11, *a-*15, and craze.] To weaken, impair, or enfeeble in mind, body, or estate.

I acrazed was. Mir. for Mags., p. 138.

My substance impaired, my credit acrased.
Gascoigne, Letter in Hermit's Tale, p. 21.

Cold in the night which acraseth the bodie.
Holinshed, Chronicles, III. 1049.

acre (ā'kėr), n. [< ME. aker, akir, a field, an acre, < AS. æcer, a field, later also an acre, = OS. akkar = OFries. ekker = D. akker = OHG. ahhar, achar, accar, MHG. G. acker = Icel. akr = Sw. åker = Dan. ager = Goth. akrs = L. ager = Gr. ἀγρός = Skt. ajra, all in the sense of field, orig. a pasture or a chase, hunting-ground; < √ ag*, Skt. √ aj = Gr. ἀγειν = L. agere = Icel. aka, drive: see ake = ache[1], and (< L. agere) act, etc. Hence acorn, q. v. The spelling acre instead of the reg. aker (cf. baker, AS. bæcere) is due to its legal use in imitation of OF. acre, < ML. (Law L.) acra, acrum, from Teut.] 1. Originally, an open plowed or sowed field. This signification was gradually lost after the acre was made a definite measure of surface. Still used in the plural to denote fields or land in general.

My bosky acres, and my unshrubb'd down.
Shak., Tempest, iv. 1.

Over whose acres walked those blessed feet.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 1.

2. A superficial measure of land, usually stated to be 40 poles in length by 4 in breadth; but 160 perches (= 4840 square yards, or 43,560 square feet) make an acre, however shaped. An acre, as a specific quantity of land, was reckoned in England as much as a yoke of oxen could plow in a day till the establishment of a definite measure by laws of the thirteenth century and later. This is known in Great Britain and the United States as the statute acre, to distinguish it from the customary acres still in use to some extent in Scotland, Ireland, and Wales. The Scotch acre is larger than the statute acre, as it contains 6150.4 square yards, 48 Scotch acres being equal to 61 statute acres. The Irish acre is 7840 square yards, 100 Irish acres being nearly equivalent to 162 statute acres. In Wales different measures, the erw, the stang, the paladr, are called acres. The true erw is 4320 square yards; the stang is 3240. There is also the Cornish acre, of 5760 square yards. Among the customary English acres are found measures of the following numbers of perches: 80 (of hops), 90 (of hops), 107, 110, 120 (shut acre), 130, 132, 134, 141, 180 (forest acre), 200 (for copyhold land in Lincolnshire), 212, 256 (of wood). The Leicestershire acre has 2308$\frac{4}{8}$ square yards, the Westmoreland acre 6760 square yards, the Cheshire acre 10,240 square yards. Often abbreviated to A. or a.

The acre was in many cases a small field simply, i. e., an ager; and a hundred and twenty small fields were called a hide. A standard acre was hardly established until the thirteenth century.
D. W. Ross, German Land-holding, Notes, p. 131.

3†. A lineal measure equal to a furrow's length, or 40 poles; more frequently, an acre's breadth, 4 poles, equal to 22 or 25 yards.—Burgh acres. See burgh.—God's acre. See God's-acre.

acreable (ā'kėr-ą-bl), a. [< acre + -able.] According to the acre; measured or estimated in acres or by the acre.

The acreable produce of the two methods was nearly the same. Complete Farmer, Art. Potatoe (Ord. MS.).

acreage (ā'kėr-ąj), n. [< acre + -age.] The number of acres in a piece or tract of land; acres taken collectively; extent in acres: as, the acreage of farm-land in a country; the acreage of wheat sown.

No coarse and blockish God of acreage Stands at thy gate for thee to grovel to.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

The interests of a nation of our acreage and population are a serious load to be conducted safely.
N. A. Rev., CXLI. 211.

acrecbolic (ak-rēk-bol'ik), a. [< Gr. ἄκρος, at the top, + ecbolic, q. v.] Eversible by protrusion of the apex; protruded by a forward movement of the tip: applied to the introverted proboscis of certain animals, as rhabdocœlous planarians and sundry gastropods: the opposite of acrembolic, and correlated with pleurembolic: as, "acrecbolic tubes or introverts," E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XVI. 652.

acrecencia (ä-krā-thān'thē-ä), n. [Sp., = E. accrescence, q. v.] Increase; augmentation; growth; accretion. More specifically, the enhancement of the portions of one or more of several heirs, legatees, etc., resulting when the others do not accept or are incapable of sharing the inheritance. Used in the law of parts of the United States originally settled by Spaniards.

acrecimiento (Sp. pron. ä-krā-thē-mē-ān'tō), n. [Sp., < acrecer = E. accresce, q. v.] Same as acrecencia.

acred (ā'kėrd), a. Possessing acres or landed property: used chiefly in composition: as, "many-acred men," Sir W. Jones, Speech on Ref. of Parl.

He was not unfrequently a son of a noble, or at least of an acred, house. The Nation, July 26, 1877, p. 58.

acre-dale (ā'kėr-dāl), n. [< acre + dale[2] = deal[1], a share.] Land in a common field, different parts of which are held by different proprietors. [Prov. Eng.]

Acredula (a-kred'ū-lä), n. [L., an unknown bird, variously guessed to be a thrush, owl, nightingale, or lark.] A genus of titmice, family Paridæ, founded by Koch in 1816, characterized by the great length of the tail. Acredula caudata, the type of the genus, is the common long-tailed titmouse or European bottle-tit (which see). A. rosea is another species.

acreman† (ā'kėr-man), n. [< ME. akerman, < AS. æcerman; < acre, a field, + man.] A farmer; one who cultivates the fields. E. D.

acrembolic (ak-rem-bol'ik), a. [< Gr. ἄκρος, at the top, + embolic, q. v.] Introversible by intrusion of the apex; withdrawn by a sinking in of the tip: applied to the everted proboscis of certain animals, as rhabdocœlous planarians and sundry gastropods: opposed to acrecbolic.

The acrembolic proboscis or frontal introvert of the Nemertine worms has a complete range.
E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XVI. 652.

acre-shot† (ā'kėr-shot), n. [< acre, a field, + shot, proportion, reckoning: see scot and shot.] A local land-tax or charge. Dugdale.

acre-staff† (ā'kėr-staf), n. [< acre, a field, + staff.] A plow-staff, used to clear the colter or cutter of the plow when clogged with earth. Also spelled aker-staff.

Where the Husbandman's Acre-staff and the Shepherd's hook are, as in this County, in State, there they engross all to themselves. Fuller, Worthies, I. 561.

acrid (ak'rid), a. and n. [First in 18th century; < L. acer, rarely acris, acrus (> F. âcre = Sp. Pg. It. acre), sharp, pungent; with termination due to the kindred L. acidus, sharp, sour: see acid.] I. a. 1. Sharp or biting to the tongue or integuments; bitterly pungent; irritating: as, acrid salts. Acrid substances are those which excite in the organs of taste a sensation of pungency and heat, and when applied to the skin irritate and inflame it. Acrid poisons, including those also called corrosive and escharotic, are those which irritate, corrode, or burn the parts to which they are applied, producing an intense burning sensation, and acute pain in the alimentary canal. They include concentrated acids and alkalis, compounds of mercury, arsenic, copper, etc.

The acrid little jets of smoke which escaped from the joints of his stove from time to time annoyed him.
Howells, A Modern Instance, iii.

2. Figuratively, severe; virulent; violent; stinging: as, "acrid temper," Cowper, Charity.

II. n. 1. An acrid poison: as, "a powerful acrid," Pereira, Mat. Med.—2. One of a class of morbific substances supposed by the humorists to exist in the humors.

acridia (a-krid'i-ä), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Acridium.] Members of the grasshopper family, or the family itself, considered without special reference to its rank in classification. Also called acridii. See Acrididæ.

acridian (a-krid'i-an), a. and n. I. a. Belonging or relating to the Acrididæ.

II. n. One of the acridia.

Acrididæ, Acridiidæ (a-krid'i-dē, ak-ri-dī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Acrid-ium, Acridi-um, + -idæ.] A family of saltatorial orthopterous insects, including the locusts or short-horned grasshoppers, having the hind legs fitted by enlargement of the femora for leaping: related to the crickets (Gryllidæ) and to the long-horned grasshoppers and katydids (Locustidæ).

In Gryllidæ and Locustidæ the antennæ are long and setaceous, . . . in Acridiidæ they are short and stout, rarely clavate. The ovipositor in the two former families is often very large; in Acridiidæ there is no ovipositor.
Pascoe, Zoöl. Class., 1880, p. 115.

acridii (a-krid'i-ī), n. pl. [NL., masc. pl.] Same as acridia.

acridity (a-krid'i-ti), n. [< acrid + -ity, after acidity.] The quality of being acrid; pungency conjoined with bitterness and corrosive irritation; acridness.

Acridium (a-krid'i-um), n. [NL.; also written improp. Acrydium; < Gr. ἀκρίδιον, dim. of ἀκρίς, a locust: see Acris.] A leading genus of grasshoppers, giving name to the family Acrididæ.

acridly (ak'rid-li), adv. With sharp or irritating bitterness.

acridness (ak'rid-nes), n. The quality of being acrid or pungent.

acridophagus (ak-ri-dof'ą-gus), n.; pl. acridophagi (-jī). [NL., < Gr. ἀκριδοφάγος, < ἀκρίς (ἀκριδ-), a locust (see Acris), + φαγεῖν, eat.] A locust-eater.

They are still acridophagi, and even the citizens far prefer a dish of locusts to the "fasikh," which act as anchovies, sardines, and herrings in Egypt.
R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 343.

Acridotheres (ak″ri-dō-thē'rēz), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), < Gr. ἀκρίς (ἀκριδ-), a locust, + θηρᾶν, hunt or chase, < θήρα, a hunting, the chase.] A notable genus of old-world sturnoid passerine birds, founded by Vieillot in 1816; the minas or mina-birds, several species of which are among the commonest and most characteristic birds of India and zoölogically related countries. They resemble and are allied to starlings. A. tristis is a leading example. The species have often been referred to the Cuvierian genus Graculus (which see). Cridotheres is an erroneous form of Acridotheres, apparently originating with Cuvier.

acrimonious (ak-ri-mō'ni-us), a. [= F. acrimonieux = Pg. acrimonioso, < ML. acrimoniosus, < L. acrimonia, acrimony.] 1. Abounding in acrimony or acridness; acrid; corrosive. [Now rare.]

If gall cannot be rendered acrimonious and bitter of itself. Harvey, Consumption.

2. Figuratively, severe; bitter; virulent; caustic; stinging: applied to language, temper, etc.

The factions have the cunning to say, that the bitterness of their spirit is owing to the harsh and acrimonious treatment they receive. Ames, Works, II. 113.

If we knew the man, we should see that to return an acrimonious answer would be the most ridiculous of all possible modes of retort. Whipple, Ess. and Rev., I. 139.

acrimoniously (ak-ri-mō'ni-us-li), adv. In an acrimonious manner; sharply; bitterly; pungently.

acrimoniousness (ak-ri-mō'ni-us-nes), n. The state or quality of being acrimonious.

acrimony (ak'ri-mō-ni), n. [= F. acrimonie = Sp. Pg. It. acrimonia, < L. acrimonia, sharpness, pungency, austerity, < acer (acr-), sharp, pungent: see acrid and acid.] 1. Acridity; harshness or extreme bitterness of taste; pungency; corrosiveness. [Now rare.]

Those milks [in certain plants] have all an acrimony, though one would think they should be lenitive.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 639.

2. Figuratively, sharpness or severity of temper; bitterness of expression proceeding from anger, ill nature, or petulance; virulence.

Acrimony of voice and gesture.
Bp. Hacket, Life of Abp. Williams.

In his official letters he expressed with great acrimony his contempt for the king's character and understanding.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xii.

Acrimony of the humors, an imaginary acrid change of the blood, lymph, etc., which by the humorists was conceived to cause many diseases. Dunglison. = Syn. 2. Acrimony, Asperity, Harshness, Severity, Tartness, Sourness, Bitterness, Virulence, Rancor, acerbity, crabbedness, irascibility. (See harshness.) These words express different degrees of severe feeling, language, or conduct, their signification being determined largely by their derivation and primary use. Tartness is the mildest term, applying generally to language; it implies some wit or quickness of mind, and perhaps a willingness to display it. As tartness is the subacid quality of mind, so acrimony is its acidity; it is a biting sharpness; it may or may not proceed from a nature permanently soured. Sourness is the Anglo-Saxon for acrimony, with more suggestion of permanent quality — sourness of look or language proceeding from a sour nature. Bitterness, which is founded upon a kindred figure, is sourness with a touch of rancor; it is more positive and aggressive. Sourness and bitterness contain less malignity than acrimony. Virulence rises to a high degree of malignity, and rancor to such a height as almost to break down self-control; the whole nature is envenomed, rancid. These words are almost never applied to conduct; asperity and harshness, being founded upon a different figure, are naturally and often so applied; they convey the idea of roughness to the touch. Asperity is the lighter of the two; it is often a roughness of manner, and may be the result of anger; it has a sharper edge than harshness. Harshness is the most applicable to conduct, demands, etc., of all the list; it may proceed from insensibility to others' feelings or rights. Severity has a wide range of meaning, expressing often that which is justified or necessary, and often that which is harsh or hard; as applied to language or conduct it is a weighty word. We may speak of acrimony in debate or of feeling; asperity of manner; harshness of conduct, language, requirements, terms, treatment; severity of censure, punishment, manner; tartness of reply; sourness of aspect; bitterness of spirit, feeling, retort; virulence and rancor of feeling and language.

It is well known in what terms of acrimony and personal hatred Swift attacked Dryden.
Godwin, The Enquirer, p. 379.

The orators of the opposition declared against him with great animation and asperity.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., v.

He that by harshness of nature and arbitrariness of commands uses his children like servants is what they mean by a tyrant. Sir W. Temple.

Severity, gradually hardening and darkening into misanthropy, characterizes the works of Swift.
Macaulay, Addison.

The Dean [Swift], the author of all the mirth, preserves an invincible gravity and even sourness of aspect.
Macaulay, Addison.

To express themselves with smartness against the errors of men, without bitterness against their persons.
Steele, Tatler, No. 242.

No authors draw upon themselves more displeasure than those who deal in political matters, which is justly incurred, considering that spirit of rancour and virulence with which works of this nature abound. Addison.

They hate to mingle in the filthy fray,
Where the soul sours, and gradual rancour grows,
Imbittered more from peevish day to day.
Thomson, Castle of Indolence, i. 17.

Acris (ak'ris), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκρίς (ἀκριδ-), a locust (L. gryllus).] A genus of tree-frogs of the family Hylidæ. Acris gryllus, a characteristic example, is common in the United States, its loud rattling pipe being heard everywhere in the spring. Duméril and Bibron.

acrisia (a-kris'i-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκρισία, want of judgment, the undecided character of a disease, < ἄκριτος, undecided, undiscernible, < ἀ- priv. + κριτός, separated, distinguished, < κρίνειν, separate, distinguish, judge: see crisis and critic.] A condition of disease such as to render prognosis impossible or unfavorable; absence of determinable or favorable symptoms.

acrisy (ak'ri-si), n. [< acrisia.] 1. Same as acrisia.—2. Injudiciousness. [Rare.]

Acrita (ak'ri-tä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἄκριτα, neut. pl. of ἄκριτος, undiscernible, indiscriminate: see acrisia.] A name originally proposed for that group of animals in which no distinct nervous system exists or is discernible. It thus included, besides all of the Protozoa, such as the acalephs, some of the Polypifera, certain Entozoa, the Polygastrica, etc. The name has been employed by different writers with varying latitude of signification, but is now disused, except as a (loose) synonym of Protozoa and other low forms of the Cuvierian Radiata, since it has been shown to apply to no natural group of animals. See Cryptoneura. Also incorrectly written Acrites, after the French.

acritan (ak'ri-tan), a. [See Acrita.] Of or belonging to the Acrita.

acrite (ak'rit), a. Same as acritan.

acritical (a-krit'i-kal), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + critical; Pg. acritico, not critical. Cf. Gr. ἀκριτος, under acrisia.] In pathol.: (a) Having no crisis: as, an acritical abscess. (b) Giving no indications of a crisis: as, acritical symptoms.

acritochromacy (ak″ri-tō-krō'ma-si), n. [< acritochromatic: see -acy.] Inability to distinguish between colors; color-blindness; achromatopsia.

From imperfect observation and the difficulty experienced in communicating intelligently with the Eskimo, I was unable to determine whether acritochromacy existed among them to any great extent.
Arc. Cruise of the Corwin, 1881, p. 24.

acritochromatic (ak″ri-tō-krō-mat'ik), a. [< Gr. ἀκριτος, not distinguishing (see acrisia), + χρῶμα(τ-), color.] Characterized by or affected with acritochromacy; unable to distinguish between colors.

acritude (ak'ri-tūd), n. [< L. acritudo, sharpness, < acer, sharp: see acrid.] An acrid quality; bitter pungency; biting heat. [Rare.]

acrity† (ak'ri-ti), n. [After F. âcreté, < L. acrita(t-)s, < acris, sharp: see acrid.] Sharpness; keen severity; strictness.

The acrity of prudence, and severity of judgment.
A. Gorges, tr. of Bacon, De Sap. Vet., xviii.

acro-. [L., etc., < Gr. ἀκρο-, combining form of ἄκρος, at the furthest point or end, terminal, extreme, highest, topmost, outermost; neut. ἄκρον, the highest or furthest point, top, peak, summit, headland, end, extremity; fem. ἄκρα, equiv. to ἄκρον. Cf. ἀκή, a point, edge, and see acid, etc.] In zoöl. and bot., an element of many compounds of Greek origin, referring to the top, tip, point, apex, summit, or edge of anything. In a few compounds acro- (acr-) improperly represents Latin acer, acris, sharp, pungent: as, acronarcotic, acrolein.

acroama (ak-rō-ā'mä), n.; pl. acroamata (-am'a-tä). [< Gr. ἀκρόαμα, anything heard, recitation, < ἀκροᾶσθαι, hear, prob. akin to κλύειν, hear: see client.] 1. Rhetorical declamation, as opposed to argument.

Facciolati expanded the argument of Pacius . . . into a special Acroama; but his eloquence was not more effective than the reasoning of his predecessors.

Sir W. Hamilton, Discussions, p. 153. (N. E. D.)

2. Oral instruction designed for initiated disciples only; esoteric doctrine. See acroamatic.

acroamatic (ak″rō-a-mat'ik), a. [< L. acroamaticus, < Gr. ἀκροαματικός, designed for hearing only, < ἀκρόαμα(τ-), anything heard: see acroama.] Abstruse; pertaining to deep learning: opposed to exoteric. Applied particularly to those writings of Aristotle (also termed esoteric) which possessed a strictly scientific content and form, as opposed to his exoteric writings or dialogues, which were of a more popular character. The former were addressed to "hearers," that is, were intended to be read to his disciples or were notes written down after his lectures; hence the epithet acroamatic. All the works of Aristotle which we possess, except a few fragments of his dialogues, belong to this class. See esoteric. An equivalent form is acroatic.

We read no acroamatic lectures.

Hales, Golden Remains.

Acroamatic proof or method, a scientific and strictly demonstrative proof or method.

acroamatical (ak″rō-a-mat'i-kal), a. Of an acroamatic or abstruse character; acroamatic.

Aristotle was wont to divide his lectures and readings into acroamatical and exoterical. Hales, Golden Remains.

acroamatics (ak″rō-a-mat'iks), n. pl. [Pl. of acroamatic: see -ics.] Aristotle's acroamatic writings. See acroamatic. Also called acroatics.

acroasis (ak-rō-ā'sis), n. [L., < Gr. ἀκρόασις, a hearing or lecture, < ἀκροᾶσθαι, hear: see acroama.] An oral discourse.

acroatic (ak-rō-at'ik), a. [< L. acroaticus, < Gr. ἀκροατικός, of or for hearing, < ἀκροατής, a hearer, < ἀκροᾶσθαι, hear: see acroama.] Same as acroamatic.

acroatics (ak-rō-at'iks), n. pl. Same as acroamatics.

Acrobasis (ak-rob'a-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄκρον, the top or end, + βάσις, a going. Cf. acrobat.] a, leaflets attacked by larva of A. juglandis (walnut case-bearer); b, case of larva; c, wings of A. nebulo; d, wings of A. juglandis; e, wings of A. nebulo var.

A genus of moths belonging to the Phycitidæ. The following species are now placed in the genus Mineola. The larvæ skeletonize leaves, forming for themselves silken tubes. A. juglandis (Le Baron), the walnut case-bearer, feeds upon walnut and hickory, fastening the leaves together and skeletonizing them from base to tip. A. indiginella (Zeller) is a common pest on apple-trees, and is known as the apple-leaf crumpler.

Apple-leaf Crumpler (Acrobasis indiginella).

a, case, containing caterpillar; b, cases in winter; c, head and thoracic joints of larva, enlarged; d, moth (the cross shows natural size).

acrobat (ak'rō-bat), n. [< F. acrobate = Sp. acróbata = Pg. It. acrobata (cf. NL. Acrobates), < Gr. ἀκρόβατος, walking on tiptoe, also going to the top, < ἄκρον, the highest point, top, summit, neut. of ἄκρος, highest, topmost, + βατός, verbal adj. from βαίνειν, go, = E. come, q. v.] 1. A rope-dancer; also, one who practises high vaulting, tumbling, or other feats of personal agility.—2. A species of the genus Acrobates.

Opossum-mouse of New South Wales (Acrobates pygmæus).

Acrobates (ak-rob'a-tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. as if ἀκροβάτης*, equiv. to ἀκρόβατος: see acrobat.] A genus or subgenus of marsupial quadrupeds of the family Phalangistidæ, peculiar to Australia. It is related to Petaurus, and includes such pygmy petaurists as the opossum-mouse, Acrobates pygmæus, one of the most diminutive of marsupials, being hardly larger than a mouse. Like various other so-called flying quadrupeds, the opossum-mouse is provided with a parachute. The genus was founded by Desmarest in 1820. Also written Acrobata.

acrobatic (ak-rō-bat'ik), a. [= F. acrobatique, < Gr. ἀκροβατικός, fit for climbing, < ἀκρόβατος: see acrobat.] Of or pertaining to an acrobat or his performances: as, acrobatic feats; acrobatic entertainments.

Made his pupil's brain manipulate . . . the whole extraordinary catalogue of an American young lady's school curriculum, with acrobatic skill.

E. H. Clarke, Sex in Education, p. 71.

acrobatical (ak-rō-bat'i-kal), a. Same as acrobatic. [Rare.]

acrobatically (ak-rō-bat'i-kal-i), adv. In the manner of an acrobat; with acrobatic skill or dexterity.

acrobatism (ak'rō-bat-izm), n. [< acrobat + -ism.] The performance of acrobatic feats; the profession of an acrobat.

Acrobrya (ak-rob'ri-ä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of acrobryus: see acrobryous. Cf. Acramphibrya.] A term used by Endlicher as a class name for plants growing at the apex only; the higher cryptogams: equivalent to acrogens.

acrobryous (ak-rob'ri-us), a. [< NL. acrobryus, < Gr. ἄκρος, at the end, + βρύον, a flower.] In bot., growing at the apex only; of the nature of Acrobrya.

Acrocarpi (ak-rō-kär'pī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of acrocarpus: see acrocarpous.] In bot., a division of the mosses, containing the genera in which the capsule terminates the growth of a central axis.

acrocarpous (ak-rō-kär'pus), a. [< NL. acrocarpus, < Gr. ἀκρόκαρπος, fruiting at the top, < ἄκρος, at the end or top, + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., having the fruit at the end or top of the primary axis: applied to mosses.

The flower of Mosses either terminates the growth of a primary axis (Acrocarpous Mosses), or the . . . flower is placed at the end of an axis of the second or third order (Pleurocarpous Mosses). Sachs, Botany (trans.), p. 319.

acrocephalic (ak″rō-se-fal'ik or ak-rō-sef'a-lik), a. In ethnol., pertaining to or characterized by acrocephaly; high-skulled: as, acrocephalic men or tribes.

acrocephaline (ak-rō-sef'a-lin), a. [< Acrocephalus + -ine.] In ornith., resembling a bird of the genus Acrocephalus in the character of the bill: said of certain warblers. Henry Seebohm.

Acrocephalus (ak-rō-sef'a-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄκρον, here used in the mere sense of point, in ref. to the bill of these birds, + κεφαλή, head.] In ornith., a genus of birds founded by Naumann in 1811 to embrace old-world warblers of the subfamily Sylviinæ; the reed-warblers. It is a well-marked group of 12 or 15 species, distinguished by a comparatively large bill, depressed at base and acute at tip, with moderately developed rictal bristles, a very small spurious first primary, a rounded tail, and more or less uniform brownish plumage. It is related to Phylloscopus, Locustella, Hypolais, etc. A typical species is the aquatic reed-warbler, A. aquaticus. Most of the species of this genus are migratory, and their molt is double. See Calamodyta and reed-warbler.

acrocephaly (ak-rō-sef'a-li), n. [< Gr. ἄκρον, peak, + κεφαλή, head: see cephalic.] A high form of the human skull, due to premature synosteosis of the sagittal and coronal sutures.

Acrocera (ak-ros'e-rä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄκρος, at the top or end, + κέρας, a horn.] A genus of flies, founded by Meigen, having the antennæ on the summit of the forehead, the type of the family Acroceridæ (which see).

Acroceraunian (ak″rō-sē-râ'ni-an), a. [< L. Acroceraunia, < Gr. Ἀκροκεραύνια, n. pl., < ἄκρον, peak, summit, + κεραύνιος, thunder-smitten, < κεραυνός, thunder and lightning.] An epithet applied to certain mountains in the north of Epirus in Greece, projecting into the strait of Otranto.

The thunder-hills of fear,
The Acroceraunian mountains of old name. Byron.

Acroceridæ (ak-rō-ser'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Acrocera + -idæ.] A family of dipterous insects, belonging to the section or suborder Brachycera, having antennæ with few joints, and to the Tetrachætæ, the division of the Brachycera in which the number of pieces composing the haustellum is four. It was established by Leach in 1819, and is typified by the genus Acrocera (which see).

acrochirismus (ak-rō-kī-ris'mus), n. [Gr. ἀκροχειρισμός, wrestling with the hands, < ἀκροχειρίζειν, wrestle with the hands, seize with the hands, < ἀκρόχειρ, later form for ἄκρα χείρ, the (terminal) hand: ἄκρα, fem. of ἄκρος, at the end, terminal, extreme; χείρ, hand.] In Gr. antiq., a kind of wrestling in which the antagonists held each other by the wrists. Also spelled acrocheirismus.

acrochord (ak'rō-kôrd), n. [< Acrochordus, q. v.] A snake of the genus Acrochordus.

acrochordid (ak-rō-kôr'did), n. A snake of the family Acrochordidæ; a wart-snake.

Acrochordidæ (ak-rō-kôr'di-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Acrochordus + -idæ.] A family of viviparous ophidian reptiles of the aglyphodont or colubrine division, which contains ordinary innocuous serpents. The typical genus is Acrochordus, containing A. javanicus, a large, stout-bodied, and very short-tailed serpent of Java, some 8 feet long, the entire body of which is covered with small granular or tubercular scales, not imbricated, as is usual in the order. With its sullen eyes and swollen jaws, it presents a very savage appearance. The family contains two other genera of wart-snakes, Chersydrus and Xenodermus.

acrochordon (ak-rō-kôr'don), n.; pl. acrochordones (-dō-nēz). [L., < Gr. ἀκροχορδών, a wart with a thin neck, < ἄκρον, top, end, + χορδή, a string: see chord.] A small filiform fibromatous outgrowth of the skin, often becoming bulbous at the end; a hanging wart.

Acrochordus (ak-rō-kôr'dus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄκρον, top, end, + χορδή, a string: see acrochordon.] A genus of wart-snakes typifying the family Acrochordidæ (which see). Hornstedt. Also written Acrocordus. Shaw.

Acrocinus (ak-rō-sī'nus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄκρον, end, extremity, + κινεῖν, move.] A genus of longicorn beetles, of the family Cerambycidæ: so called by Illiger from having a movable spine on each side of the thorax. A. longimanus, the harlequin-beetle of South America, is the type. It is 2¼ inches long, with antennæ 5 and fore legs alone 4 inches in length.

acroclinium (ak-rō-klin'i-um), n. [NL. (with ref. to the acutely conical receptacle), < Gr. ἄκρον, top, peak, + κλίνη, couch.] A name used by florists for Helipterum roseum, a composite plant from the Cape of Good Hope. It has immortelle-like flowers, with scarious colored bracts.

Acrocomia (ak-rō-kō'mi-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκρόκομος, with leaves at the top, tufted with leaves, < ἄκρος, at the top, + κόμη, a tuft, hair: see coma[2].] A genus of tropical American palms, allied to the cocoa-palm, with a tall prickly trunk, sometimes swollen in the middle, bearing a tuft of very large pinnate leaves. A. sclerocarpa is widely distributed through South America, and yields a small round fruit with thin, sweetish pulp and an edible kernel. The young leaves are eaten as a vegetable, and a sweet, fragrant oil is extracted from the nuts, which is used as an emollient and in the manufacture of toilet-soaps. See macaw-tree.

acrocyst (ak'rō-sist), n. [< Gr. ἄκρος, at the top, + κύστις, bladder, bag, pouch: see cyst.] In zoöl., an external sac which in some hydroids is formed upon the summit of the gonangium, where it constitutes a receptacle in which the ova pass through some of the earlier stages of their development. Allman.

acrodactylum (ak-rō-dak'ti-lum), n.; pl. acrodactyla (-lä). [NL., < Gr. ἄκρος, at the top, + δάκτυλος, a digit: see dactyl.] In ornith., the upper surface of a bird's toe. [Little used.]

dont lizard; acrodont dentition.—2. Having the characters of Acrodus, or the cestraciont fishes.

Acrodonta (ak-rō-don'tä), n. pl. [NL.: see acrodont.] A name proposed for a group or suborder comprising the cestraciont and related sharks, which have the palato-quadrate apparatus disarticulated from the cranium, the dentigerous portions enlarged, and the mouth inferior. The only living representatives are the heterodontids (Port Jackson shark, etc.), but the extinct forms are numerous.

acrodynia (ak-rō-din'i-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄκρος, at the extremity, + ὀδύνη, pain.] An epidemic disease characterized by disturbances in the alimentary canal (vomiting, colic, diarrhea), by nervous symptoms (especially pain in the extremities), sometimes by cramp or anæsthesia, and by a dermatitis affecting the hands and feet.

acrogen (ak'rō-jen), n. [< Gr. ἄκρος, at the top, + -γενής, -born, produced: see -gen and genus.] An acrogenous plant. The acrogens in the system of Adolphe Brongniart, 1843 (Acrogenæ), form a subdivision of the Cryptogamia, coördinate with the amphigens (Amphigenæ), in which the leaf and stem are differentiated. The group is nearly equivalent to the Embryophyta asiphonogama (Archegoniatæ) of Engler, embracing the two now recognized subkingdoms Bryophyta and Pteridophyta. See these terms, also amphigen. No longer used as a systematic term of plant classification.—The age of acrogens, in geol., the Carboniferous era, when acrogens were the characteristic vegetable forms.

acrogenic (ak-rō-jen'ik), a. Relating or pertaining to the acrogens.

That, under fit conditions, an analogous mode of growth will occur in fronds of the acrogenic type, . . . is shown by the case of Jungermannia furcata.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 194.

acrogenous (a-kroj'e-nus), a. [As acrogen + -ous.] Increasing by growth at the summit or by terminal buds only, as the ferns and mosses; of the nature of or pertaining to acrogens.

acrography (a-krog'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. ἄκρος, at the top, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write: see graphic.] A process for producing designs in relief on metal or stone through a ground of finely powdered chalk, solidified by hydraulic pressure into a compact mass. A design is drawn on the slightly shining white surface with a finely pointed brush charged with a glutinous ink, which, wherever it is applied, unites the particles of chalk so firmly that they remain standing in black ridges after the intermediate white spaces have been rubbed away with a piece of velvet or a light brush. If the plate, which has then the appearance of an engraved wood block, is dipped in a solution of silica, a stereotype cast or an electrotype copy can be taken from it to be used for printing with type.

acroket, prep. phr. as adv. A Middle English form of acrook.

acrolein (a-krō'lē-in), n. [< L. acris, sharp, pungent (see acrid), + olēre, smell, + -in.] A colorless limpid liquid, CH_2CHCOH, having a disagreeable and intensely irritating odor, such as that noticeable after the flame of a candle has been extinguished and while the wick still glows. It is the aldehyde of the allyl series, and is obtained by distilling glycerin to which acid potassium sulphate or strong phosphoric acid has been added, also by the dry distillation of fatty bodies. It burns with a clear, luminous flame.

acrolith (ak'rō-lith), n. [< L. acrolithus, < Gr. ἀκρόλιθος, with the ends made of stone, < ἄκρος, extreme, at the end, + λίθος, a stone.] In Gr. antiq., a sculptured figure of which only the head and extremities were carved in stone, the rest being generally of wood, and covered with either textile drapery or thin plates of metal. The name was also applied to figures of ordinary stone of which the heads and extremities were formed of marble, as in some of the well-known metopes of Selinus, Sicily.

acrolithan (a-krol'i-than), a. Same as acrolithic.

acrolithic (ak-rō-lith'ik), a. Of the nature of an acrolith; formed like an acrolith: as, an acrolithic statue.

acrologic (ak-rō-loj'ik), a. [< acrology + -ic.] Pertaining to acrology; founded on or using initials; using a sign primarily representing a word to denote its initial letter or sound: as, acrologic notation; acrologic names.

The twenty-two names [of the Semitic letters] are acrologic; that is, the name of each letter begins with that letter.
Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 167.

acrological (ak-rō-loj'i-kal), a. Same as acrologic.

acrologically (ak-rō-loj'i-kal-i), adv. In an acrologic manner; by means of acrology. Isaac Taylor.

acrology (a-krol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. ἄκρος, at the end, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The use of a picture of some object to represent alphabetically the first part (letter or syllable) of the name of that object. See acrophony.

A polysyllabic language did not lend itself so readily as the Chinese to this solution. According to Halévy, the difficulty [of effecting the transition from ideograms to phonograms] was overcome by the adoption of the powerful principle of Acrology.
Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 43.

acrometer (a-krom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. ἄκρος, at the top, + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for indicating the specific gravity of oil. See oleometer.

acromia, n. Plural of acromion.

acromial (a-krō'mi-al), a. [< acromion.] In anat., relating to the acromion.—Acromial process. See acromion.—Acromial thoracic artery. See acromiothoracic.

acromioclavicular (a-krō″mi-ō-kla-vik'ū-lär), a. [< NL. acromion + clavicula, clavicle.] Pertaining to the acromion and the clavicle.—Acromioclavicular articulation, the joint between the collar-bone and the shoulder-blade.—Acromioclavicular ligaments, superior and inferior, two fibrous bands which join the acromion and the clavicle.

acromiodeltoideus (a-krō″mi-ō-del-toi'dē-us), n.; pl. acromiodeltoidei (-ī). [NL., < acromion + Gr. δελτοειδής, deltoid.] A muscle of some animals, extending from the acromion to the deltoid ridge of the humerus, corresponding to an acromial part of the human deltoid muscle.

acromion (a-krō'mi-on), n.; pl. acromia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. ἀκρώμιον, a by-form of ἀκρωμία, the point of the shoulder-blade, < ἄκρος, at the top or end, + ὦμος, the shoulder with the upper arm, akin to L. ūmerus: see humerus.] In anat., the distal end of the spine of the scapula or shoulder-blade. In man it is an enlarged process, which, originating by an independent center of ossification, articulates with the distal end of the clavicle, and gives attachment to part of the deltoid and trapezius muscles: commonly called the acromial process, or acromion process. Its relations are the same in other mammals which have perfect clavicles. See cut under scapula.

The acromion process . . . forms the summit of the shoulder.
Quain, Anatomy, I. 37.

acromiothoracic (a-krō″mi-ō-thō-ras'ik), a. [< Gr. ἀκρώμιον, shoulder, + θώραξ (θωρακ-), thorax.] Pertaining to the shoulder and thorax.—Acromiothoracic artery, a branch of the axillary artery, supplying parts about the shoulder and breast.

acromiotrapezius (a-krō″mi-ō-tra-pē'zi-us), n.; pl. acromiotrapezii (-ī). [NL., < acromion + trapezius.] An intermediate cervical portion of the trapezius muscle, in special relation with the spine of the scapula and the acromion, forming a nearly distinct muscle in some animals.

acromonogrammatic (ak″rō-mon″ō-gra-mat'-ik), a. and n. [< Gr. ἄκρος, at the end, + μονο-γράμματος, consisting of one letter: see monogrammatic.] A term applied to a poetical composition in which every verse begins with the same letter as that with which the preceding verse ends.

Acromyodi (ak″rō-mi-ō'dī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἄκρος, at the end, + μῦς, muscle, + ᾠδή, song.] A suborder or superfamily of passerine birds, embracing the Oscines, or singing birds proper, and characterized by having the several intrinsic syringeal muscles attached to the ends of the upper bronchial half-rings: opposed to Mesomyodi. The great majority of the Passeres are Acromyodi. [The word is also used as an adjective in the expression Passeres acromyodi, equivalent to acromyodian Passeres.] acromyodian (ak″rō-mi-ō'di-an), a. and n. [< Acromyodi.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Acromyodi; having that arrangement of the muscles of the syrinx which characterizes the Acromyodi: as, an acromyodian bird.

II. n. One of the Acromyodi.

acromyodic (ak″rō-mi-od'ik), a. [< Acromyodi.] Same as acromyodian.

acromyodous (ak-rō-mī'ō-dus), a. Same as acromyodian.

acronarcotic (ak″rō-när-kot'ik), a. and n. [< L. acris, sharp, pungent (see acrid), + narcotic.]

I. a. Acting as an irritant and a narcotic.

II. n. One of a class of poisons, chiefly of vegetable origin, which irritate and inflame the parts to which they are applied, and act on the brain and spinal cord, producing stupor, coma, paralysis, and convulsions. Also called narcotico-acrid or narcotico-irritant.

acronic, acronical, a. See acronychal.

acronotine (ak-rō-nō'tin), a. [< Acronotus.] In zoöl., pertaining to the subgenus Acronotus.

Acronotus (ak-rō-nō'tus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄκρον, the highest point, + νῶτος, back.] 1. A subgenus of ruminating animals found in Africa. Damalis (Acronotus) bubalus is the type. Ham. Smith, 1827.—2. A genus of beetles.

Acronuridæ (ak-rō-nū'ri-dē), n. pl. [< Acronurus + -idæ.] A family of spiny-finned fishes, referred by Günther to his Acanthopterygii cottoscombriformes, having one dorsal with several spongy spines anteriorly, one or more bony spines on each side of the tail, and the teeth compressed, truncate or lobate, and closely set in a single series. The species are known as barberfish and surgeons. The family is also called Acanthuridæ and Teuthididæ. See these words.

Acronurus (ak-rō-nū'rus), n. [NL., appar. irreg. < Gr. ἄκρον, extremity, + οὐρά, tail.] A former generic name of small fishes now known to be the young of species of Acanthurus (which see).

acronych (a-kron'ik), a. [Also written acronyc, acronic, and achronic, by confusion with adjectives in -ic and with chronic and Gr. χρόνος, time; = F. acronyque = Sp. acronicto, acrónico = Pg. acronico, achronico = It. acronico, < Gr. ἀκρόνυχος, also ἀκρόνυκτος and ἀκρονύκτιος, at nightfall, < ἄκρος, at the end or edge, + νύξ (νυκτ-) = E. night.] Same as acronychal.

acronychal (a-kron'i-kal), a. [Also written acronycal, acronical, etc., as acronych; < acronych + -al.] In astron., occurring at sunset: as, the acronychal rising or setting of a star: opposed to cosmical.—Acronychal place or observation, the place or observation of a planet at its opposition: so called because in an early state of astronomy the opposition of a planet was known by its acronychal rising.

acronychally (a-kron'i-kal-i), adv. In an acronychal manner; at sunset. A star is said to rise and set acronychally when it rises or sets as the sun sets.

acronyctous (ak-rō-nik'tus), a. [< Gr. ἀκρόνυκτος: see acronych.] Same as acronychal.

acrook (a-krůk'), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< ME. acroke, < a[3], prep., on, + croke, crook.] Awry; crookedly. [Now rare.]

Humbre renneth fyrst a crook out of the south side of York.
Caxton, Descr. Britain, p. 12.

This gear goth acrook.
Udall, Roister Doister, iv. 3.

Libertie ys thing that women loke,
And truly els the mater is acroke.
Court of Love, l. 378.

acropetal (ak-rop'e-tal), a. [< Gr. ἄκρον, the top, + L. petere, seek. Cf. centripetal.] In bot., developing from below upward, or from the base toward the apex; basifugal.

acropetally (ak-rop'e-tal-i), adv. In an acropetal manner.

The lateral shoots which normally arise below the growing apex of a mother-shoot are always arranged acropetally, like the leaves.
Sachs, Botany (trans.), p. 152.

acrophonetic (ak″rō-phō-net'ik), a. [< acrophony, after phonetic.] Pertaining to acrophony (which see).

acrophony (a-krof'ō-ni), n. [< Gr. ἄκρος, at the end, + -φωνία, < φωνή, sound.] In the development of alphabetic writing, the use of a symbolic picture of an object or idea to represent phonetically the initial syllable, or the initial sound, of the name of that object or idea; as in giving to the Egyptian hieroglyph for nefer, good, the phonetic value of ne, its first syllable, or of n, its first letter. See acrology.

acropodium (ak-rō-pō'di-um), n.; pl. acropodia (-ä). [< Gr. ἄκρος, at the top, + πόδιον, dim. of πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] 1. In zoöl., the upper surface of the whole foot. Brande.—2. In ornith., sometimes used as synonymous with ac- rodactylum. [Little used in either of these two senses.] —3. In art, an elevated pedestal bearing a statue, particularly if raised from the substructure on supports or feet; the plinth of a statue or other work of art, if resting on feet. Ed. Guillaume.

acropolis (a-krop′ō-lis), n. [L., < Gr. ἀκρόπολις, the upper city, < ἄκρος, highest, upper, + πόλις, a city: see police.] The citadel of a Grecian city, usually the site of the original settlement, and situated on an eminence commanding the surrounding country. When the city spread beyond its earlier limits, the acropolis was generally cleared of its inhabitants and held sacred to the divinities of the state, whose temples were upon it. The acropolis of Athens contained the most splendid productions of Greek art, the Parthenon, the Erechtheum, and the Propylæa.

acrosarcum (ak-rō-sär′kum), n.; pl. acrosarca (-kä). [NL., < Gr. ἄκρος, at the end, + σάρξ (σαρκ-), flesh.] A name given by Desvaux to a berry resulting from an ovary with adnate calyx, as in the currant and cranberry.

Acrosaurus (ak-rō-sâ′rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄκρος, extreme, + σαῦρος, a lizard: see Saurus.] A rhynchocephalan reptile, having 30 or 40 teeth and a broad cheek-bone process, which occurs in the Jurassic limestones of Bavaria.

Acrosoma (ak-rō-sō′mä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄκρον, top, peak, extremity, + σῶμα, body.] A genus of orbitelarian spiders of the family Epeiridæ (or Gastracanthidæ), having the sides of the abdomen prolonged into immense horns, whence the name. It is a tropical genus with many species.

acrospire (ak′rō-spīr), n. [Formerly aker-, ackerspire; < Gr. ἄκρος, at the top, + σπεῖρα, a coil, spire, > L. spira, > E. spire, q. v.] The first leaf which rises above the ground in the germination of grain; also the rudimentary stem or first leaf which appears in malted grain; the developed plumule of the seed.

acrospire (ak′rō-spīr), v. i.; pret. and pp. acrospired, ppr. acrospiring. [Formerly aker-, ackerspire; from the noun.] To throw out the first leaf; sprout.

acrospired (ak′rō-spīrd), p. a. Having or exhibiting the acrospire: especially, in malt-making, applied to the grains of barley which have sprouted so far as to exhibit the blade or plumule-end, together with the root or radicle.

acrospore (ak′rō-spōr), n. [< Gr. ἄκρος, at the end, + σπορά, seed: see spore.] In bot., a spore borne at the ends of erect simple or branching filaments of the mycelium in certain fungi, as those of the genus Peronospora. The term is also applied generally to the reproductive organs of fungi when they are developed at the apex of the mother cell or sporophore.

acrosporous (a-kros′pō-rus), a. Having spores naked and produced at the tips of cells: applied to one of the two modes in which fruit is formed in fungi. For the other method see ascigerous.

across (a-krôs′), prep. phr. as adv. and prep. [< late ME. acros (also in cross, and in maner of a cros); < a[3] + cross.] I. adv. 1. From side to side; in a crossing or crossed manner; crosswise.

Who calls me villain? breaks my pate across?
Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2.

With arms across,
He stood reflecting on his country's loss. Dryden.

[In the exclamation, "Good faith, across!" Shak., All's Well, ii. 1, the allusion is to striking an adversary crosswise with the spear in tilting instead of by thrusting, the former being considered disgraceful.]

2. From one side to another; transversely; in a transverse line: as, what is the distance across? I came across in a steamer.

At a descent into it [cavern of Vaucluse] of thirty or forty feet from the brink where we stood was a pool of water, perhaps thirty feet across.
C. D. Warner, Roundabout Journey, ii.

3. Adversely; contrarily: as, "things go across," Mir. for Mags., p. 344.—To break across, in tilting, to allow one's spear by awkwardness to be broken across the body of one's adversary, instead of by the push of the point.

One said he brake across. Sir P. Sidney.

II. prep. 1. From side to side of, as opposed to along, which is in the direction of the length; athwart; quite over: as, a bridge is laid across a river.

[The boys] will go down on one side of the yacht . . . and bob up on the other, almost before you have time to run across the deck. Lady Brassey, Voyage of Sunbeam, I. ii.

2. Transverse to the length of; so as to intersect at any angle: as, a line passing across another.—3. Beyond; on the other side of.

O love, we two shall go no longer
To lands of summer across the sea.
Tennyson, Daisy.

Across lots, by the shortest way; by a short cut. [Colloq.] —To come across, to meet or fall in with.

If I come across a real thinker, . . . I enjoy the luxury of sitting still for a while as much as another.
O. W. Holmes, The Professor, i.

acrostic[1] (a-kros′tik), n. and a. [= F. acrostiche = Sp. Pg. It. acrostico, < Gr. ἀκροστίχιον, ἀκροστιχίς, an acrostic, < ἄκρος, at the end, + στίχος, row, order, line, < στείχειν (√ *στιχ), go, walk, march, go in line or order, = AS. stīgan, E. sty[2], go up. The second element would prop. be -stich, as in distich; it has been assimilated to the common suffix -ic.] I. n. 1. A composition in verse, in which the first, or the first and last, or certain other letters of the lines, taken in order, form a name, title, motto, the order of the alphabet, etc.—2. A Hebrew poem in which the initial letters of the lines or stanzas were made to run over the letters of the alphabet in their order. Several of the Psalms are of this character, of which Psalm cxix. is the best example.

II. a. Pertaining to, of the nature of, or containing an acrostic: as, acrostic verses.

acrostic[2]† (a-kros′tik), a. [< across (crossed, crost), confused with acrostic[1].] Crossed; folded across; crossing. [Rare.]

But what melancholy sir, with acrostic arms, now comes? Middleton, Family of Love, iv. 4.

acrostical (a-kros′ti-kal), a. Same as acrostic[1]. [Rare or unused.]

acrostically (a-kros′ti-kal-i), adv. In the manner of an acrostic.

acrosticism (a-kros′ti-sizm), n. [< acrostic[1] + -ism.] Acrostic arrangement or character.

acrostolium (ak-rō-stō′li-um), n.; pl. acrostolia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. ἀκροστόλιον, defined as the same as ἀφλαστον, L. aplustre, which, however, referred to the stern of a ship (see aplustre); also the gunwale of a ship, prop: the extremity of the ship's beak; < ἄκρος, at the end, + στόλος, a ship's beak, an appendage, prop. armament, equipment, < στέλλειν, arrange, equip.] An ornament, often gracefully curved and elaborately carved, surmounting the bows of ancient ships. These ornaments frequently figured among trophies, as it was customary for the victor in a naval combat to take them from the captured ships.

Acrostolium.

acrotarsial (ak-rō-tär′si-al), a. Of or pertaining to the acrotarsium.

acrotarsium (ak-rō-tär′si-um), n.; pl. acrotarsia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. ἄκρος, at the top, + ταρσός, the sole of the foot: see tarsus.] 1. In zoöl., the upper surface of the tarsus; the instep of the foot.—2. In ornith., the front of the tarsometatarsus, this segment of the limb being called tarsus in ordinary descriptive ornithology. [The terms acropodium, acrotarsium, and acrodactylum have varying senses with different writers, or as applied to different animals; properly, the first of these covers the other two, as a whole includes the parts of which it consists. They are little used in any sense. See tarsus.] acroteleutic (ak″rō-te-lū′tik), n. [< Gr. ἀκροτελεύτιον, the tag-end, esp. of a verse or poem, < ἄκρος, extreme, + τελευτή, end.] Eccles., anything added to the end of a psalm or hymn, as a doxology.

acroter (ak′rō-tėr), n. Same as acroterium.

acroteral (ak-rō-tē′ral), a. Same as acroterial.

acroteria, n. Plural of acroterium.

acroterial (ak-rō-tē′ri-al), a. [< acroterium.] Pertaining to an acroterium: as, acroterial ornaments. An equivalent form is acroteral.

acryl (ak′ril), n. [< acr(olein) + -yl.] In chem., a hypothetical radical (CH_2:CH.CO) of which acrylic acid is the hydrate.

acrylic (a-kril′ik), a. [< acryl + -ic.] Of or pertaining to acryl.—Acrylic acid, CH_2:CH.COOH, a pungent, agreeably smelling liquid, produced by the oxidation of acrolein. This acid is monobasic, and its salts are very soluble in water.

Acryllium (a-kril′i-um), n. [NL., appar. < Gr. ἄκρον, extremity (with ref. to the pointed tail), + dim. term. -ὑλλιον.] A notable genus of guinea-fowls, family Numididæ. The only species is A. vulturinum of Africa, having the head and upper part of the neck nearly naked, the fore part of the body covered with elongated lanceolate feathers, and the tail pointed with long acute central rectrices. The genus was founded by G. R. Gray in 1840.

act (akt), n. [< ME. act = F. acte = Sp. Pg. auto and acto = It. atto; partly (a) < L. actum (pl. acta), a thing done, esp. a public transaction, prop. neut. of actus, pp. of agere, do; and partly (b) < L. actus (pl. actūs), n., the doing of a thing, performance, action, division of a play, < agere, lead, drive, impel, move, cause, make, perform, do, = Gr. ἀγειν, lead, drive, do, = Icel.

aka, drive, = Skt. √ aj, drive. Hence (from L. agere), exact, redact, transact, cogent, exigent, agile, agitate, cogitate, etc.; see also ake = ache[1], acre, acorn, agrarian, agriculture, etc.] 1. An exertion of energy or force, physical or mental; anything that is done or performed; a doing or deed; an operation or performance.

Illustrious acts high raptures do infuse. Waller.
Nor deem that acts heroic wait on chance.
Lowell, Three Mem. Poems.

2. A state of real existence, as opposed to a possibility, power, or being in germ merely; actuality; actualization; entelechy. [Translation of the Greek ἐνέργεια and ἐντελέχεια.] The soul, according to the Aristotelians, is the act, that is, is the entelechy or perfect development of the body. So God is said to be pure act, for Aristotle says, "There must be a principle whose essence it is to be actual (ἧς ἡ οὐσία ἐνέργεια)," and this is by many writers understood to mean "whose essence is to be active." In the phrase in act, therefore, act, though properly meaning actuality, is often used to mean activity.

The seeds of plants are not at first in act, but in possibility, what they afterwards grow to be. Hooker.

3. A part or division of a play performed consecutively or without a fall of the curtain, in which a definite and coherent portion of the plot is represented: generally subdivided into smaller portions, called scenes.—4. The result of public deliberation, or the decision of a prince, legislative body, council, court of justice, or magistrate; a decree, edict, law, statute, judgment, resolve, or award: as, an act of Parliament or of Congress; also, in plural, proceedings; the formal record of legislative resolves or of the doings of individuals. Acts are of two kinds: (1) general or public, which are of general application; and (2) private, which relate to particular persons or concerns. A law or statute proposed in a legislative body, then called a bill, becomes an act after having been passed by both branches and signed by the chief executive officer; but in a few of the United States the governor's signature is not necessary. British acts are usually referred to by mentioning them simply by the regnal year and number of chapter: as, act of 7 and 8 Vict. c. 32. American acts, particularly acts of Congress, are often referred to simply by date: as, act of May 6, 1882.

5. In universities, a public disputation or lecture required of a candidate for a degree of master. The performer is said to "keep the act." Hence, at Cambridge, the thesis and examination for the degree of doctor; at Oxford, the occasion of the completion of degrees. So, act holiday, act feast. The candidate who keeps the act is also himself called the act. In medieval, and sometimes in modern scholastic use, any public defense of a thesis by way of disputation is called an act.

Such that expect to proceed Masters of Arts to exhibit their synopsis of acts required by the laws of the College.
Orders of Overseers of Harvard College, 1650.

[Such a synopsis (cedula), stating the time of studies, the acts made, and the degrees taken by the candidate, and duly sworn to, had usually been required in universities since the middle ages.]

I pass therefore to the statute which ordains a public act to be kept each year. This is now in a manner quite worn out, for of late there has not been a public act above once in ten or twelve years; . . . the last one we had was upon the glorious peace of 1712.
Amhurst, Terræ Filius (1721), No. xlvii.

6. In law, an instrument or deed in writing, serving to prove the truth of some bargain or transaction: as, I deliver this as my act and deed. The term is used to show the connection between the instrument and the party who has given it validity by his signature or by his legal assent; when thus perfected, the instrument becomes the act of the parties who have signed it or assented to it in a form required by law. Edw. Livingston.

Acts having a legal validity are everywhere reduced to certain forms; a certain number of witnesses is required to prove them, a certain magistrate to authenticate them.
Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, § 75.

7. In theol., something done at once and once for all, as distinguished from a work. Thus, justification is said to be an act of God's free grace, but sanctification is a work carried on through life.—In the act, in the actual performance or commission: said especially of persons who are caught when engaged in some misdeed.

This woman was taken in adultery, in the very act.
John viii. 4.

In act to, prepared or ready to; on the very point: implying a certain bodily disposition or posture: as, in act to strike.

Gathering his flowing robe, he seemed to stand
In act to speak, and graceful stretched his hand. Pope.
Shot sidelong glances at us, a tiger-cat
In act to spring. Tennyson, Princess, ii.

Act of bankruptcy. See bankruptcy.—Act of faith, auto de fe (which see).—Act of God, in law, a direct, violent, sudden, and overwhelming action of natural forces, such as could not by human ability have been foreseen, or, if foreseen, could not by human care and skill have been resisted. It is a good defense to an action for non-performance of a contract; and, in general, no man is held legally responsible for injuries of which such act of God was directly the cause, except by special agreement.—Act of grace, a term sometimes applied to a general pardon, or the granting or extension of some privilege, at the beginning of a new reign, the coming of age or the marriage of the sovereign, etc.—Act of honor, an instrument drawn by a notary public after protest of a bill of exchange, whereby a third party agrees to pay or accept the bill for the honor of any party thereto.—Act of indemnity. See indemnity.—Act in pais, a judicial act performed out of court and not recorded. See pais.—Act's breakfast, an entertainment which from early times has been given by a candidate for a university degree on the day of his making his act. The act for master or doctor of theology frequently impoverished the candidate for life.—Acts of the Apostles, the title of the fifth book of the New Testament. See acta.—Acts of faith, hope, charity, and contrition, forms of prayer in common use in the Roman Catholic Church, expressive of the internal exercise of the virtues named.—Acts of the Martyrs. See acta.—Acts of Uniformity, three acts for the regulation of public worship passed in England in 1549, 1559, and 1662, obliging all clergy, in the conduct of public services, to use only the Book of Common Prayer.—Act term, the last term of the university year.—Baines's Act. (a) An English statute of 1848, treating accessories before the fact in felonies like principals, and permitting separate prosecution of accessories after the fact. (b) An English statute of 1849, relating to appeals to the quarter sessions.—Bank Charter Act. See Bank Act, under bank.—Berkeley's Act, an English statute of 1855 prohibiting the sale of beer, wine, and liquor on Sundays and holidays between 3 and 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and from 11 o'clock at night to 4 o'clock the next morning.—Black Act, an English statute of 1722 (9 Geo. I. c. 22), so called because designed originally to suppress associations of the lawless persons calling themselves "blacks." It made felonies certain crimes against the game laws, sending anonymous letters, demanding money, and similar offenses.—Black acts, the acts of the Scottish Parliament during the reigns of the first five Jameses, Mary, and James VI., down to 1586 or 1587. They were so called from the circumstance of their being written in the Old English character, called black letter.—Bovill's Act. (a) An English statute of 1860 simplifying proceedings in petitions of right. Also known as Sir William Bovill's Act, and as the Petitions of Rights Act, 1860. (b) An English statute of 1865, also known as Chief Justice Bovill's Act, abolishing the rule by which creditors could hold liable as a partner any one who had participated in the profits of a business as profits, irrespective of the intent of the parties.—Burke's Act. (a) An English statute of 1782 abolishing certain offices and otherwise affecting the civil establishment. (b) An English statute of 1773, known also as one of the corn laws; it was one of the first steps toward free trade.—Burr Act, a statute of Ohio, of 1806, directed against the treasonable acts of Aaron Burr on the Ohio river. It was in force for one year only, and authorized the arrest and punishment of all persons fitting out or arming vessels, or enlisting soldiers, etc., within the State of Ohio to disturb the peace of the United States.—Chinese Act, or Chinese Restriction Act, an act of the United States Congress of 1882, amended in 1884, suspending for ten years the immigration of Chinese into the United States. In 1892 and again in 1904 its main provisions were re-enacted.—Complete act, in metaph., that act of a thing to which nothing of the nature of the thing is wanting, as the act of a substance in respect to possessing its attributes. Aquinas.—Coventry Act, an English statute of 1671 against maiming: so called because passed on the occasion of an assault on Sir John Coventry, M. P.—Dingley Act, an act of Congress of 1884, to foster the shipping trade of the United States.—Edmunds Act, an act of Congress of March 22, 1882, punishing polygamy.—Elicit act, an act of the will itself, as distinguished from an imperate act, which is some movement of the body or the soul consequent upon the act of the will. Aquinas.—Essential act, in metaph., that act which is at the same time essence. Scotus.—First act. See energy.—Hinde Palmer's Act, an English statute of 1869 abolishing the preference which the common law gave to the payment of specialty debts over simple contract debts, in settling the estates of deceased persons.—Hogarth's Act, an English statute of 1766 which secured the property in engravings, prints, etc., to their designers or inventors, and to the widow of William Hogarth the property in his works.—Immanent act, one which remains within the agent, and does not consist in an effect produced on something else.—Imperate act. See elicit act.—Informant act, in metaph., the perfection of passive or subjective power; that act by which matter receives a quality or form in the Aristotelian sense.—Jekyll's Act, an English statute of 1736 directed against the sale of spirituous liquors.—Lands' Clauses Act, an English statute of 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 18) regulating the taking of private property for public use by corporations, etc.—Leeman's Act, an English statute (30 Vict. c. 29) declaring contracts for sale of stocks void, unless the numbering of the shares or certificates, or the name of a registered owner, be specified in writing.—Lord Aberdeen's Act, an English statute of 1845 carrying into effect a treaty with Brazil for the regulation and final abolition of the slave-trade.—Lord Campbell's Act. (a) An English statute of 1846 allowing the relatives of a person whose death has been caused by negligence or wrongful act to recover damages therefor. The principle of this act has been generally adopted in the United States by statutes allowing the executor or administrator to sue and recover damages in such a case for the benefit of the wife, husband, or next of kin. (b) An English statute of 1843 as to defamation. (c) An English statute of 1838 as to obscene publications.—Lord Cranworth's Act. (a) An English statute of 1860 giving to mortgagees and trustees certain general powers, such as are commonly provided in settlements, mortgages, and wills, in aid of their rights or duties. (b) An English statute of 1860 as to endowed schools.—Lord Denman's Act, an English statute of 1843 (6 and 7 Vict. c. 85) abolishing common-law rules that excluded witnesses from testifying by reason of interest or crime.—Lord Ellenborough's Act, an English statute (43 Geo. III. c. 58) punishing offenses against the person.—Lord Lyndhurst's Act. (a) An English statute of 1835 invalidating marriages within the prohibited degrees. (b) An English statute of 1844 for conserving the property of dissenting congregations to the uses of the faith originally intended, by making 25 years' usage evidence thereof in the absence of a controlling declaration in the deed or instrument of trust. This act is known also as the Dissenters' Chapels Act.—Lord St. Leonard's Acts, English statutes (22 and 23 Vict. c. 35, and 23 and 24 Vict. c. 38) amending the law of property, relieving trustees, etc.—Lord Tenterden's Act. (a) An English statute of 1828 by which new promises relied on to revive a debt which is statute-barred, or to ratify one contracted in infancy, were required to be in writing and signed. (b) An English statute of 1833 shortening the time prescribed by the statute of limitations in certain cases.—Parliament Act, an English statute of 1911 restricting the existing powers of the House of Lords and substituting 5 for 7 years as the time fixed for the maximum duration of Parliament. It provided that money bills should become laws without the consent of the Lords, and that all other bills should become laws, even though rejected by the Lords, if passed by the Commons in three successive sessions within a minimum period of years.—Riddleberger Act, a Virginia statute of 1882 attempting to reduce the bonded debt and interest thereon of that State, on the ground that the State of West Virginia, which had been carved out of Virginia, ought to pay a certain proportion of the debt.—Second act. See energy.—Sherman Act, an act of Congress of July 14, 1890, directing the secretary of the treasury to purchase monthly 4,500,000 ounces of fine silver bullion, or so much thereof as might be offered, at the market rate, not to exceed $1.00 for 371¼ grains of fine silver. Repealed in 1893.—Sir Robert Peel's Act. See Bank Act, under bank.—Stilwell Act, a New York statute of 1831, abolishing imprisonment for debt, except in cases of fraud or tort, and giving proceedings for punishment of fraudulent debtors.—The Lords' Act, an English statute of 1759 (32 Geo. II. c. 28) to relieve insolvent debtors from imprisonment.—The Six Acts, English statutes of 1819 restricting the rights of public assembly and military organization, and the freedom of the press.—Tilden Act, a New York statute of 1875, otherwise known as the Peculation Act, giving a civil remedy to the State for malversation by municipal or county officers as well as state officers.—Transient act, one which consists in the production of an effect upon an object different from the subject.—Yazoo Frauds Act, the name given to a statute of Georgia, of 1795, for the sale of a vast tract of public lands, comprising the present State of Mississippi and one half of Alabama, to private persons. It was declared by a statute of the next year to be null and void, as having been fraudulently enacted. (For noted acts on particular subjects, such as the Army Act, Bankruptcy Act, etc., see the qualifying word or words. See also article, bill, by-law, charter, code, decree, edict, law, ordinance, petition, provision, statute.)—Syn. 1. Action, Act, Deed. See action.

act (akt), v. [< L. actus, pp. of agere, lead, drive, impel, cause, make, perform, do: see act, n.] I. trans. 1. To do, perform, or transact.

Thou wast a spirit too delicate
To act her earthy and abhorr'd commands.
Shak., Tempest, i. 2.

2. To represent by action; perform on or as on the stage; play, or play the part of; hence, feign or counterfeit: as, to act Macbeth; to act the lover, or the part of a lover.

With acted fear the villain thus pursued. Dryden.

3. To perform the office of; assume the character of: as, to act the hero.—4†. To put in action; actuate.

Self-love, the spring of motion, acts the soul.
Pope, Essay on Man, ii. 59.

What spirit acted the party that raised this persecution, one may guess. C. Mather, Mag. Chris., Int., iii.

II. intrans. To do something; exert energy or force in any way: used of anything capable of movement, either original or communicated, or of producing effects. Specifically—1. To put forth effort or energy; exercise movement or agency; be employed or operative: as, to act vigorously or languidly; he is acting against his own interest; his mind acts sluggishly.

He hangs between; in doubt to act, or rest.
Pope, Essay on Man, ii. 7.

Act, act in the living Present!
Longfellow, Psalm of Life.

You can distinguish between individual people to such an extent that you have a general idea of how a given person will act when placed in given circumstances.
W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 76.

2. To exert influence or produce effects; perform a function or functions; operate: as, praise acts as a stimulant; mind acts upon mind; the medicine failed to act; the brake refused to act, or to act upon the wheels.

How body acts upon the impassive mind.
Garth, Dispensary.

Man acting on man by weight of opinion.
Emerson, Civilization.

3. To be employed or operate in a particular way; perform specific duties or functions: as, a deputy acts for or in place of his principal; he refused to act on or as a member of the committee. Often used with reference to the performance of duties by a temporary substitute for the regular incumbent of an office: as, the lieutenant-governor will act in the absence of the governor. See acting.

4. To perform as an actor; represent a character; hence, to feign or assume a part: as, he acts well; he is only acting.—To act on, to act in accordance with; regulate one's action by: as, to act on the principle of the golden rule; to act on a false assumption.—To act up to, to equal in action; perform an action or a series of actions correspondent to; fulfil: as, he has acted up to his engagement.

He is a man of sentiment, and acts up to the sentiments he professes. Sheridan, School for Scandal, i. 2.

=Syn. Act, Work, Operate. These words agree in expressing the successful exertion of power. In their intransitive use they are sometimes interchangeable: as, a medicine acts, works, or operates; a plan works or operates. Where they differ, act may more often refer to a single action or to the simpler forms of action: as, a machine works well when all its parts act. Act may also be the most general, applying to persons or things, the others applying generally to things. Operate may express the more elaborate forms of action. Work may express the more powerful kinds of action: as, it worked upon his mind.

acta (ak'tä), n. pl. [L., pl. of actum: see act, n.] 1. Acts. Specifically—2. Proceedings in a legal or an ecclesiastical court, or minutes of such proceedings.—Acta (or Actus) Apostolorum (Acts of the Apostles), the title in the Vulgate of the fifth book of the New Testament.—Acta Martyrum (Acts of the Martyrs), contemporary accounts of the early Christian martyrdoms, from judicial registers or reports of eye-witnesses, or as drawn up by the ecclesiastical notaries; specifically, the critical edition of such acts by the Benedictine Ruinart, first published in 1689, and the additional collections by the Orientalist Stephen Assemani, in 1748.—Acta Sanctorum (Acts of the Saints), a name applied generally to all collections of accounts of saints and martyrs, both of the Roman and Greek churches; specifically, the name of a work begun by the Bollandists, a society of Jesuits, in 1643, and not yet completed in 1910. It now consists of sixty-four folio volumes, including an index published in 1875. Analecta are also being published.

actable (ak'ta-bl), a. [< act + -able.] Practically possible; performable; capable of being acted.

> Is naked truth actable in true life?
> Tennyson, Harold, iii. 1.
> Mr. Browning set himself to the composition of another actable play. The Century, XXIII. 199.

Actæa (ak-tē'ä), n. [L., herb-christopher, from the resemblance of the leaves to those of the elder, < Gr. ἀκταία, erroneous form of ἀκτέα, contr. ἀκτή, the elder-tree.] A genus of herbs, of the family Ranunculaceæ, with somewhat deleterious properties. The old-world species, A. spicata, the baneberry or herb-christopher, has black berries. The common form of eastern North America with red berries is A. rubra, and the white-berried species of the same region is A. alba. In the Atlantic States these are known as red and white cohosh or baneberry.

Red Baneberry (Actæa rubra), showing flowering plant and fruiting raceme.

Actæon (ak-tē'ọn), n. [L., < Gr. Ἀκταίων, in myth., a grandson of Cadmus, who, having come accidentally upon Diana bathing, was changed by her into a stag, and then torn to pieces by his own dogs. Cf. ἀκταῖος, on the coast, < ἀκτή, a coast, headland, edge.] 1. The representative genus of the molluscan family Actæonidæ. Originally written Acteon. Montfort, 1810. Also Tornatella.—2. A genus of abranchiate gastropodous mollusks, of the family Elysiidæ (which see): a synonym of Elysia. Oken, 1815.

Actæonella (ak-tē-ō-nel'ä), n. [NL., < Actæon + -ella.] A genus of opisthobranchiate gastropods, abundant in the Cretaceous, with thick conoid or convoluted shell, short or concealed spire, long narrow aperture, and the columella with three regular spiral plaits in front. Originally written Acteonella.

actæonellid (ak-tē-ō-nel'id), n. A gastropod of the family Actæonellidæ.

Actæonellidæ (ak-tē-ō-nel'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Actæonella + -idæ.] A family of gastropods, taking name from the genus Actæonella (which see).

actæonid (ak-tē'ọn-id), n. A gastropod of the family Actæonidæ.

Actæonidæ (ak-tē-on'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Actæon + -idæ.] A family of tectibranchiate gastropods, variously limited, but typified by the genus Actæon. It is now chiefly restricted to animals retractile in their shells and having a wide frontal lobe terminating behind in broad triangular tentacles; uncinate lingual teeth, which are numerous, nearly uniform, and arranged in series diverging from the middle; and a subcylindrical spiral shell having a columellar fold. The living species are of small size, marine, and chiefly tropical or subtropical, and have been distributed among several genera. Numerous fossil species have been found. The family is also known under the name Tornatellidæ (which see).

act-drop (akt'drop), n. In a theater, a curtain which is lowered between acts.

Actenobranchii (ak-ten-ō-brang'ki-ī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + κτείς (κτεν-), a comb, + βράγχια, gills.] In Macleay's ichthyological system, one of five primary groups of fishes, characterized solely by the branchiæ not being pectinated like those of most fishes. It is a very artificial group, composed of the Lophobranchii and Cyclostomi or Marsipobranchii.

Actian (ak'shi-ăn), a. [< L. Actius (poet.), also Actiacus, a., < Actium, Gr. Ἄκτιον, lit. a headland, < ἀκτή, a headland. Cf. Actæon.] Relating to Actium, a town and promontory of Acarnania in Greece.—Actian games, games held from remote antiquity at Actium in honor of Apollo, and reorganized and developed by Augustus to celebrate his naval victory over Antony near that town, Sept. 2, 31 B. C. As remodeled by the Romans they were celebrated every four years, and became the fifth in importance of the great Greek festivals. Hence, Actian years, years reckoned from the era of the new Actian games. Games also called Actian were celebrated, by senatorial decree, every four years at Rome.

actinal (ak'ti-nal), a. [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), a ray, + -al.] In zoöl.: (a) Pertaining to the side of a radiate animal which contains the mouth: equivalent to oral, since the pole, surface, or aspect of the body whence parts radiate is also that in which the mouth is situated: the opposite of abactinal or aboral. The actinal side or surface may be the upper one, in the usual attitude of the animal, as in the case of a sea-anemone, which is fixed by its abactinal or aboral pole, and grows upward; or it may be the lower one, as in the case of a starfish, which creeps upon its actinal or oral surface. In a sea-urchin of more or less globular shape nearly the whole superficies is actinal.

> The so-called mouth is always placed at one end of these poles, and from it radiate the most prominent organs, in consequence of which I have called this side of the body the oral or actinal area, and the opposite side the aboral or abactinal area.
> L. Agassiz, Contrib. Nat. Hist. N. A., IV. 376.
>
> The mouth [of sea-urchins] is always situated upon the lower or actinal aspect, which is applied in progression to the surface upon which the animal moves.
> Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 161.

(b) In general, having tentacles or rays.

> The upper extremity [of members of the genus Actinia] is called the actinal end, since it bears the tentacles or rays. Dana, Corals, p. 22.

Actinellida (ak-ti-nel'i-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + dim. -ell-us + -ida.] A family name of radiolarians: synonymous with Astrolophididæ (which see).

Actinellidæ (ak-ti-nel'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Actinella (not used) + -idæ.] A family of acanthometrous acantharians with the skeleton composed of a varying number of spicules, which are not distributed according to J. Müller's law.

actinenchyma (ak-ti-neng'ki-mä), n. [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + ἔγχυμα, infusion, < ἐγχέειν, pour in.] In bot., a name that has been given to a system or tissue of stellate cells.

★acting (ak'ting), p. a. Performing duty, service, or functions; specifically, performing the functions of an office or employment temporarily: as, an acting governor or mayor; an acting colonel or superintendent. In the United States there is generally some officer of lower grade legally entitled to become the acting incumbent of an important executive office during a temporary vacancy from absence or disability of the elected incumbent. Temporary vacancies in military, judicial, and minor executive offices are usually filled by assignment or appointment.

Actinia (ak-tin'i-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray.] 1. A genus of zoöphytes, belonging to the Radiata of Cuvier, regarded as the type of the order Malacodermata, subclass Zoantharia, class Actinozoa, subkingdom Cœlenterata, in modern classification. The body is cylindrical, and is attached by one extremity, the mouth occupying the middle of the upper or free extremity. The mouth is surrounded by concentric circles of tentacles, which when spread resemble the petals of a flower, whence the popular names animal-flowers and sea-anemones (which see). They are not perfectly radial in symmetry, the common polyp of the sea-shore, A. mesembryanthemum, having the oral aperture slightly elliptical, the long axis being marked by a tubercle at either end; the animal thus presents a faint but well-marked indication of bilateral symmetry. They move by alternately contracting and expanding their bases, and by their tentacles. The species are often of brilliant colors; many of them are used as food. See Actinozoa.
2. [l. c.] An animal of the genus Actinia or family Actiniidæ.

Actiniadæ, n. pl. See Actiniidæ.

Actiniaria (ak-tin-i-ā'ri-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Actinia + -aria.] One of the divisions of the class Actinozoa, containing the sea-anemones, and nearly equivalent to the order Malacodermata.

★actinic (ak-tin'ik), a. [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), a ray, + -ic.] Pertaining to actinism; (of radiation) chemically active.

> The so-called actinic rays, which were discovered by their special activity in connection with the earlier photographic processes, but which can now be changed into visible rays, are merely vibrations too rapid to affect the eyes. Tait, Light, § 3.

Actinic process, a generic name for any photographic process; specifically, any photo-engraving process.

actinically (ak-tin'i-kal-i), adv. As regards the chemical action of radiation.

> The light which finally emerges, however much corrected, becomes more and more actinically weak.
> Silver Sunbeam, p. 35.

Actinidæ (ak-tin'i-dē), n. pl. Same as Actiniidæ. J. D. Dana, 1846.

actiniform (ak-tin'i-fôrm or ak'tin-i-fôrm), a. [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + L. -formis, < forma, form.] Having a radiated form; resembling an actinia.

Actiniidæ, Actiniadæ (ak-ti-nī'i-dē, -a-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Actinia + -idæ, -adæ.] The sea-anemones or animal-flowers proper, regarded as a family, having as type the genus Actinia, and belonging to the order Helianthoida or Malacodermata, of the class Actinozoa. It contains numerous genera and species. See Actinozoa. Also written Actinidæ.

actiniochrome (ak-tin'i-ō-krōm), n. [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray (see actinium), + χρῶμα, color.] A red pigment obtained by Moseley from some specimens of Bunodes crassus, one of the Actinozoa.

★actinism (ak'ti-nizm), n. [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + -ism.] 1. The science of heat and light.—2. That property of rays which, as may be seen in photography and in certain chemical changes due to exposure to light (such as the union of H and Cl to form HCl), produces chemical combinations and decomposition. A pencil of rays, when decomposed by refraction through a prism, is found to possess three properties, viz., the heating, the luminous, and the chemical or actinic. It was formerly supposed that the actinic property belonged peculiarly to the more refrangible part of the spectrum, beginning with the violet and extending far beyond the visible spectrum; it is now known, however, that the different rays differ essentially only in their wave-lengths, and that the phenomena of heat, light, or chemical action observed depend upon the surface on which the rays respectively fall. The violet end of the spectrum acts especially on the sensitive silver salts, but the chemical decomposition of the carbon dioxid (CO_2) in the atmosphere involved in the growth of vegetation takes place most actively under the action of the yellow rays; and under proper conditions a photograph of even the ultra-red rays at the opposite end of the spectrum may be obtained on a gelatin plate sensitized with silver bromid.

actinium (ak-tin'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray.] A supposed chemical element found associated with zinc. See the supplement.

actino-. [NL., etc., < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray: see actinic.] An element in scientific compounds of Greek origin, meaning ray. In chemical compounds it represents specifically actinism.

Actinocheiri, n. See Actinochiri.

actino-chemistry (ak″ti-nō-kem'is-tri), n. [< actin-ism + chemistry.] Chemistry in its relation to actinism. See actinism.

Actinochiri (ak″ti-nō-kī'rī), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + χείρ, hand.] An order of fishes having six unpaired and one pair of basilar bones supporting the pectoral fin, and all articulating with the scapula. Its only known representatives form the extinct family Pelecopteridæ, of the Upper Cretaceous formation. Cope, 1875. Also spelled ★Actinocheiri.

Actinocrinidæ (ak″ti-nō-krin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Actinocrinus + -idæ.] A family of encrinites, or fossil crinoids, exemplified by the genus Actinocrinus.

actinocrinite (ak″ti-nō-krī'nīt), n. [< Actinocrinus + -ite[2].] An encrinite, or fossil crinoid, of the genus Actinocrinus. [By error sometimes spelled actinocrite.]

Actinocrinus (ak″ti-nō-krī'nus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + κρίνον, lily: see crinoid.] A genus of encrinites, or fossil crinoids, referred to the family Encrinidæ, or made type of the family Actinocrinidæ.

actino-electricity (ak″ti-nō-ē-lek-tris'i-ti), n. [< actin-ism + electricity.] Differences of electrical potential produced in a crystal (e. g. quartz) by radiation. Hankel.

Actinogastra (ak″ti-nō-gas'trä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + γαστήρ, belly.] In Haeckel's classification, a subclass of Asterida, containing those starfishes or sea-stars which have the gastric cavity radiated, whence the name.

★actinograph (ak-tin'ō-gräf), n. [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + γράφειν, write. Cf. Gr. ἀκτινογραφία, a treatise on radiation, of same formation.] An actinometer so constructed as to give a continuous graphic record of radiant energy and its variations. See ★actinometer. There are various forms of actinograph, the best being those of Ångström, Chwolson, and Crova.

> An actinograph, or self-registering photometer.
> Sir J. Herschel, Phil. Trans., I. 46.

actinoid (ak'ti-noid), a. [< Gr. ἀκτινοειδής, < ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + εἶδος, form: see -oid.] Having the form of rays; resembling a starfish; conspicuously radiate: as, the actinoid type of echinoderms.

Actinoida (ak-ti-noi′dä), n. pl. [NL.: see actinoid.] Same as Actinozoa.

actinolite (ak-tin′ō-līt), n. [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + λίθος, stone.] A radiated mineral, called by Werner strahlstein (ray-stone), a metasilicate of lime, magnesia, and ferrous oxid. It is a variety of amphibole or hornblende, of a green color, and having a columnar to fibrous structure. Also called actinote.—Actinolite schist, a metamorphic rock consisting principally of actinolite, with an admixture of mica, quartz, or feldspar; its texture is slaty and foliated.

actinolitic (ak″ti-nō-lit′ik), a. Like, pertaining to, or consisting of actinolite.

actinology (ak-ti-nol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That branch of science which investigates the chemical action of light.

actinomere (ak-tin′ō-mēr), n. [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + μέρος, a part, < μείρεσθαι (√ *μερ), divide.] One of the radially symmetrical partitions or divisions of a sea-anemone, coral-polyp, or other actinozoan.

actinomeric (ak″ti-nō-mer′ik), a. Relating to an actinomere; having actinomeres; being divided into radiated parts.

actinometer (ak-ti-nom′e-tėr), n. [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring the intensity of radiation.

actinometric (ak″ti-nō-met′rik), a. Of or belonging to the actinometer, or to actinometry.

actinometrical (ak″ti-nō-met′ri-kạl), a. Same as actinometric.

actinometry (ak-ti-nom′e-tri), n. [As actinometer + -y.] The measurement of the intensity of radiation.

Actinomma (ak-ti-nom′ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + ὄμμα, eye.] A notable genus of radiolarians, established by Haeckel in 1860. See extract.

As the lateral processes [of the rays of some radiolarians] . . . become more largely developed, a continuous circumferential skeleton is formed, which encloses the whole organism, as in Actinomma, in which there are sometimes three or more concentric shells. Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 9.

Actinomonadidæ (ak″ti-nō-mō-nad′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Actinomonas (-ad-) + -idæ.] A family of oval or spheroidal animalcules, fixed or freely motile. They are entirely naked, possess neither a hardened test nor a central capsule, and have fine ray-like pseudopodia projecting from all points of the surface, supplemented at one point by a long vibratile flagellum.

Actinomonas (ak″ti-nō-mon′as), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + μονάς, a unit: see monad.] The typical genus of infusorians of the family Actinomonadidæ.

actinomorphic (ak″ti-nō-môr′fik), a. Same as actinomorphous.

actinomorphous (ak″ti-nō-môr′fus), a. [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + μορφή, form.] Ray-shaped: in bot., applied to flowers which may be divided vertically into similar halves through two or more planes: synonymous with polysymmetrical. Sachs.

Actinomyces (ak″ti-nō-mī′sēz), n. [NL. (Harz, 1878), < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + μύκης (pl. μύκητες), a mushroom, an excrescence.] 1. A genus of schizomycetous fungi; the ray-fungus. The disease actinomycosis is caused by the presence of A. bovis.—2. [l. c.] A fungus of the genus Actinomyces.

actinomycetic (ak″ti-nō-mī-set′ik), a. Pertaining to or caused by actinomycetes: as, an actinomycetic tumor.

actinomycosis (ak″ti-nō-mī-kō′sis), n. [NL., < actinomyces + -osis.] A progressive inflammatory affection caused by the presence of actinomycetes, occurring in cattle and swine, and sometimes in man. It is most frequently found in the jaws of cattle, but may invade other parts. It is communicated by contact with a wound or an abrasion. Also called lumpy-jaw.

actinophone (ak-tin′ō-phōn), n. [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + φωνή, sound.] An apparatus for the production of sound by actinic rays. A. G. Bell. See radiophone.

actinophonic (ak-tin-ō-fon′ik), a. Pertaining to the actinophone, or to sounds produced by actinic rays.

actinophore (ak-tin′ō-fōr), n. [< Gr. ἀκτινοφόρος, ray-bearing: see actinophorous.] One of the peripheral skeletal elements which directly afford support to the true fin-rays of Lyrifera, that is, typical fishes and selachians.

The actinophores of the paired fins may be distinguished from those of the unpaired fins by calling the latter the median actinophores. J. A. Ryder.

actinophorous (ak-ti-nof′ō-rus), a. [< Gr. ἀκτινοφόρος, ray-bearing, < ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].] Having ray-like spines.

actinophryan (ak-ti-nof′ri-ạn), a. [< Actinophrys.] Of or pertaining to Actinophrys.

The amœban, like the actinophryan type, shows itself in the testaceous as well as in the naked form. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 407.

Actinophryidæ (ak″ti-nō-frī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Actinophrys + -idæ.] A family of endoplastic rhizopods, typified by the genus Actinophrys (which see), referred to the order Heliozoa or constituting an order Phlœophora (Carus), and containing organisms known as heliozoans or sun-animalcules. Other genera than Actinophrys placed in this family are Ciliophrys and Actinosphærium (which see).

Actinophrynina (ak″ti-no-fri-ī′nä), n. pl. [NL., < Actinophrys + -ina.] A group of rhizopods, taking name from the genus Actinophrys, containing heliozoans or sun-animalcules. See Actinophryidæ.

Actinophrys (ak-ti-nof′ris), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + ὀφρύς = E. brow.] A genus of protozoans, belonging to a division of the class Rhizopoda known as Heliozoa, and the leading genus of a family Actinophryidæ. Actinophrys sol, a typical species, is the well-known sun-animalcule of microscopists.

Most species of the genus Actinophrys, or "sun-animalcule," which is common in ponds, are simply free-swimming myxopods with stiffish pseudopodia, which radiate from all sides of the globular body. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 82.

actinopteran (ak-ti-nop′tẹ-ran), n. One of the Actinopteri; an actinopterous fish.

Actinopteri (ak-ti-nop′tẹ-rī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of actinopterus: see actinopterous.] In Cope's system of classification, a subclass of fishes embracing all the teleosts, most of the osseous ganoids, and the sturgeons. The technical characters of the group are opercular bones well developed on a separate and complex suspensorium, a double ceratohyal, no pelvic elements, primary radii of the fore limb parallel with basilar elements and entering into the articulation with the scapular arch, and basilar elements reduced to a metapterygium and very rarely a mesopterygium.

actinopterous (ak-ti-nop′tẹ-rus), a. [< NL. actinopterus, < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + πτερόν, wing.] Having the characters of or pertaining to the Actinopteri.

actinosoma (ak″ti-nō-sō′mä), n.; pl. actinosomata (-ma-tä). [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + σῶμα, body.] The entire body of any actinozoan, whether simple, as in the sea-anemones, or composed of several zoöids, as in most corals.

Actinosphærium (ak″ti-nō-sfē′ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + σφαῖρα, sphere.] 1. A genus of rhizopods, or endoplastic protozoans, Sun-animalcule (Actinosphærium eichhorni), magnified.

I. The whole animal, with c, c, contractile vacuoles. II. Portion of periphery more magnified, with a, four stiff pseudopodia, and n, four nuclei or endoplasts. III. A young actinosphærium.

having a number of nuclei or endoplasts in the central parts of the protoplasm, and numerous stiff radiating pseudopodia.

Neither conjugation nor fission has been observed among ordinary Radiolaria, but both these processes take place in Actinosphærium. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 85.

2. [l. c.] A member of this genus.

actinost (ak′ti-nost), n. [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + ὀστέον, a bone.] In ichth., one of the bones which in true fishes immediately support the rays of the pectoral and ventral fins. They are generally, in the pectorals, four in number, but sometimes, as in some pediculates, are reduced to two, and sometimes, as in ganoids, increased to more than four; they are rarely atrophied. Gill.

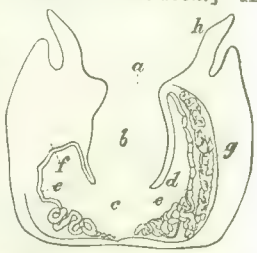
actinostome (ak-tin′ō-stōm), n. [< Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + στόμα, mouth.] The oral orifice of an actinozoan or of an asteroidean.



The ingrowth of the rim of the blastopore in Actinozoa to form an actinostome is therefore due to a fusion between the primitive stomodeum and the blastopore. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist. (1885), p. 107.

actinote (ak′ti-nōt), n. [< Gr. ἀκτινωτός, furnished with rays, < ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray.] Same as actinolite.

actinotrichium (ak″ti-nō-trik′i-um), n.; pl. actinotrichia (-ä). [NL. (J. A. Ryder, 1885), < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + θρίξ (τριχ-), a hair.] One of the homogeneous hair-like fibers which represent the rays in the fin-folds of the embryos of fishes, and which subsequently fuse to form the membranous basis of the permanent rays of the adult fish.

Actinotrocha (ak-ti-not′rō-kä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + τροχή, a wheel, ring.] An embryonic form of a gephyrean worm of the genus Phoronis (which see), which was mistaken for a distinct animal and named Actinotrocha branchiata.

Actinozoa (ak″ti-nō-zō′ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + ζῷον, an animal: see zoön.] A class of Cœlenterata; radiated, marine zoöphytes, embracing the sea-anemones, corals, sea-pens, etc., in which the mouth is furnished with hollow retractile tentacles, simple in one subclass (Zoantharia) or fringed in the other (Alcyonaria). The digestive cavity is separated from the body-wall by an intervening perivisceral space, which is radially divided into several compartments by partitions called mesenteries, on which the reproductive organs are situated. The great majority are compound, living in a polypidom; some adhere to rocks, etc., and some are free. The rayed tentacles about the mouth present in some genera, as Actinia, no remote resemblance to some of the finest composite flowers. Reproduction is effected by eggs thrown out at the mouth, by gemmules or buds developed on the base of their disk, and by division, each separated part becoming a complete animal. Development is accompanied by well-marked metamorphosis but not by alternation of generations. When reproduced by ordinary generation, the egg develops into a free locomotive planula with vibratile cilia. The sexes are either united or distinct. The Actinozoa and Hydrozoa constitute the subkingdom Cœlenterata. Also called Actinoida. See Hydrozoa.

Vertical Section of an Actinozoan (a sea-anemone, Actinia holsatica), showing type of structure of Actinozoa. a, mouth, oral aperture; b, gastric cavity; c, axial cavity, common to b and to d, an intermesenteric chamber in the perivisceral or somatic cavity, c and d together being the enteroccele; e, free thickened margin of a mesentery, f, containing nematocysts; g, reproductive organ; h, one of the circlet of tentacles around the mouth.

actinozoal (ak″ti-nō-zō′ạl), a. Relating to the Actinozoa.

actinozoan (ak″ti-nō-zō′an), n. One of the Actinozoa; any member of that class.

actinozoön (ak″ti-nō-zō′on), n. [NL., sing. of Actinozoa.] An actinozoan.

actinula (ak-tin′ū-lä), n.; pl. actinulæ (-lē). [NL., dim. of Gr. ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray.] A name given by Allman to the larval condition of Hydrophora (Hydrozoa), appearing when the ciliated locomotive planula or embryo has become fixed by its aboral end, and has passed into the elongated gastrula-stage by the formation of the mouth with its circlet of tentacles. See planula.

In most Discophora, the embryo becomes a fixed actinula (the so-called Hydra tuba, or Scyphistoma). Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 133.

action (ak′shọn), n. [< ME. accion, -oun, < OF. action = Sp. accion = Pg. acção = It. azione, < L. actio(n-), < agere, do, act: see act, n.] 1. The process or state of acting or of being active, as opposed to rest; change of which the cause lies within the subject; activity; active exertion; energy manifested in outward acts, as contrasted with contemplation, speculation, speaking, or writing: as, a man of action. [In this sense not used in the plural.]

The basis of Action, as distinguished from motion, or movement, is the existence of desire residing in the animate organism. L. F. Ward, Dynam. Sociol., II. 90.

2. An event considered as predicated of its cause; an act, usually in a complex or an inclusive sense; that which is done about or in relation to anything; a specific performance, proceeding, or course of conduct: as, a good or a bad action; actions speak louder than words; the action of a deliberative body.

The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by him actions are weighed. 1 Sam. ii. 3.

What dangerous action, stood it next to death,
Would I not undergo for one calm look!
Shak., T. G. of V., v. 4.

An action is the perfection and publication of thought.
Emerson, Nature.

The word action is properly applied to those exertions which are consequent on volition, whether the exertion be made on external objects, or be confined to our mental operations. D. Stewart, Works, VI. 121.

3. An exertion of power or force; the real relation of a cause to its effect; causality; influence; agency; operation; impulse: as, the action of wind upon a ship's sails.

The action which given electrical masses exert on the exterior of any closed surface is the same as that of a layer of the same mass spread on this surface according to a certain law. Atkinson, tr. of Mascart and Joubert, I. 44.

4. Manner of moving; kind of motion or physical performance: as, this horse has fine action; the action of a machine.

Imitate the action of the tiger. Shak., Hen. V., iii. 1.

5. In rhet., gesture or gesticulation; the deportment of the speaker, or the accommodation of his attitude, voice, gestures, and countenance to the subject, or to the thoughts and feelings expressed.

Suit the action to the word, the word to the action.
Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2.

Whilst the true brood of actors, that alone
Keep nat'ral, unstrain'd Action in her throne, Behold their benches bare. Carew, To Davenant.

6. In poetry and the drama, the connected series of events on which the interest of the piece depends; the main subject or story, as distinguished from an incidental action or episode. Unity of action is one of the dramatic unities.

This action should have three qualifications: first, it should be one action; secondly, it should be an entire action; and thirdly, it should be a great action.
Addison, Spectator, No. 267.

7. In physiol.: (a) Any one of the active processes going on in an organized body; some manifestation of vital activity; the performance of a function: as, the action of the stomach or the gastric juice on the food; a morbid action of the liver. (b) A more or less complex muscular effort. It may be voluntary, as the contractions of the voluntary muscles in response to the will; involuntary, as those of the heart; mixed, as those of respiration, deglutition, etc.; or reflex, as most involuntary actions, and also those performed by voluntary muscles under the influence of stimuli without involving conscious volition.

8. In law: (a) A proceeding instituted in court by one or more parties against another or others to enforce a right, or punish or redress a wrong: distinguished from judicial proceedings which are not controversial in form, as the probate of a will. (b) Such a proceeding under the forms of the common law, as distinguished from a chancery suit and a criminal prosecution. But since the merger of law and equity, the remedy formerly had by suit in chancery is had by an equitable action. In the wider sense an action is civil or criminal: it is criminal when instituted by the sovereign for the punishment of a crime (see criminal); civil when instituted by the sovereign power in its capacity as an owner or contracting party, or by a subject or citizen. A criminal action is frequently spoken of as an indictment, which, however, is only one kind of formal complaint by which such a proceeding may be commenced or presented for trial. A common-law action is real, personal, or mixed: real when it claims title to real estate; personal when it demands a chattel, a debt, damages for an injury, or a statutory penalty; and mixed when it demands both real estate and damages for a wrong. Actions are in personam or in rem: in personam when the party defendant is a natural person or a corporation; in rem when it is a thing the ownership of which it is sought to change or affect, as when it is sought to make damages for a collision at sea a lien on the guilty ship, or to confiscate smuggled property. Actions where, the defendant being out of the reach of the court, a judgment against him will bind only his property previously attached, and actions merely to determine the status of the parties, as for divorce, are also sometimes properly called actions in rem; for the property attached and the status, respectively, are in one sense the subjects of the action, and it is their presence which enables the court to exercise its jurisdiction as against persons absent. See also in personam, in rem. (c) The right of bringing an action: as, the law gives an action for every claim. [The following French phrases are common in Canadian law: Action en déclaration d'hypothèque, action, by a creditor having a hypothec, against a third person in possession of the real property, to have it declared subject to the hypothec. Action en interruption (de prescription), an action brought to interrupt the running of the time fixed in a statute of limitations as a bar to an action. Action en revendication, action in replevin; an action by the alleged owner of property to recover possession. Action hypothécaire, an action brought by the hypothecary creditor against a third person holding the property subject to the hypothec, the object being to have the property or its value applied to pay the debt. Action négatoire, an action by the owner of real property against any person exercising an alleged right of servitude or easement on the property, praying that such alleged right be declared unfounded and that such person be perpetually barred from its exercise. Action populaire, a qui tam action; an action in the interest of the public.]

9. In the fine arts: (a) The appearance of animation, movement, or passion given to figures by their attitude, position, or expression, either singly or concurrently. (b) The event or episode represented or illustrated by a work of art. —10. A military fight; a minor engagement between armed bodies of men, whether on land or water: of less importance than a battle. See battle.

How many gentlemen have you lost in this action?
Shak., Much Ado, i. 1.

A general action now ensued, which, after the loss of several killed and wounded, terminated in the retreat of the British party towards the centre of the town.
Everett, Orations, p. 90.

11. In mach.: (a) The mechanism of a breech-loading gun by which it is opened to receive the charge. (b) That part of the mechanism of a pianoforte, an organ, or other similar instrument by which the action of the fingers upon the keys is transmitted to the strings, reeds, etc. In a harp the action is a mechanism, controlled by pedals, by which the key is changed by a half or whole step.

12. [A French usage.] A share in the capital stock of a company; in the plural, stocks, or shares of stock.—Abandonment of an action. See abandonment.—Accessory action. See accessory.—Action of account. See account.—Action of adherence. See adherence.—Action of a moving system, in mech., twice the time-integral of the kinetic energy, which is equal to the sum of the average momentums for the spaces described by the parts of the system from any era, each multiplied by the length of its path.—Action of ejection and intrusion. See ejection.—Action of ejectment. See ejectment and casual.—Action of foreclosure. See foreclosure.—Action of mesne profits. See mesne.—Action on the case. See case[1].—Amicable action. See amicable.—Angle of action. See angle[3].—Back action. (a) In marine engines, action in which the cylinder is between the cross-head or cross-tail and the crank. In this arrangement, which is sometimes used where a saving of longitudinal space is desired, parallel side-bars connect the cross-head of the piston-rod with a cross-tail, and from this a connecting-rod extends to the shaft at the same end of the cylinder as the cross-head. The opposite of direct action (see below). (b) In firearms, when the locks are bedded into the stock alone. E. H. Knight.—Cause of action. See cause.—Chemical action, action between substances by which their identity is lost, as distinguished from physical action in which the identity of the substances is retained: same as chemical change.—Chose in action. See chose[2].—Circuity of action. See circuity.—Concourse of actions. See concourse.—Concurrence of actions. See concurrence.—Consolidation of actions. See consolidation.—Currents of action. See current.—Declaratory action. See declarator.—Direct action, in a steam-engine, action in which the piston-rod or cross-head is directly connected by a rod with the crank.—Double action, in mach., action, as of a piston, in which work is done at every stroke or reciprocal movement.—Droitural action. See droitural.—Equivocal action, one in which the effect is of a different species from the agent, as the action of a blow upon a drum, causing it to sound.—Form of action. See form.—Gist of an action. See gist[2].—Immanent action, one whose effect is within the agent or cause; transient action, one whose effect is an object other than its cause.

In the action immanent the agent and the patient are the same; in the transient different, in the thing itself.
Burgersdicius, tr. by a Gentleman, i. 8.

In action, in a condition or state of activity; in active operation.—Law of action and reaction, Newton's third law of motion. It is as follows: To every action there is always an equal and contrary reaction; or the mutual actions of two bodies are always equal and oppositely directed. By action here is to be understood the force, or sometimes (according to Newton) the product of its effective component into the velocity of its point of application. While the first two laws of motion determine how forces of every conceivable kind affect bodies, and what motions they produce, the third is more positive, in that it begins the description of the forces that are actually found in nature, by enunciating the proposition that the algebraic sum of all the forces that are called into play on each occasion is zero. The following passage gives Newton's comments on this law, in the language of Thomson and Tait, except that the original word action is restored, in place of the word activity which those authors substitute for it, in order to avoid confusion with the action of a moving system, as defined above: "If one body presses or draws another, it is pressed or drawn by this other with an equal force in the opposite direction. If any one presses a stone with his finger, his finger is pressed with the same force in the opposite direction by the stone. A horse towing a boat on a canal is dragged backwards by a force equal to that which he impresses on the towing-rope forwards. By whatever amount, and in whatever direction, one body has its motion changed by impact upon another, this other body has its motion changed by the same amount in the opposite direction; for at each instant during the impact the force between them was equal and opposite on the two. When neither of the two bodies has any rotation, whether before or after the impact, the changes of velocity which they experience are proportional to their masses. When one body attracts another from a distance, this other attracts it with an equal and opposite force. If the action of an agent be measured by its amount and velocity conjointly, and if, similarly, the reaction of the resistance be measured by the velocities of its several parts and their several amounts conjointly, whether these arise from friction, cohesion, weight, or acceleration, action and reaction, in all combinations of machines, will be equal and opposite." —Local action (in a voltaic cell). See amalgamate, v.—Perficient action, that action which changes the thing acted upon without destroying it; corrupting action, that which destroys it.—Principle of least action, of Maupertuis, the principle that, of all the different sets of paths along which a conservative system may be guided from one configuration to another, with its total energy constant, that one for which the action is the least is such that the system will require only to be started with the proper velocities to move along it unguided.—Single action, in mach., action, as of a piston or plunger, in which work is performed on only one of two or more strokes: as, a single-action pump, one in which the water is raised on every alternate stroke, or the upward lift of the pump-rod.—To take action, to take steps in regard to anything; specifically, to institute legal proceedings.—Univocal action, that by which an agent produces an effect of the same species as itself; thus, the action of heat in heating a body by conduction is univocal. —Wave-action, in gun., abnormally high pressure in a gun, due to ununiform distribution of powder charge. = Syn. Action, Act, Deed. Of these words action (in the singular) denotes more particularly the operation, act and deed the accomplished result. Only action may be used to signify the doing or the method of doing; it is also the word for ordinary activity, act signifying that which is more notable or dignified. An action may include many acts, while act is generally individual. An exception to this is in the use of the word act to indicate a section of a play, which is a survival of old usage; yet action is in this connection broader than act, covering the movement of the plot through all the acts: as, in Macbeth the action is highly tragic. A course of action; his action was continued; repeated acts of humanity; his acts were inconsistent. Deed in old usage had a very general application, but in modern usage it is applied chiefly to acts which are for any reason especially noteworthy; it is a more formal word than action or act. The Acts of the Apostles, the action of a watch; the acts of a prince, the actions of children; an act of mercy; a deed of valor; a base deed or act. For comparison with feat, etc., see feat.

Fundamentally there is no such thing as private action. All actions are public—in themselves or their consequences. Bovee, Summaries of Thought.

Our acts our angels are, or good or ill,
Our fatal shadows that walk by us still.
J. Fletcher, Honest Man's Fortune, I. 37.

Who doth right deeds
Is twice-born, and who doeth ill deeds vile.
Edwin Arnold, Light of Asia, vi. 78.

action (ak'shọn), v. t. [< action, n.] To bring a legal action against. [Rare.]

actionable (ak'shọn-ạ-bl), a. [< ML. actionabilis, < L. actio(n-), action: see action.] Furnishing sufficient ground for an action at law: as, to call a man a thief is actionable.

Many things which have been said in such papers . . . are equally actionable. The American, VIII. 5.

actionably (ak'shọn-ạ-bli), adv. In an actionable manner; in a manner that may subject to legal process.

actional (ak'shọn-al), a. Of or pertaining to action or actions. Grote.

actionary (ak'shọn-ā-ri), n.; pl. actionaries (-riz). [= F. actionnaire, < ML. actionarius, < L. actio(n-), action: see action.] A shareholder in a joint-stock company; one who owns actions (see action, 12) or shares of stock. Also called actionist. [Chiefly used of French subjects.]

actioner (ak'shọn-ẽr), n. The workman who makes or adapts the action of an instrument, as of a piano, etc.

actionist (ak'shọn-ist), n. [< action + -ist.] Same as actionary.

actionize (ak'shọn-īz), v. t. [< action + -ize.] To bring a legal action against. [Rare.] N. E. D.

actionless (ak'shọn-les), a. [< action + -less.] Without action; inert.

action-sermon (ak'shọn-sẽr″mọn), n. In the Presbyterian churches of Scotland, the sermon preached before the celebration of the communion.

action-taking† (ak'shọn-tā″king), a. Litigious; accustomed to seek redress by law instead of by the sword: an epithet of contempt.

A lily-liver'd, action-taking . . . rogue.
Shak., Lear, ii. 2.

actious† (ak'shus), a. [< action + -ous. Cf. factious.] Active; full of activity; full of energy.

He knows you to be eager men, martial men, men of good stomachs, very hot shots, very actious for valour.
Dekker and Webster (?), Sir Thomas Wyat, p. 44.

actitation (ak-ti-tā'shọn), n. [< L. as if actitatio(n-)*, < actitare, act or plead frequently, used only of lawsuits and dramas; double freq. of agere, act, do.] Frequent action; specifically, the debating of lawsuits. [Rare.]

activate† (ak'ti-vāt), v. t. [< active + -ate[2].] To make active; intensify.

Snow and ice, especially being holpen, and their cold activated by nitre or salt, will turn water to ice, and that in a few hours. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 83.

★active (ak'tiv), a. [< ME. actif, < OF. actif, F. actif, -ive, < L. activus, < agere, do, act: see act, n.] 1. Having the power or property of acting; tending to cause change or communicate action or motion; capable of exerting influence: opposed to passive: as, attraction is an active power.

When the mind has a passive sensibility, but no active strength. Hawthorne, Twice-Told Tales, II. 83.

I find I can excite ideas in my mind at pleasure, and vary and shift the scene as often as I think fit. This making and unmaking of ideas doth very properly denominate the mind active.
Berkeley, Principles of Human Knowledge, i. § 38.

Power, thus considered, is twofold—viz.: as able to make, or able to receive, any change; the one may be called active and the other passive power. Locke.
[This distinction is taken from Aristotle.]

Specifically—2. In med., acting quickly; producing immediate effects: as, active remedies or treatment.—3. Having the power of quick motion, or disposition to move with speed; nimble; lively; brisk; agile: as, an active animal.—4. Busy; constantly engaged in action; acting with vigor and assiduity: opposed to dull, slow, or indolent: as, an active officer; also to sedentary: as, an active life.

Malaga possessed a brave and numerous garrison, and the common people were active, hardy, and resolute.
Irving, Granada, p. 348.

5. In a state of action; marked by movement or operation; in actual progress or motion; not quiescent, dormant, or suspended: as, to take active proceedings against an offender; to engage in active hostilities.

The world hath had in these men fresh experience how dangerous such active errors are. Hooker.

Fanaticism, or, to call it by its milder name, enthusiasm, is only powerful and active so long as it is aggressive.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 232.

Hence—6. In com., marked by quickness or frequency; brisk; lively; coming or moving freely or abundantly: as, an active trade or demand for goods; active freights or stocks.—7. Requiring action or exertion; practical; operative; producing real effects: opposed to speculative: as, the active duties of life; the active powers of the mind.

The division of the faculties of the human mind into understanding and will is very ancient, and has been generally adopted, the former comprehending all our speculative, the latter all our active, powers. Reid.
[This use of active for practical, in philosophy, is rightly condemned by Hamilton.]

8. In gram., signifying the performance and not the endurance of an action: opposed to passive. Said of a verb or verb-form, and used especially in the case of languages which, like Latin, have a nearly complete passive conjugation of the verb, or else, like Greek and Sanskrit, a partial one; but also, less properly, of those which, like English and French, have a system of verb-phrases with passive meaning, made with an auxiliary. Some grammarians (quite improperly) use active as equivalent to transitive.—Active apperception, that apperception which chooses one among a number of ideas that present themselves.—Active bonds, bonds which bear a fixed rate of interest payable in full from the date of issue, as distinguished from passive bonds, on which no interest is paid, but which entitle the holder to some future benefit or claim.—Active capital or wealth, money, or property that may readily be converted into money, used in commerce or other employment.—Active cause. See cause.—Active commerce, the commerce in which a nation carries its own and foreign commodities in its own ships, or which is prosecuted by its own citizens, as contradistinguished from passive, in which the productions of one country are transported by the people of another.—Active debt. See debt.—Active or living force, in phys., same as vis viva (which see).—Active fund. See fund.—Active instrument, one which upon being set into action goes on of itself, as fire.—Active list, the list of officers in the army or navy liable to be called upon for active service, as distinguished from the retired list.—Active power. See quotation from Locke under def. 1. Reid uses the term to denote the will, appetites, affections, etc.; but that use has been generally condemned.—Active service (milit.). (a) The performance of duty against an enemy, or operations carried on in his presence.

It was evident, from the warlike character of El Zagal, that there would be abundance of active service and hard fighting. Irving, Granada, p. 437.

(b) The state of having a place on the active list, under full pay: used in contradistinction to being on the retired list, under reduced pay.—Active symptoms, in pathol., symptoms of excitement.—Optically active substance, in phys., one which has the power of rotating the plane of polarization of a ray of light transmitted through it.
=Syn. Active, Busy, Officious, lively, agile, stirring, vigorous, industrious, indefatigable. (See busy.) Active regards either mind or body; there is no sinister sense of the word. The activity may be merely for its own sake. Active is opposed to lazy, inert, or quiescent: an active mind, life, person. Busy is active about something that is supposed to be useful. As applied to disposition, the word has acquired a bad sense, that of meddlesome: a *busy*body; he is too busy about others' affairs. An officious person is one whose efforts to be active or busy for others' benefit come, through his lack of judgment, to be regarded as annoying or intrusive. See impertinent.

Whose very languor is a punishment
Heavier than active souls can feel or guess.
Aubrey de Vere, Song of Faith.

Rest is not quitting the busy career.
John Dwight, True Rest.

I will be hang'd if some eternal villain,
Some busy and insinuating rogue,
Some cogging, cozening slave, to get some office,
Have not devis'd this slander. Shak., Othello, iv. 2.

You are too officious
In her behalf that scorns your services.
Shak., M. N. D., ii. 2.

actively (ak'tiv-li), adv. 1. In an active manner; by action or movement; hence, briskly or energetically: as, to engage actively in business; to work actively.

To flaming youth let virtue be as wax, . . .
Since frost itself as actively doth burn.
Shak., Hamlet, iii. 4.

2. In an active sense; by active application or attention; in a way involving or implying action: opposed to passively: as, to employ a verb actively; to study actively.

The student is to read history actively and not passively; to esteem his own life the text, and books the commentary. Emerson, History.

activement† (ak'tiv-ment), n. [Irreg. < active + -ment.] Business; employment. Bp. Reynolds.

activeness (ak'tiv-nes), n. The quality of being active; the faculty of acting; nimbleness; activity. [Rare.]

What strange agility and activeness do our common tumblers and dancers on the rope attain to!
Bp. Wilkins, Math. Magick.

★activity (ak-tiv'i-ti), n.; pl. activities (-tiz). [< F. activité, < ML. activita(t-)s, < L. activus, active: see active.] 1. The state of action; doing.

Orl. He is, simply, the most active gentleman of France.
Con. Doing is activity, and he will still be doing.
Shak., Hen. V., iii. 7.

2. Activeness; the quality of acting promptly and energetically.

If thou knowest any men of activity among them, then make them rulers over my cattle. Gen. xlvii. 6.

3. An exercise of energy or force; an active movement or operation; a mode or course of action.

The activities of sentient beings are perpetually directed to averting pain and attracting pleasure.
L. F. Ward, Dynam. Sociol., I. 681.

4. In phys., a term introduced by Sir William Thomson as an equivalent of "rate of doing work," or the rate per unit of time at which energy is given out by a working system.

The activity, or work per second, or horse-power of a dynamo can be measured electrically.
S. P. Thompson, Dynamo-Elect. Mach., p. 99.

5†. A physical or gymnastic exercise; an agile performance.

I was admitted into the dauncing and vaulting Schole, of which late activity one Stokes, the Master, set forth a pretty book. Evelyn, Diary, 1637.

actless (akt'les), a. [< act + -less.] Without action or spirit. [Rare.]

A poor, young, actless, indigested thing.
Southern, Loyal Brother, i. 1.

acto (äk'tō), n. [Sp., also auto, < L. actum, actus: see act, n.] An act or a proceeding. In judicial matters it is applied to any of the proceedings, orders, decrees, or sentences of a court, in parts of the United States settled by Spaniards. H. W. Halleck.

acton (ak'ton), n. [< ME. acton, aktone, aketon, acqueton, acketon, -toun, etc., later often with h, hacton, haketon, haqueton, etc., also hocton, hocqueton, etc., < OF. acoton, aqueton, auqueton, etc., later hocqueton, hocton, F. hoqueton = Pr. alcoto, cotton-wool, padding, a padded and quilted jacket, < Sp. algodón, alcotón, cotton, cotton-plant, < Ar. al-qūtun, cotton, < al, the, + qūtun, cotton: see cotton.] A kind of quilted vest or tunic, made of taffeta or leather, worn under the habergeon or coat of mail to save the body from bruises, and sometimes worn alone like a buffcoat; in later times, a corselet or cuirass of plate-armor. See gambeson.

His acton it was all of black. Percy's Reliques.

Yet was his helmet hack'd and hew'd,
His acton pierced and tore. Scott, Eve of St. John.

By an order in 1297 for the London City Gate guard the haketon and gambeson are to be both worn, or in default the haketon and corset or haketon and plates.
Fairholt, II. 3.

actor (ak'tor), n. [< ME. actour, agent, pleader, < L. actor, doer, plaintiff, advocate, agent, player, < agere, drive, do, act: see act, n.] 1. One who acts or performs; the doer or performer of an action; specifically, one who represents a character or acts a part in a play; a stage-player.

He [Pitt] was an actor in the Closet, an actor at Council, . . . and even in private society he could not lay aside his theatrical tones and attitudes.
Macaulay, William Pitt.

2. In law: (a) An advocate or a proctor in civil courts or causes. (b) A plaintiff. [In this sense properly a Latin word.]—Character-actor, an actor who portrays characters with strongly marked peculiarities.

actress (ak'tres), n. [< actor + -ess. Cf. F. actrice, an actress, < L. actrix, acc. actricem, a female plaintiff, a stewardess, fem. of actor: see actor.] A female actor or performer.

Virgil has, indeed, admitted Fame as an actress in the Æneid. Addison.

Specifically, a woman who represents or acts a part in a play. Actresses were not introduced in England till after the Restoration, though they seem to have been employed in some parts of Europe much earlier. Thomas Coryat, the traveler, mentions them in his "Crudities," published in 1611: "Here [Venice] . . . I saw women acte, a thing that I never saw before; though I have heard that it hath been used in London." In Shakspere's time female parts were performed by boys, as is still the custom in China and some other countries. "The king, one night, was impatient to have the play begin. 'Sire,' said Davenant, 'they are shaving the queen.'" Memoirs of Count de Gramont. In the epilogue to "As you Like it" Rosalind says: "If I were a woman, I would kiss as many of you as had beards that pleased me," etc. In 1662 the employment of actresses was sanctioned by Charles II. "Whereas the women's parts in plays have hitherto been acted by men, in the habits of women, at which some have taken great offence, we do permit and give leave, for the time to come, that all women's parts be acted by women." Extract from license in 1662 to a London theater.

actual (ak'tū-al), a. [< ME. actual, actuel, active, < OF. and F. actuel, < LL. actualis, active, practical, < L. actus (actu-), act, action, performance: see act, n.] 1†. Active; practical.

Besides her walking and other actual performances, what . . . have you heard her say? Shak., Macbeth, v. 1.

Either in discourse of thought or actual deed.
Shak., Othello, iv. 2.

2. In full existence; real; denoting that which not merely can be, but is: opposed to potential, apparent, constructive, and imaginary.

Hermogenes, says Horace, was a singer even when silent; how?—a singer not in actu but in posse. So Alfenus was a cobbler, even when not at work; that is, he was a cobbler potential, whereas, when busy in his booth, he was a cobbler actual. Sir W. Hamilton.

The smallest actual good is better than the most magnificent promises of impossibilities. Macaulay, Lord Bacon.

In sundry abnormal states, strong feelings of cold or heat are felt throughout the body, though its actual temperature has remained unaltered.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 47.

3. Now existing; present: opposed to past and future: as, in the actual condition of affairs.—Actual being. See being.—Actual cautery. See cautery, L.—Actual cognition, opposed to virtual and to habitual cognition, lasts only while the attention is engaged upon the object.—Actual difference. See difference.—Actual energy, in mech., energy in the form of motion; vis viva: opposed to potential energy, which is energy in the form of position. See energy.—Actual entry. See entry.—Actual fraud. See fraud.—Actual relation, one which depends upon an outward fact, and not upon a mere desire or fancy.—Actual sin, in theol., the sin of the individual, in contrast with the sin of the race, or original sin.—Actual whole, in logic: (a) Any whole except a potential whole.

This whole is called potential, whereas the rest of the species are called actual.
Burgersdicius, tr. by a Gentleman, i. 14.

(b) An individual as containing in it species, or a species as containing in it genera; a metaphysical or formal whole. So actual parts.—The actual, that which is real and existing, as opposed to what is ideal or merely possible; the activities and cares of life.

That delicious sense of disenthrallment from the actual which the deepening twilight brings with it.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 54.

=Syn. Actual, Positive, etc. (see real), veritable, genuine, certain, absolute.

actualisation, actualise. See actualization, actualize.

actualism (ak'tū-al-izm), n. [< actual + -ism.] In metaph., the doctrine that all existence is truly active or spiritual, and not dead or inert.

There is nothing so clear in his [Hinton's] earliest thought as the doctrine, embodied in the word Actualism, that the world is a process. Mind, IX. 399.

actualist (ak'tū-al-ist), n. [< actual + -ist.] One who is interested in or deals with actualities; a realist: opposed to idealist. Grote.

★actuality (ak-tū-al'i-ti), n.; pl. actualities (-tiz). [= F. actualité, < ML. actualita(t-)s (Duns Scotus), < L. actualis, actual: see actual.] 1. The state of being actual, as opposed to potentiality; existence, as opposed to ideality.

A man may deny actuality . . . to the Mahometan idea of God, and yet be no atheist.
Theodore Parker, Speculative Atheism.

George Sand says neatly, that "Art is not a study of positive reality" (actuality were the fitter word), "but a seeking after ideal truth." Lowell, Study Windows, p. 208.

2. That in which anything is realized.

Nature and religion are the bands of friendship; excellency and usefulness are its great endearments; society and neighborhood, that is, the possibilities and the circumstances of converse, are the determinations and actualities of it. Jer. Taylor, Friendship.

actualization (ak″tū-al-i-zā'shon), n. A making real or actual; the reducing of an idea to a state of actuality or existence; the state of being made actual. Also spelled actualisation.

It [the idea of peace] is expounded, illustrated, defined, with different degrees of clearness; and its actualization, or the measures it should inspire, predicted according to the light of each seer. Emerson, War.

actualize (ak'ṭū-a-līz), v. t.; pret. and pp. actualized, ppr. actualizing. [< actual + -ize; = F. actualiser.] To make actual. Also spelled actualise.

His [Macaulay's] critical severity almost actualizes the idea of critical damnation. Whipple, Ess. and Rev., I. 20.

actually (ak'ṭū-a-li), adv. 1. As an actual or existing fact; really; in truth: often used as an expression of wonder or surprise: as, he actually accomplished what he undertook.

On one occasion Sheridan actually forced Burke down upon his seat in order to prevent a furious explosion of passion. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xv.

The refraction of the atmosphere causes the sun to be seen before it actually rises, and after it actually sets. Tyndall, Light and Elect., p. 43.

2†. By action or active manifestation; in act or deed; practically.

Of all your sex, yet never did I know
Any that yet so actually did shew
Such rules for patience, such an easy way.
Drayton, Elegies.

actualness (ak'ṭū-a-l-nes), n. The state or quality of being actual; actuality. [Rare.]

actuarial (ak-ṭū-ā'ri-a-l), a. Of or pertaining to an actuary or to actuaries, or to the business of an actuary: as, actuarial calculations; an actuarial society.

actuarially (ak-ṭū-ā'ri-a-l-i), adv. After the manner of an actuary; in an actuarial way.

The trade-unions of England are, actuarially speaking, bankrupt. N. A. Rev., CXLIII. 233.

actuary (ak'ṭū-ā-ri), n.; pl. actuaries (-riz). [< L. actuarius, a shorthand-writer, a clerk, < actus (actu-), action, public employment: see act, n.] 1. A registrar or clerk: a term of the civil law, used originally in courts of civil-law jurisdiction. In England—(a) A clerk who registers the acts and constitutions of the lower house of Convocation. (b) An officer appointed to keep a savings-bank's accounts.

2. A person skilled in the application of the doctrine of chances to financial affairs, more especially in regard to the insurance of lives. The term is generally applied to an officer of a life-insurance company whose main duties are to make the computations necessary to determine the valuation of contingent liabilities, computation of premiums, compilation of tables, etc.

actuate (ak'ṭū-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. actuated, ppr. actuating. [< ML. actuatus, pp. of actuare, perform, put in action, < L. actus: see act, n.] 1. To put into action; move or incite to action: as, men are actuated by motives or passions.

Those whom their superior talents had deified, were found to be still actuated by the most brutal passions of human nature. Goldsmith, Origin of Poetry.

I succeeded in making a very good electro-magnet, . . . which . . . performed the work of actuating the armature with perfect success. E. Gray, in G. B. Prescott's Elect. Invent., p. 185.

2†. To make actual or real; carry out; execute; perform.

Only to be thought worthy of your counsel,
Or actuate what you command to me,
Were a perpetual happiness.
Massinger, Roman Actor, iv. 2.

=Syn. 1. Actuate, Impel, Induce, Incite, Prompt, Instigate. (See impel.) To actuate is merely to call into action, without regard to the nature of the actuating force; but it is very commonly used of motives: as, the murderer was actuated by revenge. Impel, to drive toward, is expressive of more passion, haste, urgency, necessity; hence it is coupled with words of corresponding kind, and when used with quieter words it gives them force: as, youth impelled him. Induce, to lead toward, is gentler by as much as leading is gentler than driving; it implies the effort to persuade by presenting motives, but is also used where the persuasion is only figurative: as, I was at last induced to go; he was induced by my example. Incite, prompt, instigate are used only when motives irrespective of physical force are the actuating power. Incite is weaker than impel and stronger than prompt; it expresses more eagerness than impel; it implies the urging of men toward the objects of kindled feelings and generally of strong desire. Prompt is more general in its meaning, depending upon its connection for force and limitation; it is often preferred for its brevity and breadth of application. Instigate, to goad on, is sometimes, but erroneously, used of incitement to good; it should be used only where the urging is toward evil. It generally implies that such urging is underhand, although that fact is sometimes explicitly stated: he was (secretly) instigated to his perfidy.

It is observed by Cicero that men of the greatest and most shining parts are most actuated by ambition. Addison.

Thus we see that human nature is impelled by affections of gratitude, esteem, veneration, joy, not to mention various others. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 13.

Desire with thee still longer to converse Induced me. Milton, P. L., viii. 253.

If thou dost love, my kindness shall incite thee
To bind our loves up in a holy band.
Shak., Much Ado, iii. 1.

More apt
To slacken Virtue, and abate her edge,
Than prompt her to do aught may merit praise.
Milton, P. R., ii. 456.

With the education she had received, she could look on this strange interruption of her pilgrimage only as a special assault upon her faith, instigated by those evil spirits that are ever setting themselves in conflict with the just. Mrs. Stowe, Agnes of Sorrento, xxv.

actuate† (ak'ṭū-āt), a. [< ML. actuatus, pp. of actuare: see the verb.] Put into action. South. [Rare.]

actuation (ak-ṭū-ā'shọn), n. A putting in motion or operation; communication of active energy or force.

I have presupposed all things distinct from him to have been produced out of nothing by him, and consequently to be posterior not only to the motion, but the actuation of his will. Bp. Pearson, Expos. of Creed, iv.

actuator (ak'ṭū-ā-ṭọr), n. One who or that which actuates or puts in action. [Rare.]

actuose† (ak'ṭū-ōs), a. [< L. actuosus, full of activity, < actus, action: see act, n.] Having the power of action; having strong powers of action; abounding in action.

actuosity (ak-ṭū-os'i-ti), n. [= Pg. actuosidade, < L. as if actuosita(t-)s*, < actuosus: see actuose.] 1†. Power or state of action. [Rare.]—2. In metaph., a state of activity which is complete in itself, without leading to any result that must be regarded as its completion.

That actuosity in which the action and its completion coincide, as to think, to see. J. Hutchison Stirling.

acture† (ak'ṭūr), n. [< act + -ure.] Actual operation or performance. Shak., Lover's Complaint, l. 185.

acturience (ak-tū'ri-ens), n. [< L. as if acturien(t-)s*, ppr. of an assumed acturire*, desire to act, < actus, pp. of agere, do, act, + -urire, desiderative suffix. Cf. esurient, parturient.] A desire for action. Grote. [Rare.]

acuitíon† (ak-ū-ish'ọn), n. [< ML. acuitio(n-), < L. acuere, sharpen: see acute, a.] The act of rendering sharp, literally or figuratively. Specifically—(a) The sharpening of medicines to increase their effect, as by the addition of a mineral acid to a vegetable acid. (b) The highest sound (accent) in the pronunciation of a word.

acuity (a-kū'i-ti), n. [< F. acuité, < ML. acuita(t-)s, irreg. < L. acuere, sharpen: see acute, a., and -ity.] Sharpness; acuteness.

[The] acuity or bluntness of the pin that bears the card. Perkins, Magnetic Needle, Hist. Royal Soc., IV. 18.

Many of them [Eskimos] . . . being endowed with the acuity of vision peculiar to nomads and hunters. Arc. Cruise of the Corwin, 1881, p. 24.

Aculeata (a-kū-lē-ā'tạ), n. pl. [L., neut. pl. of aculeatus, furnished with stings: see aculeate, a.] 1. A name given by Latreille, 1802, to a group of hymenopterous insects in which the abdomen of the females and neuters is armed with a sting, consisting of two fine spicula with reverted barbs, connected with a poison-reservoir. The group includes bees and wasps.—2†. In mammal., an artificial group of spiny rodents, composed of the genera Hystrix and Loncheres. Illiger, 1811.

aculeate (a-kū'lē-āt), a. and n. [< L. aculeatus, furnished with stings, thorny, prickly, < aculeus, a sting, prickle: see aculeus.] I. a. 1. In zoöl., furnished with a sting; pertaining to or characteristic of the Aculeata.—2. In bot., furnished with aculei or sharp prickles; aculeous.—3. Figuratively, pointed; stinging.

II. n. A hymenopterous insect, one of the Aculeata.

aculeate (a-kū'lē-āt), v. t. [< L. aculeatus: see aculeate, a.] To make pointed; sharpen. [Rare.]

aculeated (a-kū'lē-ā-ted), p. a. [< aculeate + -ed[2].] 1. Armed with prickles.—2. Pointed; sharp; incisive.

aculei, n. Plural of aculeus.

aculeiform (a-kū'lē-i-fôrm), a. [< L. aculeus, prickle, + -formis, < forma, shape.] Formed like a prickle.

aculeolate (a-kū'lē-ō-lāt), a. [< NL. aculeolatus, < L. aculeolus, dim. of aculeus, a sting, prickle: see aculeus.] In bot., having small prickles or sharp points. A. Gray.

aculeous (a-kū'lē-us), a. [< aculeus + -ous.] In bot., same as aculeate.

aculeus (a-kū'lē-us), n.; pl. aculei (-ī). [L., a sting, prickle, spine, dim. of acus, a needle: see acus.] 1. The poison-sting of the aculeate hymenopterous insects, as bees, wasps, etc. See Aculeata.—2. In bot., a prickle; a slender, rigid, and pointed outgrowth from the bark or epidermis, as in the rose and blackberry, in distinction from a thorn, which grows from the wood.

acumen (a-kū'men), n. [L., a point, sting, fig. acuteness, < acuere, sharpen: see acute.] 1. Quickness of perception; the faculty of nice discrimination; mental acuteness or penetration; keenness of insight.

His learning, above all kings christened, his acumen, his judgment, his memory. Sir E. Coke, K. James's Proc. agt. Garnet, sig. G, p. 3b.

Individual insight and acumen may point out consequences of an action which bring it under previously known moral rules. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 135.

2. In bot., a tapering point. =Syn. 1. Penetration, discernment, acuteness, sharpness, perspicacity, insight.

acuminate (a-kū'mi-nāt), v.; pret. and pp. acuminated, ppr. acuminating. [< L. acuminatus, pp. of acuminare, sharpen, < acumen, a point: see acumen.] I. trans. To bring to a point; render sharp or keen: as, "to acuminate despair," Cowper, Letters, p. 172. [Rare, except in the past participle.]

This is not acuminated and pointed, as in the rest, but seemeth, as it were, cut off. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

II. intrans. To taper or rise to a point. [Obsolete, except in the present participle.]

They [the bishops], . . . acuminating still higher and higher in a cone of prelaty, instead of healing up the gashes of the church, . . . fall to gore one another with their sharp spires, for upper places and precedence. Milton, Church Gov., i.

★acuminate (a-kū'mi-nāt), a. [< L. acuminatus, pp.: see the verb.] Pointed; acute. Specifically—(a) In bot., having a long, tapering termination: applied to leaves and other organs. When the narrowing takes place at the base it is so expressed, for example, acuminate at the base; when the word is used without any limitation it always refers to the apex. (b) In ornith., applied in a similar sense to the feathers of birds; tapering.

Acuminate Leaf.

acumination (a-kū-mi-nā'shọn), n. [< L. as if acuminatio(n-)*, < acuminare: see acuminate, v.] 1. The act of acuminating, or the state of being acuminated; a sharpening; termination in a sharp point.—2. A sharp and tapering point; a pointed extremity.

The coronary thorns . . . did also pierce his tender and sacred temples to a multiplicity of pains, by their numerous acuminations. Bp. Pearson, Expos. of Creed, iv.

3. Acuteness of intellect; acumen. [Rare.]

Wits, which erect and inscribe, with notable zeal and acumination, their memorials in every mind they meet with. Waterhouse, Apol. for Learning (1653), p. 190.

acuminose (a-kū'mi-nōs), a. [< NL. acuminosus, < L. acumen, point: see acumen.] In bot., having a sharp or tapering point. [Rare.]

acuminous (a-kū'mi-nus), a. [< acumen (-min-) + -ous. Cf. acuminose.] 1. Characterized by acumen; sharp; penetrating.—2. Same as acuminose.

acuminulate (ak-ū-min'ū-lāt), a. [< L. as if acuminulum*, dim. of acumen, a point, + -ate[1]; after acuminate.] Somewhat or slightly acuminate. [Rare.]

acupress (ak'ū-pres), v. t. [< L. acus, a needle, abl. acu, with a needle, + press.] In surg., to apply acupressure to, as a bleeding artery.

acupression (ak-ū-presh'ọn), n. [< L. acus, a needle, + pressio(n-), pressure.] Same as acupressure.

acupressure (ak'ū-presh-ūr), n. [< L. acus, a needle, + pressura, pressure: see pressure.] In surg., a method (first published by Sir J. Y. Simpson in 1859) of stopping hemorrhage in arteries during amputations, etc., consisting in pressing the artery closely by means of a pin or needle or bit of inelastic wire, introduced through the sides or flaps of the wound, instead of tying with a thread. There are various modes of inserting the pin.

acupuncturation (ak-ū-pungk-ṭū-rā′shon), n. A pricking with or as if with a needle; the practice of acupuncture. [Rare.]

acupuncturator (ak-ū-pungk′ṭū-rā-tor), n. A needle, or battery of needles, used in the operation of acupuncture.

acupuncture (ak′ū-pungk-ṭūr), n. [< L. acus, a needle, + punctura, a pricking: see puncture.] 1. A surgical operation consisting in the insertion of delicate needles in the tissues. This operation has been practised for ages in many parts of the world. Apart from the employment of needles to evacuate a morbid fluid, as in edema, or to set up an inflammation, as in ununited fractures, acupuncture has been mostly used for myalgic, neuralgic, and other nervous affections. 2. A mode of infanticide in some countries, consisting in forcing a needle into the brain of the child.

acupuncture (ak′ū-pungk-ṭūr), v. t.; pret. and pp. acupunctured, ppr. acupuncturing. In surg., to perform the operation of acupuncture upon.

acurse†, v. t. See accurse.

acus (ā′kus), n.; pl. acus. [L. acus (acu-), a needle or pin, as being pointed; cf. acuere, make sharp or pointed: see acute, a.] 1. A needle, especially one used for surgical purposes.—2. In archæol., sometimes, the pin of a brooch or fibula.—3. [cap.] (a†) A genus of fishes. Johnston, 1650. (b) A genus of mollusks. Humphreys, 1797. See Terebra.—Acus cannulata, a trocar, or a tubular needle for discharging fluids.—Acus interpunctoria, a couching-needle, used in operations for cataract.—Acus ophthalmica, a needle used in operations for ophthalmia or cataract.—Acus triquetra, a three-sided needle; a trocar.

Acusidæ (a-kō′si-dē), n. pl. [NL., irreg. < Acus, 3 (b), + -idæ.] Same as Terebridæ.

acustom†, acustomance†, etc. See accustom, accustomance, etc.

acutangular (a-kūt′ang″gū-lär), a. Same as acute-angular. Warburton.

acutate (a-kū′tāt), a. [< acute + -ate[1].] Slightly pointed.

acute (a-kūt′), a. [< L. acutus, sharp, pp. of acuere, sharpen, < √ ac*, be sharp, pierce: see acid.] 1. Sharp at the end; ending in a sharp point or angle: opposed to blunt or obtuse. Specifically applied, (a) in bot., to a leaf or other organ ending in a sharp angle; (b) in geom., to an angle less than a right angle. See acute-angled.

Acute Leaves.

2. Sharp or penetrating in intellect; possessing keenness of insight or perception; exercising nice discernment or discrimination: opposed to dull or stupid: as, "the acute and ingenious author," Locke.—3. Manifesting intellectual keenness or penetration; marked or characterized by quickness of perception or nice discernment: applied to mental endowments and operations: as, acute faculties or arguments.

Leigh Hunt, whose feminine temperament gave him acute perceptions at the expense of judgment.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 261.

4. Having nice or quick sensibility; susceptible of slight impressions; having power to feel or perceive small or distant objects or effects: as, a man of acute eyesight, hearing, or feeling.

Were our senses made much quicker and acuter, the appearance and outward scheme of things would have quite another face to us. Locke.

The acute hearing of the Veddahs is shown by their habit of finding bees' nests by the hum.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 40.

5. Keen; sharp; intense; poignant: said of pain, pleasure, etc.—6. High in pitch; shrill: said of sound: opposed to grave. See acute accent, below.—7. In pathol., attended with more or less violent symptoms and coming speedily to a crisis: applied to a disease: as, an acute pleurisy: distinguished from subacute and chronic.—Acute accent. (a) Utterance of a single sound, as a syllable of a word, at a higher pitch than others; accentual stress of voice. (b) A mark (′) used to denote accentual stress, and also for other purposes. To denote stress in English, it is now generally placed after the accented syllable, as in this dictionary, but sometimes over the vowel of that syllable. The latter is done regularly in such Greek words as take this accent, and in all Spanish words the accentuation of which varies from the standard rule. In some languages it is used only to determine the quality or length of vowel-sounds, as on e in French (as in été), and on all the vowels in Hungarian; and in Polish and other Slavic languages it is also placed over some of the consonants to mark variations of their sounds. For other uses, see accent, n.—Acute angle. See angle[3].—Acute ascending paralysis. See Landry's paralysis, under paralysis.—Acute bisectrix. See bisectrix.—Syn. 1. Keen, etc. See sharp.—2 and 3. Acute, Keen, Shrewd, penetrating, piercing, sharp-witted, bright. (See subtle.) An acute mind pierces a subject like a needle; a keen mind has a fine, incisive edge, like a knife. Keen may be the most objective of these words. An acute answer is one that shows penetration into the subject; a keen answer unites with acuteness a certain amount of sarcasm, or antagonism to the person addressed; a shrewd answer is one that combines remarkable acuteness with wisdom as to what it is practically best to say. Shrewd differs from acute and keen by having an element of practical sagacity or astuteness. Only keen has the idea of eagerness: as, he was keen in pursuit. See astute and sharp.

Powers of acute and subtle disputation. Sir J. Herschel.

The tongues of mocking wenches are as keen
As is the razor's edge invisible. Shak., L. L. L., v. 2.

Mother-wit and the common experiences of life do often furnish people with a sort of shrewd and sound judgment that carries them very creditably through the world.
J. Morley, Popular Culture, p. 303.

acute (a-kūt′), v. t. To render acute in tone. [Rare.]

He acutes his rising inflection too much. Walker, Dict.

acute-angled (a-kūt′ang″gld), a. Having sharp or acute angles, or angles less than right angles.—Acute-angled triangle, a triangle that has each of its angles less than a right angle.

acute-angular (a-kūt′ang″gū-lär), a. 1. Having an angle less than a right angle; acute-angled.—2. In bot., having stems with sharp corners or edges, as labiate plants.

Also written acutangular.

acutely (a-kūt′li), adv. In an acute manner; sharply; keenly; with nice discrimination.

acutenaculum (ak″ū-tē-nak′ū-lum), n.; pl. acutenacula (-lä). [< L. acus, needle, + tenaculum, holder, < tenere, hold.] In surg., a needle-holder used during operations.

Acutenaculum, or Needle-holder.

acuteness (a-kūt′nes), n. The quality of being acute. (a) The quality of being sharp or pointed.

The lance-shaped windows form at their vertex angles of varying degrees of acuteness. Oxford Glossary.

(b) The faculty of nice discernment or perception; quickness or keenness of the senses or understanding. [By an acuteness of the senses or of mental feeling we perceive small objects or slight impressions; by an acuteness of intellect we discern nice distinctions.]

He [Berkeley] was possessed of great acuteness and ingenuity, but was not distinguished for good sense or shrewdness. McCosh, Berkeley, p. 53.

There may be much of acuteness in a thing well said, but there is more in a quick reply.
Dryden, Pref. to Mock Astrol.

(c) In rhet. or music, sharpness or elevation of sound. (d) In pathol., violence of a disease, which brings it speedily to a crisis.

acutiator† (a-kū′shi-ā-tor), n. [ML., < acutiare, sharpen, < L. acutus, sharp: see acute, a. Cf. aiguisé.] In the middle ages, a person whose duty it was to sharpen weapons. Before the invention of firearms such persons were necessary attendants of armies.

acutifoliate (a-kū-ti-fō′li-āt), a. [< L. acutus, sharp, + foliatus, leaved: see foliate.] In bot., having sharp-pointed leaves. A. Gray.

Acutilingues (a-kū-ti-ling′gwēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. acutus, sharp, + lingua = E. tongue.] A division of Andrenidæ, containing those solitary bees whose labium is acute at the end: distinguished from Obtusilingues, in which the labium is obtuse.

acutilobate (a-kū-ti-lō′bāt), a. [< L. acutus, sharp, + NL. lobatus, lobate: see lobate.] In bot., having acute lobes: said of certain leaves. A. Gray.

acuto-nodose (a-kū-tō-nō′dōs), a. [< L. acutus, sharp, + nodosus, knotted: see nodose.] Acutely nodose. Dana. (N. E. D.) acuyari-wood (ä-kö-yä′ri-wud), n. The aromatic wood of the tree Protium altissimum of Guiana.

-acy. [(1) Directly, or through ME. and OF. -acie, < ML. -acia, < LL. -atia, forming nouns of quality, state, or condition from nouns in -a(t-)s, as in abb-acy, < LL. abb-at-ia, < abb-a(t-)s, abbot; prim-acy, < F. prim-atie, < LL. prim-at-ia, < prim-a(t-)s, primate, etc. (2) < LL. -atia, forming nouns of state from nouns in -atus, as in advoc-acy, < LL. advoc-at-ia, < L. advoc-at-us, advocate, etc. (3) < L. -acia, forming nouns of quality from adjectives in -ax (-aci-), as in fall-acy, < L. fall-aci-a, < fall-ax (-aci-), deceptive, etc. These three sources of -acy were more or less confused, and the suffix has been extended to form many nouns which have no corresponding form in L., as in cur-acy, accur-acy, etc. Analogy has extended -acy, < L. -atia, to some words of Gr. origin: (4) < L. -atia, < Gr. -ατεια, as in pir-acy, < LL. pir-atia*, < Gr. πειρατεία, < πειρατής, pirate; similarly in -cracy, q. v. Hence the short form -cy, esp. in designations of office, as in captain-cy, ensign-cy, cornet-cy, etc.] A suffix of Latin or Greek origin, forming nouns of quality, state, condition, office, etc., from nouns in -ate (which becomes -ac-, the suffix being -ate changed to -ac-, + -y), as in primacy, curacy, advocacy, piracy, etc., or from adjectives in -acious, as in fallacy.

acyanoblepsy (a-sī″a-nō-blep′si), n. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + κύανος, a blue substance, blue (see cyanide), + -βλεψία, < βλέπειν, see, look on.] A defect of vision, in consequence of which the color blue cannot be distinguished.

acyclic (a-sik′lik), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + κυκλικός, circular: see a-[18] and cyclic.] In bot., not cyclic; not arranged in whorls. Applied by Braun to flowers that have a spiral arrangement of parts, when the spiral turns made by each class of organs are not all complete, in distinction from hemicyclic, where all are complete.

Braun has termed such flowers acyclic, when the transition from one foliar structure to another, as from calyx to corolla or from corolla to stamens, does not coincide with a definite number of turns of the spiral (as Nymphæaceæ and Helleborus odorus); hemicyclic when it does so coincide. Sachs, Botany (trans.), p. 523.

acyprinoid (a-sip′ri-noid), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. (a-[18]) + cyprinoid.] In zoögeog., characterized by the absence of cyprinoid fishes: applied to one of the fresh-water divisions of the equatorial zone, embracing the tropical American and tropical Pacific regions. Günther.

ad-. [< L. ad-, prefix, ad, prep., to, unto, toward, upon, for, etc., = AS. æt, E. at, q. v. In later L. ad- before b, c, f, g, l, n, p, q, r, s, t, was assimilated, as ab-, ac-, af-, ag-, al-, an-, ap-, ac-, ar-, as-, at- (see ab-breviate, ac-cuse, af-fect, ag-gravate, al-lude, an-nex, ap-plaud, ac-quiesce, ar-rogate, as-sist, at-tract). Before sc-, sp-, st-, it was reduced to a- (see a-scend, a-spire, a-stringent, and a-[12]). Before d, h, j, m, before vowels, and often in other cases, it remained unchanged. In OF. ad- with all its variants was reduced to a-, and was so adopted into ME. But in the 14th and 15th centuries a fashion of "restoring" the L. spelling (ad-, ac-, af-, etc.) began to prevail, and soon became the rule in both F. and E., though F. still retains many, and E. a few, of the old forms (see ac-company, ad-dress, af-front, ag-grieve, al-lay[2], al-low, an-nounce, ap-peal, ar-rest, at-tend, etc.). By confusion of the ME. a-, for ad-, ac-, af-, etc., with ME. a- of other origin (< L. ab-, OF. en-, es-, AS. ā-, ge-, on-, etc.), the latter a- has been in some cases erroneously "restored" to ad-, ac-, af-, etc., as in ad-vance, ac-cloy, ac-curse, ac-knowledge, af-ford, af-fray, al-lay[1], ad-miral, etc.] 1. A prefix of Latin origin, with primary sense "to," and hence also "toward, upon, for," etc., expressing in Latin, and so in English, etc., motion or direction to, reduction or change into, addition, adherence, intensification, etc., in English often without perceptible force. According to the following consonant, it is variously assimilated ab-, ac-, af-, etc., or reduced to a-. See etymology.—2. A prefix of various other origin, erroneously put for other prefixes, as in advance, etc. See etymology.

-ad[1]. [< L. -as (-ad-), < Gr. -ας (-αδ-), fem. suffix equiv. to -ις (-ιδ-): see -id[2].] A suffix of Greek origin appended to nouns. It is used in forming—(1) collective numerals, as monad, dyad, triad, tetrad, etc., terms used in classifying chemical elements or radicals according to the number of their combining units; (2) feminine patronymics (= -id), as in dryad, Pleiades, etc. (see -adæ, -idæ); hence used in Ἰλιάς (Ἰλιαδ-), Iliad, and in the titles of poems named in imitation of it, as Dunciad, Columbiad: compare Æneid, Thebaid; (3) by Lindley, family names of plants akin to a genus, as liliad, trilliad, etc., on words ending in -a or after a vowel; otherwise -id, as in orchid.

-ad[2]. [< F. -ade: see -ade[1].] A suffix in ballad and salad (formerly balade and salade), usually represented by -ade. See -ade[1].

-ad[3]. [A mod. use of L. ad, to.] In anat., a suffix denoting relation, situation, or direction, having the same force as the English suffix -ward, or the word toward. Thus, dorsad, backward, toward the dorsum or back; ectad, outward, toward the exterior; entad, inward, toward the interior. So, also, cephalad, headward, forward; dextrad, to the right, on the right hand of, etc. It is used almost at will, with either Greek or Latin words. Its use is advantageous as restricting the idea of direction to the body of the animal itself, without considering the position in which that body may be with relation to externals; since, for example, what is backward in the anatomy of man when in the erect posture is upward in that of a quadruped when in the correlatively natural horizontal attitude, while in both it is equally dorsad.

ad. An abbreviation of advertisement.

A. D. An abbreviation of the Latin phrase anno Domini, in the year of the Lord: as, A. D. 1887.

-ada. [Sp. Pg. -ada = It. -ata = F. -ée, < L. -āta, fem. of -ātus: see -ade[1], -ate[1].] A suffix of Latin origin, the Spanish feminine form of -ade[1], -ate[1], as in armada: in English sometimes, erroneously, -ado, as in bastinado, Spanish bastinada.

Adacna (a-dak'nä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + δάκνειν, bite.] The typical genus of the family Adacnidæ (which see). Eichwald, 1838.

adacnid (a-dak'nid), n. A bivalve mollusk, of the family Adacnidæ.

Adacnidæ (a-dak'ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Adacna + -idæ.] A family of dimyarian bivalve mollusks, typified by the genus Adacna. The animals which compose this family have elongated, nearly united siphons, and a compressed foot; the shell, which gapes behind, has a sinuated pallial line and a nearly toothless hinge, or the teeth merely rudimentary. The species are chiefly inhabitants of the Aral, Caspian, and Black seas and neighboring waters.

adact† (a-dakt'), v. t. [< L. adactus, pp. of adigere, drive to, < ad, to, + agere, drive.] To drive; coerce. Fotherby, Atheomastix, p. 15.

adactyl, adactyle (a-dak'til), a. Same as adactylous.

adactylous (a-dak'ti-lus), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv., without, + δάκτυλος, digit: see dactyl.] In zoöl., without fingers or toes.

adad† (ą-dad'), interj. [A var. of egad.] An expletive of asseveration or emphasis.

-adæ†. [NL., < Gr. -αδαι, pl. of -ας, after -ι-, equiv. to -ιδης after a consonant or another vowel: see -idæ.] In zoöl., a suffix equivalent to -idæ, forming names of families of animals. See -idæ.

adæmonist (a-dē'mon-ist), n. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + δαίμων, a demon (see demon), + -ist.] One who denies the existence or personality of the devil.

adag, attac (ad'ag, at'ak), n. [< Gael. adag, a haddock; perhaps borrowed from E. haddock.] A local name of the haddock, used about Moray frith in Scotland. Gordon.

adaga (a-dä'gä), n. [Pg. adaga, a dagger, a short sword. Cf. adargue (?).] An Asiatic weapon, having a short, broad blade at right angles with a staff which serves as a handle. R. F. Burton, Book of the Sword.

adage (ad'āj), n. [< F. adage, < L. adagium (collateral form adagio), < ad, to, + -agium, < aio (orig. agio*), I say, = Gr. ἠμί, I say, = Skt. √ ah, say.] A pithy saying in current use; a brief familiar proverb; an expression of popular wisdom, generally figurative, in a single phrase or sentence, and of remote origin.

> Unless the adage must be verified,
> That beggars, mounted, run their horse to death.
> Shak., 3 Hen. VI., i. 4.

=Syn. Aphorism, Axiom, Maxim, etc. See aphorism.

adagial† (ą-dā'ji-ąl), a. Of the nature of or containing an adage: as, "that adagial verse," Barrow, Works, I. 93.

adagietto (ą-dä-jiet'tō), n. [It., dim. of adagio, q. v.] In music: (a) A short adagio. (b) An indication of time, signifying somewhat faster ★than adagio.

adagio (ą-dä'jiō), adv., a., and n. [It., slowly, lit. at leisure, < ad, to, + agio, leisure, ease: see ease.] In music: I. adv. Slow; slowly, leisurely, and with grace. When repeated, adagio, adagio, it directs the performance to be very slow.

II. a. Slow: as, an adagio movement.

III. n. A slow movement; also, a piece of music or part of a composition characterized by slow movement.

adagy† (ad'ą-ji), n. Same as adage.

Adalia (a-dā'li-ą), n. [NL. (Mulsant, 1851), an invented name.] A genus of beetles, of the family Coccinellidæ. The commonest species is A. bipunctata, the two-spotted lady-bird, having a black head with two yellow spots on each side, the prothorax black and marked with yellow, the scutellum black, and the elytra yellowish with a central round black spot on each. ★The insect is useful in destroying plant-lice.

Adam (ad'ąm), n. [< L. Adam (and Adamus), < Gr. Ἀδάμ (and Ἄδαμος), < Heb. 'ādām, a human being, associated in popular etym. with 'adāmāh, earth, and later with 'ādam, be red.] 1. A generic name, meaning 'man,' applied in Genesis to the first human being, and hence taken, later, as his specific or personal name.—2. The evil inherent in human nature, regarded as inherited from Adam.

> Consideration like an angel came,
> And whipp'd the offending Adam out of him.
> Shak., Hen. V., i. 1.

3†. A serjeant or bailiff. This sense rests chiefly on the following quotation, and is explained by the commentators as a reference to the fact that the buff worn by the bailiff resembled the native "buff" of our first parent.

> Not that Adam that kept the paradise, but that Adam that keeps the prison. Shak., C. of E., iv. 3.

Adam and Eve, the popular name in the United States for a certain terrestrial orchid, Aplectrum spicatum.—Adam's ale, Adam's wine, water, as being the only beverage in Adam's time: sometimes called Adam. [Colloq.]

> A Rechabite poor Will must live,
> And drink of Adam's ale.
> Prior, Wandering Pilgrim.
>
> Sirrah, . . . go bring
> A cup of cold Adam from the next purling spring.
> Tom Brown, Works, IV. 11.

Adam's apple. (a) Pomum Adami, the prominence on the fore part of the throat formed by the anterior part of the thyroid cartilage of the larynx: so called from the notion that a piece of the forbidden fruit stuck in Adam's throat. The protuberance is specially noticeable in the male sex after puberty, as the larynx enlarges in boys at the time when the change in the voice occurs. (b) A variety of the lime, Citrus medica, with a depression which is fancifully regarded in Italy as the mark of Adam's teeth. See Citrus. (c) A name sometimes given to the plantain, the fruit of Musa paradisiaca.—Adam's flannel, the common mullen, Verbascum Thapsus.—Adam's needle and thread, a common name of Yucca filamentosa.

adamant (ad'ą-mant), n. [< ME. adamant, adamaunt, ademaunt, adamaund, also athamant, atthamant, etc. (after AS. athamans), and admont, < OF. adamaunt, ademaunt, in popular form aïmant = Pr. adiman, aziman, ayman = Sp. Pg. iman, < ML. adimas* (adimant-*), L. adamas (adamant-), < Gr. ἀδάμας (ἀδαμαντ-), lit. unconquerable (< ἀ- priv. + δαμᾶν, conquer, = L. domare = E. tame, q. v.), first used (by Homer) as a personal epithet; later (in Hesiod and subsequent writers) as the name of a very hard metal such as was used in armor—prob. steel, but endowed by imaginative writers with supernatural powers of resistance; in Plato, also of a metal resembling gold; in Theophrastus, of a gem, prob. a diamond; in Pliny, of the diamond, under which he includes also, perhaps, corundum; in Ovid, of the magnet; in later writers regarded as an anti-magnet. The name has thus always been of indefinite and fluctuating sense. From the same source, through the perverted ML. forms diamans, diamentum, comes E. diamant, diamond, q. v.] 1. A name applied with more or less indefiniteness to various real or imaginary metals or minerals characterized by extreme hardness: as (1) the diamond, (2) the natural opposite of the diamond, (3) a lodestone or magnet, and (4) an anti-magnet.

> The garnet and diamond, or adamant.
> Sullivan, Views of Nature, I. 438. (N. E. D.)
>
> The adamant cannot draw yron, if the diamond lye by it. Lyly, Euphues, sig. K, p. 10. (N. E. D.)
>
> The grace of God's spirit, like the true loadstone or adamant, draws up the iron heart of man to it.
> Bp. Hall, Occas. Med., p. 52.
>
> The adamant . . . is such an enemy to the magnet.
> Leonardus, Mirr. Stones, p. 63. (N. E. D.)

2. In general, any substance of impenetrable or surpassing hardness; that which is impregnable to any force. [It is chiefly a rhetorical or poetical word.]

> As an adamant harder than flint have I made thy forehead. Ezek. iii. 9.
>
> But who would force the soul, tilts with a straw > Against a champion cased in adamant.
> Wordsworth, Persecution of Covenanters, iii. 7.

adamanteant† (ad''ą-man-tē'an), a. [< L. adamanteus, < adamas, adamant: see adamant.] Hard as adamant. [Rare.]

> Chalybean temper'd steel, and frock of mail > Adamantean proof. Milton, S. A., l. 134.

★adamantine (ad-ą-man'tin), a. [< L. adamantinus, < Gr. ἀδαμάντινος, < ἀδάμας: see adamant.] 1. Made of adamant; having the qualities of adamant; impenetrable.

> In adamantine chains shall death be bound.
> Pope, Messiah, l. 47.
>
> Each gun
> From its adamantine lips
> Flung a death-cloud round the ships.
> Campbell, Battle of Baltic.

2. Resembling the diamond in hardness or in luster.—Adamantine hards, in U. S. pol. hist. See hard, n.—Adamantine spar. (a) A very hard, hair-brown variety of corundum, often of adamantine or diamond-like luster. It yields a very hard powder used in polishing diamonds and other gems. (b) Corundum, from its hardness or peculiar occasional luster. See corundum.

adamantoid (ad-ą-man'toid), n. [< Gr. ἀδάμας (ἀδαμαντ-), adamant, diamond, + εἶδος, form: see -oid.] A crystal characterized by being bounded by 48 equal triangles; a hexoctahedron. See cut under hexoctahedron.

adambulacral (ad-am-bū-lā'kral), a. [< L. ad, to, + ambulacrum, q. v.] Adjacent to the ambulacra. Applied in zoöl., by way of distinction from ambulacral, to a series of ossicles in echinoderms which lie at the sides of the ambulacral grooves, and against which the ambulacral ossicles abut. See cut under Asteriidæ.

Adamhood (ad'ąm-hůd), n. Adamic or human nature; manhood. Emerson. [Rare.]

Adamic (a-dam'ik), a. 1. Relating or pertaining to Adam or to his descendants: as, the Adamic world; Adamic descent.

> Prof. Winchell, of course, takes the ground that the older or black race is of an inferior type to the subsequent or, as he calls them, the Adamic races.
> Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 500.
>
> I have stated these supposed conditions of the Adamic creation briefly. Dawson, Origin of World, p. 239.

2. Resembling Adam before the fall; naked; unclothed.—Adamic earth, common red clay, so called from a notion that Adam means red earth.

Adamical (a-dam'i-kal), a. Relating or related to Adam; Adamic.

Adamically (a-dam'i-kal-i), adv. After the manner of Adam; nakedly.

> Halbert standing on the plunging stage Adamically, without a rag upon him. H. Kingsley, Geoff. Ham., xlvi.

adamine (ad'ą-min), n. Same as Adamite, 4.

Adamite (ad'ą-mīt), n. [< Adam + -ite[2].] 1. One of mankind; one of the human race considered as descended from Adam.—2. One of that section of mankind more particularly regarded as the offspring of Adam, in contradistinction to a supposed older race, called Preadamites.

> Prof. Winchell's pamphlet on Adamites and Preadamites. Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 500.

3. [LL. Adamitæ, pl.] One of a sect which originated in the north of Africa in the second century, and pretended to have attained to the primitive innocence of Adam. Its members accordingly rejected marriage as an effect and clothing as a sign of sin, and appeared in their assemblies, called paradises, naked. This heresy reappeared in the fourteenth century, in Savoy, and again in the fifteenth century among the Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit, in Germany, Bohemia, and Moravia. It was suppressed in 1421 on account of the crimes and immoralities of its votaries. (See Picard and Picardist.) When toleration was proclaimed by Joseph II., in 1781, the sect revived, but was promptly proscribed. Its latest appearance was during the insurrection of 1848–9.

> The truth is, Teufelsdröckh, though a Sans-culottist, is no Adamite, and, much perhaps as he might wish to go forth before this degenerate age "as a sign," would nowise wish to do it, as those old Adamites did, in a state of nakedness. Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, p. 40.

4. [l. c.] [After the French mineralogist M. Adam + -ite[2].] A mineral occurring in small yellow or green crystals and in mammillary groups; a hydrous arseniate of zinc, isomorphous with olivenite: found in Chili, at Laurium in Greece, and elsewhere. Also adamine.

Adamitic (ad-ą-mit'ik), a. [< Adamite + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the descendants of Adam; pertaining to mankind; human.

> He [Mr. Webster] was there in his Adamitic capacity, as if he alone of all men did not disappoint the eye and the ear, but was a fit figure in the landscape.
> Emerson, Fugitive Slave Law.

2. Of, pertaining to, or resembling the sect of the Adamites.

> Nor is it other than rustic or Adamitic impudence to confine nature to itself.
> Jer. Taylor (?), Artif. Handsomeness, p. 164.

Adamitical (ad-ą-mit'i-kal), a. Same as Adamitic.

Adamitism (ad'ą-mīt-izm), n. [< Adamite + -ism.] 1. The doctrines of the Adamites.—2. The practice of dispensing with clothing, as did the Adamites, or the state of being unclothed. See Adamite, 3.

adamsite (ad'ąmz-īt), n. [For C. B. Adams, an American geologist.] A greenish-black mica found in Derby, Vermont.

adance (ą-dans'), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3], on, + dance.] Dancing.

> [You cannot] prevent Béranger from setting all pulses a-dance in the least rhythmic and imaginative of modern tongues. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 238.

Adansonia (ad-an-sō'ni-ą), n. [NL.; named in honor of Michel Adanson (died 1806), a French naturalist who traveled in Senegal in 1749–53.] A small genus of trees belonging to the family Bombacaceæ. A. digitata is the African calabash-tree, or baobab-tree of Senegal. See baobab. A. Gregorii, the only other species, is the cream-of-tartar tree of northern Australia. See cream-of-tartar tree, under cream.

Adapidæ (a-dap'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Adapis + -idæ.] A family of extinct lemuroid mammals, of which the genus Adapis is the type.

Adapis (ad'ą-pis), n. [NL.; a name applied by Gesner, about 1550, to the common rabbit. Etym. unknown; referred doubtfully to Gr. ἀ- intensive + δάπις, a rug, carpet.] A genus of extinct mammals of the Eocene or Lower Tertiary age, described from portions of three skulls found by Cuvier in the gypsum-quarries of Montmartre, Paris, and by him referred to his order Pachydermata, and considered as related in some respects to Anoplotherium. The animal was of about the size of a rabbit. Subsequent investigations, based upon additional material, have shown Adapis to be the type of a family Adapidæ, representing a generalized form of the lemurine series (Pachylemurinæ, Filhol) of the order Primates.

★adapt (ą-dapt'), v. t. [< F. adapter = It. adattare, < L. adaptare, fit to, < ad, to, + aptare, make fit, < aptus, fit: see apt.] 1. To make suitable; make to correspond; fit or suit; proportion.

A good poet will adapt the very sounds, as well as words, to the things he treats of. Pope, Letters.

The form and structure of nests, that vary so much, and are so wonderfully adapted to the wants and habits of each species. A. R. Wallace, Nat. Selec., p. 216.

Two errors are in common vogue in regard to instinct: first, that it never errs; secondly, that it never adapts itself to changed circumstances.
Maudsley, Body and Will, § 5.

2. To fit by alteration; modify or remodel for a different purpose: as, to adapt a story or a foreign play for the stage; to adapt an old machine to a new manufacture.—3. To make by altering or fitting something else; produce by change of form or character: as, to bring out a play adapted from the French; a word of an adapted form. = Syn. 1. To adjust, accommodate, conform.—2. To arrange.

adapt† (ą-dapt'), a. [Short for adapted, prob. suggested by apt.] Adapted; fit; suitable.

If we take this definition of happiness, and examine it with reference to the senses, it will be acknowledged wonderfully adapt. Swift, Tale of a Tub, ix.

[Providence] gave him able arms and back
To wield a flail and carry sack,
And in all stations active be,
Adapt to prudent husbandry.
D'Urfey, Colin's Walk, i.

adaptability (ą-dap-tą-bil'i-ti), n.; pl. adaptabilities (-tiz). [< adaptable: see -bility.] 1. The quality of being adaptable; a quality that renders adaptable.

No wonder that with such ready adaptabilities they [Norwegians] made the best of emigrants. The overflow of population which once directed itself in such rude fashion on Normandy and England now finds its way to the United States, and no incomers are more welcome there. Froude, Sketches, p. 77.

2. Specifically, in biol., the capacity for responding to changes in external conditions by advantageous modification of structure or conduct; the capacity of an organism to be advantageously modified.

adaptable (ą-dap'tą-bl), a. [< adapt + -able.] Capable of or given to adapting one's self or things to new conditions or uses.

Yet, after all, thin, speculative Jonathan is more like the Englishman of two centuries ago than John Bull himself is. He has lost somewhat in solidity, has become fluent and adaptable, but more of the original groundwork of character remains.
Lowell, Introd. to Biglow Papers, 1st ser.

adaptableness (ą-dap'tą-bl-nes), n. Adaptability.

★adaptation (ad-ap-tā'shon), n. [< F. adaptation, < ML. adaptatio(n-), < L. adaptare: see adapt, v.] 1. The act of adapting or adjusting; the state of being adapted or fitted; adjustment to circumstances or relations.

Government, . . . in a just sense, is, if one may say so, the science of adaptations—variable in its elements, dependent upon circumstances, and incapable of a rigid mathematical demonstration.
Story, Misc. Writings, p. 616.

Must we not expect that, with a government also, special adaptation to one end implies non-adaptation to other ends? H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 303.

2. That which is adapted; the result of altering for a different use. Specifically, a play translated or constructed from a foreign language or a novel, and rendered suitable for representation: as, this comedy is a free adaptation from a French author.

3. In biol., advantageous modification of animals or plants in accordance with changed conditions; the result of adaptability to external conditions; the operation of external influences upon a plastic organism, or a character supposed to be acquired by the organism as the result of such operation. It is sometimes regarded as one of two principal factors in the evolution of organic forms, inducing those changes which it is the tendency of the opposite factor, heredity, to counteract, the result being the balance between adaptation and heredity, or the diagonal of the parallelogram of forces which adaptation and heredity represent.

Adaptation is commenced by a change in the functions of organs, so that the physiological relations of organs play the most important part in it. Since adaptation is merely the material expression of this change of function, the modification of the function as much as its expression is to be regarded as a gradual process. As a rule, therefore, adaptation can be perceived by its results only in a long series of generations, while transmission [i. e., heredity] can be recognised in every generation.
Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 9.

adaptational (ad-ap-tā'shon-al), a. Relating or pertaining to adaptation, or the adjustment of one thing to another; adaptive: in biol., applied to physiological or functional modifications of parts or organs, as distinguished from morphological or structural changes.

adaptative (ą-dap'tą-tiv), a. [< L. adaptatus, pp. of adaptare, adapt (see adapt, v.), + -ive.] Of or pertaining to adaptation; adaptive. [Rare.]

adaptativeness (ą-dap'tą-tiv-nes), n. Adaptability.

adaptedness (ą-dap'ted-nes), n. The state of being adapted; suitableness; fitness.

The adaptedness of the Christian faith to all such [the poor and oppressed], which was made a reproach against it by supercilious antagonists, constitutes one of its chief glories. G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 545.

★adapter (ą-dap'tėr), n. 1. One who adapts, or makes an adaptation; specifically, one who translates, remodels, or rearranges a composition or work, rendering it fit to be represented on the stage, as a play from a foreign tongue or from a novel.

And, if these imaginary adapters of Homer modernized his whole diction, how could they preserve his metrical effects? De Quincey, Homer, iii.

2. That which adapts; anything that serves the purpose of adapting or adjusting one thing to another. Specifically—3. In chem., a receiver with two necks diametrically opposite, one of which admits the neck of a retort, while the other is joined to a second receiver. It is used in distillations to give more space to elastic vapors, or to increase the length of the neck of a retort.

4. In optics: (a) A metal ring uniting two lengths of a telescope. (b) An attachment to a microscope for centering the illuminating apparatus or throwing it out of center. E. H. Knight. (c) A means for enabling object-glasses made by different makers, and having different screws, to be fitted to a body not specially adapted to receive them. E. H. Knight. —5. A glass or rubber tube, with ends differing in size, used to connect two other tubes or two pieces of apparatus.

adaption (ą-dap'shon), n. [< adapt + -ion. Cf. adoption, < adopt.] Adaptation; the act of fitting. [Rare.]

Wise contrivances and prudent adaptions. Cheyne.

adaptional (ą-dap'shon-al), a. Relating or pertaining to adaptation, or the action of adapting: in biol., applied to the process by which an organism is fitted or adapted to its environment: as, adaptional swellings.

adaptitude (ą-dap'ti-tūd), n. [< adapt + -itude, after aptitude.] Adaptedness; special aptitude. Browning.

adaptive (ą-dap'tiv), a. [< adapt + -ive. Cf. adaptative.] Of, pertaining to, or characterized by adaptation; making or made fit or suitable; susceptible of or undergoing accordant change. Much used in biology with reference to functional or physiological adjustment to external conditions or environment, as opposed to homological. See adaptation, 3.

The adaptive power, that is, the faculty of adapting means to proximate ends.
Coleridge, Aids to Reflec., p. 178.

The function of selective discrimination with the complementary power of adaptive response is regarded as the root-principle of mind. Science, IV. 17.

In the greater number of Mammals, the bones assume a very modified and adaptive position.
W. H. Flower, Osteology, p. 242.

These resemblances, though so intimately connected with the whole life of the being, are ranked as merely "adaptive or analogical characters."
Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 374.

adaptively (ą-dap'tiv-li), adv. In an adaptive manner; with adaptation; in an adjusted or fitting manner; with fitness: as, "adaptively modified structures," Owen, Class. of Mammalia.

adaptiveness (ą-dap'tiv-nes), n. The quality of being adaptive; capability of making or becoming fit or suitable.

adaptly† (ą-dapt'li), adv. In a suitable or convenient manner; aptly; fitly.

For active horsemanship adaptly fit.
Prior, Colin's Mist., iii. 3.

adaptness† (ą-dapt'nes), n. The state of being fitted; adaptation; aptness: as, "adaptness of the sound to the sense," Bp. Newton, Milton.

adaptorial (ad-ap-tō'ri-al), a. [< adapt + -ory + -al.] Tending to adapt or fit; adaptive. [Rare.]

Adar (ą-där'), n. [Heb. and Aram. 'adār, < Bab. and Assyr. addaru.] A Hebrew month, the sixth of the civil and the twelfth of the ecclesiastical year, corresponding to the latter part of February and the first part of March.

adarce (a-där'sē), n. [L., also adarca, < Gr. ἀδάρκη or ἀδάρκης, also ἄδαρκος, a word of foreign origin.] A saltish concretion on reeds and grass in marshy grounds, noted especially in ancient Galatia, Asia Minor. It is soft and porous, and has been used to cleanse the skin in leprosy, tetters, and other diseases.

adargue†, n. [OSp., of Ar. origin.] An Arabic weapon like a broad dagger.

adarkon (a-där'kon), n. [Heb.; deriv. uncertain; by some writers connected with the name Darius: see daric.] A gold coin (also called darkemon) mentioned in the original text of the book of Ezra, etc., as in use among the Jews, and translated dram in the authorized version. It was a foreign coin, probably the Persian daric (which see), and is so rendered in the revised version.

adarme (ä-där'mā), n. [Sp. adarme, a dram; a- perhaps represents the Ar. art. al, the, and -darme the L. drachma: see drachma and dram.] A Spanish weight, a drachm, the 16th part of an ounce, or the 256th part of a pound, equal (in Castile) to $1\frac{7}{10}$ avoirdupois drachms. Another form is adareme. In their origin, avoirdupois weight and the Spanish system were identical.

adarticulation (ad-är-tik-ū-lā'shon), n. [< ad- + articulation.] Same as arthrodia.

adati† (ad'ą-ti), n. [Also written adaty, pl. adatis, adaties, etc.; of E. Ind. origin. Cf. Beng. ādat (cerebral d) or ārat, a warehouse, a general store.] A kind of piece-goods exported from Bengal.

adaunt† (a-dänt'), v. t. [< ME. adaunten, < OF. adanter, adonter, later addomter, < a- + danter, donter, daunt: see *a-*11 and daunt.] To subdue.

Adaunted the rage of a lyon savage.
Skelton, Hercules.

adaw1† (a-dâ'), v. [< ME. adawen, < a- + dawen, E. dial. daw: see *a-*1 and *daw*1.] I. intrans. To wake up; awake; come to.

But sire, a man that wakith out of his slep,
He may not sodeynly well taken keep Upon a thing, ne seen it parfytly,
Til that he be adawed verrayly.
Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 1156.

II. trans. To awaken; arouse from sleep or swoon. Chaucer.

adaw2† (a-dâ'), v. [First used in 16th century; perhaps < ME. adawe, of dawe, of daze, or in fuller phrase of lyfe dawe, usually with verb bringen or don, lit. bring or do (put) 'out of (life) day,' i. e., kill, hence the sense quell, subdue, assisted prob. by an erroneous etym. < ad- + awe, and prob. also by association with adaunt. The form daw, daunt, is later: see *daw*4.] I. trans. 1. To daunt; quell; cow.

The sight whereof did greatly him adaw.
Spenser, F. Q., III. vii. 13.

2. To moderate; abate.

Gins to abate the brightnesse of his beme,
And fervour of his flames somewhat adaw.
Spenser, F. Q., V. ix. 35.

II. intrans. To become moderated or less vehement.

Therewith her wrathfull courage gan appall,
And haughtie spirits meekely to adaw.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. vi. 26.

adawlet (ą-dâ'let), n. [Also written adawlut, < Hind. 'adālat, < Ar. 'adāla(t), a court of justice, < Hind. and Ar. 'adl, justice.] In the East Indies, a court of justice, civil or criminal.

adawn (ą-dân'), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< *a*3 + dawn.] Dawning; at the point of dawn.

aday† (a-dā'), prep. phr. as adv. [< ME. aday, adai; < *a*3 + *day*1.] 1. By day.—2. On each day; daily.

Now written a day, sometimes a-day. See *a*3.

adays (ą-dāz'), prep. phr. as adv. [< ME. adayes, a dayes, a daies; < *a*3 + days, adverbial gen. sing. (now regarded as acc. pl.) of day.] 1†. By day; in the daytime.

I have miserable nights; . . . but I shift pretty well adays. Johnson to Mrs. Thrale, Mch. 19, 1771.

2. On or in the day or time: only in the compound phrase nowadays (which see).

adaze† (ą-dāz'), v. t. [< ME. adasen, < a- + dasen, daze: see daze.] To dazzle. Sir T. More.

ad capt. An abbreviation of ad captandum.

ad captandum (ad kap-tan'dum). [L.: ad, to, for; captandum, gerund of captare, catch, seize, < capere, take: see captive.] For the purpose of catching, as in the phrase ad captandum vulgus, to catch the rabble: often applied adjectively to claptrap or meretricious attempts to catch popular favor or applause: as, ad captandum oratory.

adcorporate† (ad-kôr'pō-rāt), v. t. [See accorporate.] To unite, as one body with another; accorporate.

★add (ad), v. [< ME. adden, < L. addere, < ad, to, + -dere for dare*, put, place: see do.] I. trans. 1. To join or unite into one sum or aggregate. Specifically, in math., to find the sum of two or more quantities, or a combination of them into which each enters with its full effect and independently of the others, so that an increase of any one of the added quantities produces an equal increase of the sum: used with together or up: as, to add numbers together; to add or add up a column of figures.

2. To unite, join, attach, annex, or subjoin as an augmentation or accretion; bring into corporate union or relation: with to before the subject of addition, and sometimes without an expressed object when this is implied by the subject: as, add another stone, or another stone to the pile; he continually added [goods or possessions] to his store; to add to one's grief.

> Ye shall not add [anything] unto the word which I command you. Deut. iv. 2.
>
> And, to add greater honours to his age
> Than man could give him, he died fearing God.
> Shak., Hen. VIII., iv. 2.
>
> [I] add thy name,
> O sun, to tell thee how I hate thy beams.
> Milton, P. L., iv. 36.
>
> They added ridge to valley, brook to pond,
> And sighed for all that bounded their domain.
> Emerson, Hamatreya.

3†. To put into the possession of; give or grant additionally, as to a person.

> The Lord shall add to me another son. Gen. xxx. 24.
>
> For length of days, and long life, and peace, shall they add to thee. Prov. iii. 2.

Added money, in sporting, money added by a jockey club to sweepstakes.—Added sixth, in music. See sixth.—Add in, to include.—Add up, to find the sum of.—Syn. Add, Attach, Affix, Annex, adduce, adjoin. The first four words agree in denoting the increasing of a thing by something additional. Add is the most general term, but it may denote an intimate union of the things combined, the formation of a whole in which the parts lose their individuality: as, to add water to a decoction; to add one sum to another. This idea is not expressed by any of the others. Attach (as also affix and annex) denotes a more external combination; it implies the possibility of detaching that which is attached: as, to attach a locomotive to a train. Hence we do not attach, but add, on fluid to another. It generally retains its original notion of a strong connection, physical, moral, or other: as, to attach a condition to a gift, a tag to a lace, or one person to another. Affix may be used either of that which is essential to the value or completeness of the whole, or of something that is wholly extrinsic or unrelated: as, to affix a signature or seal to an instrument; to affix a notice to a post. To annex sometimes brings the parts into vital relation: as, to annex territory, a codicil to a will, or a penalty to a prohibition.

> Care to our coffin adds a nail, no doubt.
> Dr. John Wolcot, Expost. Odes, xv.
>
> Their names cling to those of the greater persons to whom some chance association attached them.
> Mrs. Oliphant, Lit. Hist. of 19th Cent., III. 150.
>
> In affixing his name, an attesting witness is regarded as certifying the capacity of the testator. Am. Cyc., XIV. 24.
>
> Since the French nation has been formed, men have proposed to annex this or that land on the ground that its people spoke the French tongue.
> E. A. Freeman, Race and Language, p. 111.

II. intrans. 1. To be or serve as an addition; be added: with to: as, the consciousness of folly often adds to one's regret. [Really transitive in this use, with the object implied or understood. See I., 2.]—2. To perform the arithmetical operation of addition.

adda[1] (ad'ä), n. [Egypt.] A small species of Egyptian lizard, Scincus officinalis; the skink. It is called "officinal" on account of the repute in which it has been held by Eastern physicians for its alleged efficacy in the cure of elephantiasis, leprosy, and certain other diseases common in the East. See skink and Scincus.

adda[2] (ad'ä), n. [Telugu adda (cerebral d).] A measure used in India, equal to 8½ pints. McElrath, Com. Dict.

addability (ad-a-bil'i-ti), n. [< addable: see -bility.] The quality of being addable. Also written addibility.

addable (ad'a-bl), a. [< add + -able.] Capable of being added. Also written addible.

addax (ad'aks), n. [L., in acc. addacem, occurring in Pliny, who treats of the animal under the name of strepsiceros, i. e., the twisted-horn; a north African name, still used, it is said, in the forms addas, and akas, akesh.] 1. The native name of a species of African antelope, a ruminant, hoofed, artiodactyl quadruped, of the subfamily Antilopinæ, family Bovidæ; the Antilope addax of Lichtenstein, Oryx addax of some, Oryx nasomaculatus of others, now Addax nasomaculatus: the word addax thus becoming technically a generic name, after having been a technical specific term, as well as originally a vernacular appellation. The addax is about 6 feet long, and about 3 feet high at the shoulder; stout in the body, like the ass; and with horns 3 or 4 feet long, slender, ringed, spirally twisted into two or three turns, Addax of Eastern Africa (A. nasomaculatus).

and present in both sexes. The ears and tail are long, the latter terminated by a switch of hair; there are tufts of hair upon the throat, forehead, and tear-bag; the hoofs are large and semicircular, adapted for treading upon the shifting sands of the desert. The general color of the animal is whitish, with a reddish-brown head and neck, black hoofs, and a white blaze on the face, whence the name nasomaculatus. The addax is related to the oryx, but is generically as well as specifically distinct. The identity of this animal with that mentioned by Pliny (see etymology), though known to Gesner, was overlooked by subsequent naturalists until rediscovered by the travelers Rüppell, Hemprich, and Ehrenberg, who found the animal known to the natives under a name like that ascribed to the strepsiceros by Pliny.

2. [cap.] A genus of antelopes of the subfamily Oryginæ, of which the addax, A. nasomaculatus, is the only species.

addebted†, a. [Sc.; at first addettit, addetted, for earlier endetted: see indebted.] Indebted.

addecimate† (a-des'i-māt), v. t. [< L. addecimatus, pp. of addecimare, < ad, to, + decimare, take the tenth: see decimate.] To take or ascertain the tithe or tenth part of; tithe; decimate. Cockeram.

addeem† (a-dēm'), v. t. [< ad- + deem. Cf. addoom.] 1. To award; adjudge; sentence.

> Unto him they did addeeme the prise.
> Spenser, F. Q., V. iii. 15.

2. To deem; judge; esteem; account.

> She scorns to be addeemed so worthless-base.
> Daniel, Civil Wars.

addendum (a-den'dum), n.; pl. addenda (-dä). [L., gerund of addere, add: see add.] A thing to be added; an addition; an appendix to a work.—Addendum-circle (of a gear), in mach., a circle which touches the ends of the teeth.—Addendum of a tooth, in mach., that part of the tooth of a gear which projects beyond the pitch-circle.

★adder[1] (ad'ėr), n. [< ME. adder, addere, addre, edder, eddre, etc., forms interchanging with the more correct nadder, naddere, naddre, nadre, neddere, neddre, etc. (through confusion of a nadder with an adder; cf. apron, auger, orange, umpire, which have lost their initial n in the same way), < AS. nædre, næddre = OS. nadra = D. adder = OHG. natara, natra, MHG. natere, nater, G. natter = Icel. nathra, f., nathr, m., = Goth. nadrs = Ir. nathair = W. neidr, a snake, a serpent. The L. natrix, a water-snake, is a different word, prop. a swimmer, < nare, swim. The word has no connection with atter, poison, q. v.] 1. The popular English name of the viper, Vipera communis, now Pelias berus, a common venomous serpent of Europe (and the only poisonous British reptile), belonging to the family Viperidæ, of the suborder Solenoglypha, of the order Ophidia. It grows to a length of about 2 feet, of which the tail constitutes one eighth; the head is oval, with a blunt snout; the color varies from brown or olive to brownish-yellow, variegated with a row of large confluent rhombic spots along the middle line of the back, and a row of small black or blackish spots on each side. Though the adder is venomous, its bite is not certainly known to be fatal.

Adder, or Viper (Pelias berus).

2. A name loosely applied to various snakes more or less resembling the viper, Pelias berus: as—(a) By the translators of the authorized version of the Bible, to several different species of venomous serpents. (b) By the translators of Haeckel, to the suborder Aglyphodonta. (c) By the translators of Cuvier, to the Linnean genus Coluber in a large sense. (d) In the United States, to various spotted serpents, venomous or harmless, as species of Toxicophis, Heterodon, etc.

3. The sea-stickleback or adder-fish. See adder-fish.

adder[2] (ad'ėr), n. [< add + -er[1].] 1. One who adds.—2. An instrument for performing addition.

adder-bead (ad'ėr-bēd), n. [< adder[1] + bead.] Same as adder-stone.

adder-bolt (ad'ėr-bōlt), n. [< adder[1] + bolt[1], from the shape of the body.] The dragon-fly. [Prov. Eng.]

adder-fish (ad'ėr-fish), n. [< adder[1] + fish[1].] The sea-stickleback, Spinachia vulgaris, a fish of the family Gasterosteidæ, distinguished by an elongated form and the development of numerous dorsal spines. Also called adder and sea-adder.

adder-fly (ad'ėr-flī), n. [< adder[1] + fly[2].] A name in Great Britain of the dragon-fly. Also called adder-bolt and flying adder. See dragon-fly.

adder-gem (ad'ėr-jem), n. [< adder[1] + gem.] Same as adder-stone.

adder-grass (ad'ėr-gràs), n. [< adder[1] + grass.] A name used in the south of Scotland for Orchis maculata.

adder-pike (ad'ėr-pīk), n. [< adder[1] + pike[1].] A local English name of the fish commonly called the lesser weever, Trachinus vipera. Also called otter-pike. See weever.

adder's-fern (ad'ėrz-fėrn), n. The common polypody, Polypodium vulgare.

adder's-flower (ad'ėrz-flou″ėr), n. The red campion, Lychnis dioica.

adder's-meat (ad'ėrz-mēt), n. A name sometimes given (a) to the English wake-robin, Arum maculatum (see cut under Arum), and (b) to a chickweed, Alsine Holostea.

adder's-mouth (ad'ėrz-mouth), n. A delicate orchid, Malaxis unifolia, found in cool damp woods in North America, with a raceme of minute greenish flowers, and a single leaf shaped somewhat like the head of a snake.

adder-spit (ad'ėr-spit), n. [< adder[1] + spit[2].] The common brake, Pteridium aquilinum.

adder's-spear (ad'ėrz-spēr), n. Same as adder's-tongue.

adder-stone (ad'ėr-stōn), n. [< adder[1] + stone.] The name given in different parts of Great Britain to certain rounded perforated stones or glass beads found occasionally, and popularly supposed to have a supernatural efficacy in curing the bites of adders. They are believed by archæologists to have been anciently used as spindle-whorls, that is, small fly-wheels intended to keep up the rotary motion of the spindle. Some stones or beads of this or a similar kind were by one superstitious tradition said to have been produced by a number of adders putting their heads together and hissing till the foam became consolidated into beads, supposed to be powerful charms against disease. Also called ovum anguinum, serpent-stone, adder-bead, adder-gem, and in Wales glain-neidr and druidical bead. The last name is given upon the supposition that these objects were used as charms or amulets by the Druids.

> And the potent adder-stone,
> Gender'd 'fore the autumnal moon,
> When in undulating twine
> The foaming snakes prolific join.
> W. Mason, Caractacus.

★adder's-tongue (ad'ėrz-tung), n. The fern Ophioglossum vulgatum: so called from the form of its fruiting spike. Also called adder's-spear. See Ophioglossum.—Yellow adder's-tongue, a name given to the plant Erythronium Americanum.

adder's-violet (ad'ėrz-vī″ō-let), n. The rattlesnake-plantain, Peramium pubescens, a low orchid of North America, with conspicuously white-veined leaves.

adder's-wort (ad'ėrz-wėrt), n. The bistort, Polygonum Bistorta: so named from its writhed roots. Called snakeweed, for the same reason.

addibility (ad-i-bil'i-ti), n. See addability.

addible (ad'i-bl), a. See addable.

addice† (ad'is), n. An obsolete form of adz.

addicent (ad'i-sent), n. [< L. addicen(t-)s, ppr. of addicere: see addict, v.] One who authoritatively transfers a thing to another. N. E. D.

addict (a-dikt'), v. t. [< L. addictus, pp. of addicere, devote, deliver over, prop. give one's assent to, < ad, to, + dicere, say, declare.] 1. To devote or give up, as to a habit or occupation; apply habitually or sedulously, as to a practice or habit: used reflexively: as, to addict one's self to the exercise of charity; he is addicted (addicts himself) to meditation, pleasure, or intemperance. [Now most frequently used in a bad sense.]

They have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints. 1 Cor. xvi. 15.

I advise thee . . . to addict thyself to the Study of Letters. Cotton, tr. of Montaigne (2d ed.), I. 385.

2†. To give over or surrender; devote, attach, or assign; yield up, as to the service, use, or control of: used both of persons and of things.

Yours entirely addicted, madam. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iv. 3.

The land about is exceedingly addicted to wood. Evelyn, Diary, April 18, 1680.

Specifically—3. In Rom. law, to deliver over formally by the sentence of a judge, as a debtor to the service of his creditor. = Syn. 1. Addict, Devote, Apply, accustom. These words, where they approach in meaning, are most used reflexively. Addict and devote are often used in the passive. Addict has quite lost the idea of dedication; it is the yielding to impulse, and generally a bad one. Devote retains much of the idea of service or loyalty by vow; hence it is rarely used of that which is evil. Addicted to every form of folly; devoted to hunting, astronomy, philosophy. Apply is neutral morally, and implies industry or assiduity: as, he applied himself to his task, to learning.

The Courtiers were all much addicted to Play. Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 7.

We should reflect that the earliest intellectual exercise to which a young nation devotes itself is the study of its laws. Maine, Village Communities, p. 380.

That we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Ps. xc. 12.

addict† (a-dikt'), a. [< L. addictus, pp.: see the verb.] Addicted.

If he be addict to vice,
Quickly him they will entice. Shak., Pass. Pil., xxi.

addictedness (a-dik'ted-nes), n. The quality or state of being addicted.

My former addictedness to make chymical experiments. Boyle.

addiction (a-dik'shon), n. [< L. addictio(n-), delivering up, awarding, < addicere: see addict, v.] 1. The state of being given up to some habit, practice, or pursuit; addictedness; devotion.

His addiction was to courses vain. Shak., Hen. V., i. 1.

From our German forefathers we inherit our phlegm, our steadiness, our domestic habitudes, and our unhappy addiction to spirituous liquors. W. R. Greg, Misc. Essays, 2d ser., p. 13.

Southey, in a letter to William Taylor, protests, with much emphasis, against his addiction to words "which are so foreign as not to be even in Johnson's farrago of a dictionary." F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 135.

2. In Rom. law, a formal giving over or delivery by sentence of court; hence, a surrender or dedication of any one to a master. N. E. D.

ad diem (ad dī'em). [L.: ad, at, to; diem, acc. of dies, day: see dies, dial.] In law, at the day.

★adding-machine (ad'ing-ma-shēn'), n. [< adding, verbal n. of add, + machine.] An instrument or a machine intended to facilitate or perform the addition of numbers. See calculating-machine, arithmometer.

addist†, n. An obsolete form of adz.

Addisonian (ad-i-sō'ni-an), a. [The surname Addison, ME. Adeson, is equiv. to Adamson, i. e., Adam's son. Cf. Atchison.] Pertaining to or resembling the English author Joseph Addison or his writings: as, an Addisonian style.

It was no part of his plan to enter into competition with the Addisonian writers. The Century, XXVII. 927.

Addison's cheloid (ad'i-sonz kē'loid). See kelis.

Addison's disease (ad'i-sonz di-zēz'). See disease.

additament (ad'i-ta-ment), n. [< L. additamentum, an increase, < additus, pp. of addere, add: see add.] An addition; something added.

In a palace . . . there are certain additaments that contribute to its ornament and use. Sir M. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

In Hawthorne, whose faculty was developed among scholars, and with the finest additaments of scholarship, we have our first true artist in literary expression. The Century, XXVI. 293.

additamentary (ad''i-ta-men'ta-ri), a. Pertaining to or of the nature of an additament; additional.

The numerous . . . additamentary bones which are met with in old cases of osteo-arthritis. T. Holmes, Syst. of Surg., IV. 27.

★addition (a-dish'on), n. [< ME. addicion, -oun, < F. addition, < L. additio(n-), < addere, increase: see add.] 1. The act or process of adding or uniting, especially so that the parts remain independent of one another: opposed to subtraction or diminution: as, a sum is increased by addition; to increase a heap by the addition of more. Specifically, in arith., the uniting of two or more numbers in one sum; also, that branch of arithmetic which treats of such combinations. Simple addition is the adding of numbers, irrespective of the things denoted by them, or the adding of sums of the same denomination, as pounds to pounds, ounces to ounces, etc. Compound addition is the adding of sums of different denominations, as pounds, shillings, and pence to pounds, shillings, and pence, like being added to like. The addition of all kinds of multiple quantity is performed according to the principle of compound addition; thus, the addition of two complex quantities is effected by adding the real parts together to get the new real part, and the imaginary parts to get the new imaginary part. Logical addition is a mode of combination of terms, propositions, or arguments, resulting in a compound (the sum), true if any of the elements are true, and false only if all are false.

2. The result of adding; anything added, whether material or immaterial.

Her youth, her beauty, innocence, discretion,
Without additions of estate or birth,
Are dower for a prince indeed. Ford, Lover's Melancholy, v. 1.

Specifically—(a) In law, a title or designation annexed to a man's name to show his rank, occupation, or place of residence: as, John Doe, Esq.; Richard Roe, Gent.; Robert Dale, Mason; Thomas Way, of Boston. Hence—(b) An epithet or any added designation or description: a use frequent in Shakspere, but now obsolete.

They clepe us drunkards, and with swinish phrase Soil our addition. Shak., Hamlet, i. 4.

This man, lady, hath robbed many beasts of their particular additions; he is as valiant as the lion, churlish as the bear, slow as the elephant. Shak., T. and C., i. 2.

(c†) In music, a dot at the side of a note indicating that its sound is to be lengthened one half. (d) In her., same as augmentation. (e) In distilling, anything added to the wash or liquor when in a state of fermentation.—Exercise and addition. See exercise.—Geometrical addition, or addition of vectors, the finding of a vector quantity, S, such that if the vectors to be added are placed in a linear series, each after the first beginning where the one before it ends, then, in whatever order they are taken, if S be made to begin where the first of the added vectors begins, it ends where the last ends. = Syn. 1. Adding, annexation.—2. Superaddition, appendage, adjunct, increase, increment, extension, enlargement, augmentation.

addling[2] (ad'ling), n. [Verbal n. of addle[2], v.] 1. The act of earning by labor.—2. pl. That which is earned; earnings. Also written adlings. [North. Eng.]

addoom† (a-dōm'), v. t. [< ad- + doom. Cf. addeem.] To adjudge.

Unto me addoom that is my dew. Spenser, F. Q., VII. vii. 56.

addorsed, p. a. See adorsed.

address (a-dres'), v.; pret. and pp. addressed (also adrest), ppr. addressing. [< ME. adressen, < OF. adresser, adressier, adresier, earlier adrescer, adrecer, adrecier, etc., F. adresser = Pr. adreysar = Sp. aderezar = Pg. adereçar = It. addirizzare, < ML. addirectiare* (addretiare, addressare, etc.) for addrectiare*, < ad, to, + drictiare*, directiare*, make straight, > OF. drescer, dresser, > E. dress: see a-[11], ad-, and dress, v.] I. trans. 1†. Primarily, to make direct or straight; straighten, or straighten up; hence, to bring into line or order, as troops (see dress); make right in general; arrange, redress, as wrongs, etc. N. E. D.—2†. To direct in a course or to an end; impart a direction to, as toward an object or a destination; aim, as a missile; apply directly, as action. [Still used, in the game of golf, in the phrase "to address a ball," and directly, as action.

Imbrasides addrest his javeline at him. Chapman, Iliad.

Good youth, address thy gait unto her;
Be not denied access, stand at her doors.
Shak., T. N., i. 4.

3. To direct the energy or force of; subject to the effort of doing; apply to the accomplishment of: used reflexively, with to: as, he addressed himself to the work in hand.

This was a practical question, and they [the framers of the American Constitution] addressed themselves to it as men of knowledge and judgment should.
Lowell, Democracy.

4. To direct to the ear or attention, as speech or writing; utter directly or by direct transmission, as to a person or persons: as, to address a warning to a friend, or a petition to the legislature.

The young hero had addressed his prayers to him for his assistance. Dryden.

The supplications which Francis [Bacon] addressed to his uncle and aunt were earnest, humble, and almost servile. Macaulay, Lord Bacon.

5. To direct speech or writing to; aim at the hearing or attention of; speak or write to: as, to address an assembly; he addressed his constituents by letter.

Though he [Cæsar] seldom addresses the Senate, he is considered as the finest speaker there, after the Consul.
Macaulay, Fragments of a Roman Tale.

Straightway he spake, and thus address'd the Gods.
M. Arnold, Balder Dead.

6. To apply in speech; subject to hearing or notice: used reflexively, with to: as, he addressed himself to the chairman.

Our legislators, our candidates, on great occasions even our advocates, address themselves less to the audience than to the reporters. Macaulay, Athenian Orators.

7. To direct for transmission; put a direction or superscription on: as, to address a letter or parcel to a person at his residence; to address newspapers or circulars.

Books . . . not intended for . . . the persons to whom they are addressed, but . . . for sale, are liable to customs duties upon entering . . . Colombia. U. S. Postal Guide.

8. To direct attentions to in courtship; pay court to as a lover.

To prevent the confusion that might arise from our both addressing the same lady, I shall expect the honour of your company to settle our pretensions in King's Mead Fields. Sheridan.

She is too fine and too conscious of herself to repulse any man who may address her.
Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 316.

9. To prepare; make ready: often with to or for.

Turnus addressed his men to single fight.
Dryden, Æneid.

To-morrow for the march are we address'd.
Shak., Hen. V., iii. 3.

Hence—10†. To clothe or array; dress; adorn; trim.

Other writers and recorders of fables could have told you that Tecla sometime addressed herself in man's apparel. Bp. Jewell, Def. of Apologie, p. 375.

11. In com., to consign or intrust to the care of another, as agent or factor: as, the ship was addressed to a merchant in Baltimore.—To address the ball, in golf, to take up one's position preparatory to striking the ball.

II.† intrans. 1. To direct speech; speak.

My lord of Burgundy,
We first address towards you. Shak., Lear, i. 1.

2. To make an address or appeal.

Let us address to tend on Hector's heels.
Shak., T. and C., iv. 4.

They ended parle, and both address'd for fight.
Milton, P. L., vi. 296.

address (a-dres'), n. [=F. adresse, n.; from the verb.] 1. Power of properly directing or guiding one's own action or conduct; skilful management; dexterity; adroitness: as, he managed the affair with address.

Here Rhadamanthus, in his travels, had collected those inventions and institutions of a civilized people, which he had the address to apply to the confirmation of his own authority. J. Adams, Works, IV. 505.

There needs no small degree of address to gain the reputation of benevolence without incurring the expense.
Sheridan, School for Scandal, v. 1.

2. Direction or guidance of speech; the act or manner of speaking to persons; personal bearing in intercourse; accost: as, Sir is a title of address; he is a man of good address. Hence —3. The attention paid by a lover to his mistress; courtship; pl. (more commonly), the acts of courtship; the attentions of a lover: as, to pay one's addresses to a lady.

As some coy nymph her lover's warm address
Not quite indulges, nor can quite repress.
Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 19.

Tell me whose address thou favour'st most.
Addison, Cato, i. 4.

A gentleman . . . made his addresses to me. Addison.

4. An utterance of thought addressed by speech to an audience, or transmitted in writing to a person or body of persons; usually, an expression of views or sentiments on some matter of direct concern or interest to the person or persons addressed; a speech or discourse suited to an occasion or to circumstances: as, to deliver an address on the events of the day; an address of congratulation; the address of Parliament in reply to the queen's speech.

It was, therefore, during a period of considerable political perturbation that Mr. Bright put forth an address dated January 31st, 1837.
J. Barnett Smith, John Bright, p. 23.

5. A formal request addressed to the executive by one or both branches of a legislative body, requesting it to do a particular thing.

The Constitutions of England, of Massachusetts, of Pennsylvania, authorized the removal of an obnoxious judge on a mere address of the legislature.
H. Adams, John Randolph, p. 132.

The power of address, whenever it has been used in this commonwealth, has been used to remove judges who had not violated any law. W. Phillips, Speeches, p. 161.

6. A direction for guidance, as to a person's abode; hence, the place at which a person resides, or the name and place of destination, with any other details, necessary for the direction of a letter or package: as, what is your present address? the address or superscription on a letter.

Mrs. Dangle, shall I beg you to offer them some refreshments, and take their address in the next room?
Sheridan, The Critic, i. 2.

7. In equity pleading, the technical description in a bill of the court whose remedial power is sought.—8. In com., the act of despatching or consigning, as a ship, to an agent at the port of destination.—9†. Formerly used in the sense of preparation, or the state of preparing or being prepared, and in various applications arising therefrom, as an appliance, array or dress, etc. N. E. D.—Syn. 1. Tact, cleverness.—2. See port.—4. Oration, Harangue, etc. (see speech), lecture, discourse, sermon.—6. Residence, superscription.

addressee (a-dres-ē'), n. [< address, v., + -ee[2].] One who is addressed; specifically, one to whom anything is addressed.

The postmaster shall also, at the time of its arrival, notify the addressee thereof that such letter or package has been received.
Reg. of the U. S. P. O. Dep., 1874, iii. § 52.

addresser (a-dres'ėr), n. One who addresses or petitions. Specifically (with or without a capital letter), in the reign of Charles II. of England, a member of the country party, so called from their address to the king praying for an immediate assembly of the Parliament, the summons of which was delayed on account of its being adverse to the court; an opponent of the court party or Abhorrers. They also received the name of Petitioners, and afterward that of Whigs. See abhorrer.

addressful (a-dres'fūl), a. Skilful; dexterous. ★Mallet.

addressing-machine (a-dres'ing-ma-shēn″), n. An apparatus for placing addresses on newspaper-wrappers, etc. See the supplement.

To Pylos first be thy addression then.
Chapman, Odyssey, i. 438.

addressment† (a-dres'ment), n. [< F. adressement (Cotgrave): see address and -ment.] The act of addressing; the act of directing one's attention, speech, or effort toward a particular point, person, or object.

addubitation† (a-dū-bi-tā'shon), n. [< L. addubitatus, pp. of addubitare, incline to doubt, < ad, to, + dubitare, doubt: see doubt.] A doubting; insinuated doubt.

That this was not a vniuersall practice, it may appeare by St. Austins addubitation.
J. Denison, Heavenly Banquet (1619), p. 353.

adduce (a-dūs'), v. t.; pret. and pp. adduced, ppr. adducing. [< L. adducere, lead or bring to, < ad, to, + ducere, lead: see duct, duke.] To bring forward, present, or offer; advance; cite; name or instance as authority or evidence for what one advances.

Reasons good
I shall adduce in due time to my peers.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 313.

The speculations of those early Christian theologians who adduced the crying of the new-born babe in proof of its innate wickedness. J. Fiske, Cos. Phil., I. 105.

—Syn. Adduce, Allege, Assign, Advance, Offer, Cite. Offer and assign are the least forcible of these words. To offer is simply to present for acceptance. We may offer a plea, an apology, or an excuse, but it may not be accepted. We may assign a reason, but it may not be the real or only reason which might be given by us. We may advance an opinion or a theory, and may cite authorities in support of it. Allege is the most positive of all these words. To allege is to make an unsupported statement regarding something; to adduce, on the other hand, is to bring forward proofs or evidence in support of some statement or proposition already made: as, he alleged that he had been robbed by A. B., but adduced no proof in support of his allegation.

I too prize facts, and am adducing nothing else.
Channing, Perfect Life, p. 177.

To allege the real or supposed primeval kindred between Magyars and Ottomans as a ground for political action . . . is an extreme case.
E. A. Freeman, Race and Language.

To some such causes as you have assigned, may be ascribed the delay which the petition has encountered.
Washington, in Bancroft's Hist. Const., I. 372.

The views I shall advance in these lectures.
Beale, Bioplasm, § 2.

If your arguments be rational, offer them in as moving a manner as the nature of the subject will admit. Swift.

adduceable (a-dū'sa-bl), a. [< adduce + -able.] See adducible.

adducent (a-dū'sent), a. [< L. adducen(t-)s, ppr. of adducere: see adduce.] Bringing together; drawing one thing to or toward another; performing the act of adduction; having the function of an adductor: opposed to abducent: chiefly or exclusively an anatomical term, applied to certain muscles or to their action. See adductor, a.

adducer (a-dū'sėr), n. One who adduces.

adducible (a-dū'si-bl), a. [< adduce + -ible.] Capable of being adduced. Sometimes (but very rarely) spelled adduceable.

Here I end my specimens, among the many which might be given, of the arguments adducible for Christianity.
J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 478.

adduct (a-dukt'), v. t. [< L. adductus, pp. of adducere: see adduce.] 1†. To draw on; induce; allure.

Either impelled by lewd disposition or adducted by hope of rewarde. Time's Storehouse, p. 680.

2. In physiol., to bring to or toward a median line or main axis. See adduction, 2.

The pectineus and three adductors adduct the thigh powerfully. H. Gray, Anat., p. 412.

adduction (a-duk'shon), n. [< ML. adductio(n-), < L. adducere, pp. adductus: see adduce.] 1. The act of adducing or bringing forward something as evidence in support of a contention or an argument. [Rare.]

An adduction of facts gathered from various quarters.
Is. Taylor.

2. (a) In physiol., the action of the adductor or adducent muscles. (b) In surg., the adducent action of a surgeon upon a limb or other member of the body; the position of a part which is the result of such action: the opposite of abduction. In either use, adduction consists in bringing a limb to or toward the long axis of the body, so that it shall be parallel therewith or with its fellow; or in bringing together two or several similar parts, as the spread fingers of the human hand, the opened shells of a bivalve mollusk, etc.

adductive (a-duk'tiv), a. [< L. as if adductivus*, < adducere, pp. adductus: see adduce.] Adducing or bringing forward.

adductor (a-duk'tor), n. and a. [L., a procurer, lit. one who draws to, < adducere, pp. adductus: see adduce.] I. n.; pl. adductors (-torz) or adductores (ad-uk-tō'rēz). In anat. and zoöl., that which adducts; specifically, the name of several muscles which draw certain parts to or toward one common center or median line: the opposite of abductor. The word is also applied to various muscles not specifically so named; thus, the internal rectus of the eye is an adductor of the eyeball. The muscles which close the shells of bivalves are generically termed adductors. See cuts under Lamellibranchiata, Waldheimia, and Productidæ.—Adductor arcuum, the adductor of the arches, a muscle of the side of the neck of some Batrachia, as Menopoma.—Adductor branchiarum, the adductor of the gills, a muscle of some Batrachia, as Menobranchus.—Adductor brevis (the short adductor), adductor longus (the long adductor), adductor magnus (the great adductor), three adductor muscles of the human thigh, arising from the pelvis and inserted in the linea aspera of the femur.—Adductor digiti tertii, adductor digiti quarti, the adductor muscle of the third digit and of the fourth digit, found in various animals, as the chameleon.—Adductor mandibulæ, in Crustacea, a muscle which adducts the mandible, and so brings together the opposite sides of the upper jaw.—Adductor pollicis, the adductor of the thumb.—Adductor pollicis pedis, or adductor hallucis, the adductor of the great toe. [Other muscles of the digits having the same function are sometimes called adductors.]

II. a. Of or pertaining to an adductor; having the function of adducting; adducent: as, the adductor muscles of the thigh: opposed to abductor.—Adductor impressions, in conch., the scars on the interior surfaces of the opposite valves of bivalve shells left by the adductor muscles; the ciboria. (See ciborium.) There are generally two, an anterior and a posterior, as in the clam, but often only one, as in the oyster and scallop (Pecten).—Adductor muscles. (a) In anat., the adductors. See I. (b) In malacology, the muscles which draw together or close the valves in bivalve mollusks. See cut under Waldheimia.

addulce† (a-duls′), v. t. [< late ME. adoulce, < OF. adoulcir, earlier adulcir, adolcir, F. adoucir, < ML. adulceire,* < L. ad, to, + dulcis, sweet: see dulce.] To sweeten.

Some mirth t' addulce man's miseries. Herrick.

-ade[1]. [(1) < F. -ade, < Pr. Sp. or Pg. -ada, or It. -ata, < L. -ata, f.; (2) < Pr. -at, Sp. or Pg. -ado, or It. -ato, < L. -atus, m., pp. suffix of verbs in -are: see -ate[1]. The native F. form is -ée, OF. -ee, whence in older E. -y: cf. army (F.) with armada (Sp.), ult. < L. armata.] 1. A suffix of nouns of French or other Romance origin, as accolade, ambuscade, brigade, cannonade, lemonade, etc., or of (a few) English nouns formed on the same model, as blockade, orangeade.—2. A suffix of nouns of Spanish or Italian origin (originally masculine form of preceding), as brocade, renegade, etc. It also appears in the Spanish form -ado, as in renegado, desperado.

-ade[2]. [< F. -ade, < L. -as (-ad-), < Gr. -ας (-αδ-), fem. suffix: see -ad[2].] A suffix of Greek origin, now usually -ad, as in decade (sometimes decad), nomade (usually nomad, like monad, triad, etc.).

adeb (ad′eb), n. [Ar.] An Egyptian weight equal to 210 okes. See oke.

adeed†, adv. Indeed.

"Say, did ye fleech and speak them fair?" "Adeed did I," quo' Bottom. Blackwood's Mag., XXII. 404.

adeem (a-dēm′), v. t. [< L. adimĕre, take away, < ad, to, + emere, take. Cf. redeem.] In law, to revoke (a legacy), either (1) by implication, as by a different disposition of the bequest during the life of the testator, or (2) by satisfaction of the legacy in advance, as by delivery of the thing bequeathed, or its equivalent, to the legatee during the lifetime of the bequeather.

A specific legacy may be adeemed; . . . if the subject of it be not in existence at the time of the testator's death, then the bequest entirely fails. . . . A specific gift is not adeemed by the testator's pledge of the subject of it, and the legatee will be entitled to have it redeemed by the executor. Am. Cyc., X. 316.

adeep (ạ-dēp′), prep. phr. as adv. [< a[3] + deep, after ahigh, alow, etc.] Deeply. [Rare.]

We shout so adeep down creation's profound,
We are deaf to God's voice.

adenose, adenous (ad′e-nōs, -nus), a. [< NL. adenosus, < Gr. ἀδήν, gland.] Full of glands; glandulous.

adenotomic (ad″e-nō-tom′ik), a. [< adenotomy.] Pertaining to adenotomy.

adenotomy (ad-e-not′ō-mi), n. [< Gr. ἀδήν (ἀδεν-), a gland, + -τομία, a cutting, < τέμνειν, cut. Cf. anatomy.] In anat. and surg., dissection or incision of a gland.

adenous, a. See adenose.

Adeona (ad-ē-ō′nä), n. [LL., in myth., a Roman divinity who presided over the arrival of travelers, < L. adire, come, arrive, adeo, I come, < ad, to, + ire, go. Cf. Abeona.] In zoöl., the typical genus of Adeonidæ (which see).

Adeonidæ (ad-ē-on′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Adeona + -idæ.] A family of chilostomatous polyzoans, typified by the genus Adeona. They have the zoarium erect or (rarely) incrusting, affixed by a flexible jointed or jointless radicate peduncle, immediately attached. The zoarium is bilaminar when not incrusting, and foliacious and fenestrate, or branched or lobate and entire. The cells are usually of three kinds, zoœcial, oœcial, and avicularian; the zoœcia are of the usual type. The family (originally named Adeoneæ by Busk) contains about 38 recent species, referred to 3 genera. Busk.

Adephaga (a-def′a-gä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl., < Gr. ἀδηφάγος: see adephagous.] A group of voracious, carnivorous, and predatory beetles, composing a part of the pentamerous division of the order Coleoptera. They have filiform antennæ and but two palpi to each maxilla. Of the four families which make up this group, two, Gyrinidæ and Dytiscidæ, are aquatic, and sometimes called Hydradephaga; the other two, Carabidæ and Cicindelidæ, are chiefly terrestrial, and are sometimes called Geodephaga. The whirligig and the tiger-beetle respectively exemplify these two divisions of Adephaga. Also called Carnivora. See cuts under Dytiscus and Cicindela.

adephagan (a-def′a-gan), n. A beetle of the group Adephaga.

adephagia (ad-ē-fā′ji-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀδηφαγία, < ἀδηφάγος, eating one's fill, gluttonous: see adephagous.] In pathol., voracious appetite; bulimia.

adephagous (a-def′a-gus), a. [< NL. adephagus, < Gr. ἀδηφάγος, eating one's fill, gluttonous, < ἄδην, or ἀδην, abundantly, enough (cf. L. satis, enough), + φαγεῖν, eat.] Gluttonous; of or pertaining to the Adephaga: as, adephagous beetles.

★adeps (ad′eps), n. [L., the soft fat or grease of animals, suet, lard: see adipose and adipic.] 1. Fat; animal oil; the contents of the cells of the adipose tissue; specifically, lard.—2. In phar., tallow; suet; prepared fat.—Ceratum adipis [gen. sing. of adeps], simple cerate; hog's lard with the addition of white wax to give it greater consistency.

adept (a-dept′), a. and n. [< L. adeptus, having attained, ML. adeptus, n., one who attained knowledge or proficiency, prop. pp. of adipisci, arrive at, reach, attain, obtain, < ad, to, + ap-isci, reach, attain, = Gr. ἅπ-τειν, touch, seize, = Skt. √ āp, attain, obtain: see apt.] I. a. Well skilled; completely versed or acquainted.

Adept in everything profound. Cowper, Hope, l. 350.

II. n. One who has attained proficiency; one fully skilled in anything; a proficient or master; specifically, in former times, a proficient in alchemy or magic; a master of occult science, or one who professed to have discovered "the great secret" (namely, of transmuting base metal into gold).

Shakespeare, in the person of Prospero, has exhibited the prevalent notions of the judicial astrologer combined with the adept, whose white magic, as distinguished from the black or demon magic, holds an intercourse with purer spirits. I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 285.

Howes was the true adept, seeking what spiritual ore there might be among the dross of the hermetic philosophy. Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 269.

The Persians were adepts in archery and horsemanship, and were distinguished by courtesy and high-breeding.
N. A. Rev., CXL. 329.

=Syn. Adept, Expert. An adept is one who possesses natural as well as acquired aptitude or skill in anything: as, an adept in the art of governing; an adept in diplomacy, lying, cajolery, whist-playing, etc. An expert, on the other hand, is one whose skill and proficiency are more conspicuously the result of practice or experience, or of an intimate acquaintance with a subject. The term is mostly limited to one possessing special skill or knowledge in some branch, and regarded as an authority on it: as, an expert in alienism, chemistry, penmanship, etc.

adeption† (a-dep′shon), n. [< L. adeptio(n-), < adipisci: see adept.] An obtaining or gaining; acquirement.

In the wit and policy of the captain consisteth the chief adeption of the victory. Grafton, Rich. III., an. 3.

adeptist† (a-dep′tist), n. [< adept + -ist.] An adept.

adeptness (a-dept′nes), n. The quality or state of being adept; skilfulness; special proficiency.

adeptship (a-dept′ship), n. The state of being an adept; adeptness: specifically used in theosophy.

adequacy (ad′ē-kwā-si), n. [< adequate: see -acy.] The state or quality of being adequate; the condition of being proportionate or sufficient; a sufficiency for a particular purpose: as, the adequacy of supply to expenditure, or of an effort to its purpose; an adequacy of provisions.

adequate (ad′ē-kwāt), a. [Formerly adæquate, -at, < L. adæquatus, pp. of adæquare, make equal, < ad, to, + æquus, equal: see equal.] Equal to requirement or occasion; commensurate; fully sufficient, suitable, or fit: as, means adequate to the object; an adequate comparison.

I did for once see right, do right, give tongue
The adequate protest.
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 56.

In our happy hours we should be inexhaustible poets, if once we could break through the silence into adequate rhyme. Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 305.

Adequate cognition, in logic: (a) A cognition involving no notion which is not perfectly clear and distinct. (b) A cognition at once precise and complete.—Adequate definition or mark, in logic. See definition.=Syn. Adequate, Sufficient, Enough, commensurate, competent. A thing is adequate to something else when it comes quite up to its level; yet neither may be sufficient when viewed in relation to some third thing. That which is sufficient may be adequate and more. Enough equals adequate, but is applied to a different class of subjects.

Nothing is a due and adequate representation of a state that does not represent its ability as well as its property.
Burke, Rev. in France.

Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. Mat. vi. 34.

Which is enough, I'll warrant,
As this world goes, to pass for honest.
Shak., W. T., ii. 3.

adequate† (ad′ē-kwāt), v. t. 1. To make equal or adequate.

Let me give you one instance more of a truly intellectual object, exactly adequated and proportioned unto the intellectual appetite; and that is, learning and knowledge.
Fotherby, Atheomastix, p. 208.

2. To attain equality with; equal.

Though it be an impossibility for any creature to adequate God in his eternity, yet he hath ordained all his sons in Christ to partake of it by living with him eternally.
Shelford, Discourses, p. 227.

adequately (ad′ē-kwāt-li), adv. In an adequate manner; commensurately; sufficiently.

adequateness (ad′ē-kwāt-nes), n. The state of being adequate; justness of adaptation; sufficiency; adequacy.

The adequateness of the advantages [of a given course of study] is the point to be judged.
H. Spencer, Education, p. 28.

adequation (ad-ē-kwā′shon), n. [< L. adæquatio(n-), < adæquare, make equal: see adequate, a.] A making or being equal; an equivalence or equivalent. [Rare.]

The principles of logic and natural reason tell us, that there must be a just proportion and adequation between the medium by which we prove, and the conclusion to be proved. Bp. Barlow, Remains, p. 125.

It was the arme (not of King Henry) but King Edward the First, which is notoriously known to have been the adequation of a yard. [An erroneous statement.]
Fuller, Worthies, Berkshire.

adequative (ad′ē-kwā-tiv), a. [< ML. adæquativus, < L. adæquare: see adequate, a.] Equivalent or sufficient; adequate. [Rare.]

A shepherd's daughter,
And what to her adheres. Shak., W. T., iv. (cho.).

4. To be fixed in attachment or devotion; be devoted; be attached as a follower or upholder: as, men adhere to a party, a leader, a church, or a creed; rarely, to be attached as a friend.

Two men there are not living
To whom he more adheres. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2.

5. To be consistent; hold together; be in accordance or agreement, as the parts of a system; cohere. [Rare or obsolete.]

Everything adheres together. Shak., T. N., iii. 4.

6. Specifically, in Scots law: (a) To affirm a judgment; agree with the opinion of a judge previously pronounced. (b) To return to a husband or wife who has been deserted. See adherence, 3.—7. In logic and metaph., to be accidentally connected. See adherent, a., 3.

adherence (ad-hēr'ens), n. [< F. adhérence, < ML. adhærentia, < L. adhærens: see adherent.] 1. The act or state of sticking or adhering: rare in a physical sense, adhesion being commonly used.—2. Figuratively, the character of being fixed in attachment; fidelity; steady attachment: as, an adherence to a party or opinions; the act of holding to closely: as, a rigid adherence to rules.

A tenacious adherence to the rights and liberties transmitted from a wise and virtuous ancestry. Addison.

3. In Scots law, the return of a husband or wife who has for a time deserted his or her spouse. The spouse who has been deserted may bring an action of adherence to compel the deserting spouse to return.

4. In painting, the effect of those parts of a picture which, wanting relief, are not detached, and hence appear adhering to the canvas or surface. Fairholt.—5. In logic and metaph., the state of being adherent. See adherent, a., 3. =Syn. Adherence, Adhesion. These words are undergoing desynonymization, the moral and figurative sense being limited to adherence, and the physical to adhesion: as, adherence to the doctrines of Adam Smith; the adhesion of putty to glass. [Note: Adherent, n., is not used of physical attachment, nor adherent, a., of moral attachment. Adhere, v., is used of either.]

If he departs in any degree from strict adherence to these rules, . . . he not only departs from rule, but commits an act of treachery and baseness.
Gladstone, Kin beyond Sea, p. 210.

Writing and drawing with chalks and pencils depend on the adhesion of solids.
Atkinson, tr. of Ganot's Physics, p. 87.

adherency† (ad-hēr'en-si), n. [As adherence: see -ency.] 1. The state of being adherent.

Adherencies and admirations of men's persons.
Jer. Taylor (?), Artif. Handsomeness, p. 172.

2. That which is adherent.

Vices have a native adherency of vexation.
Decay of Christ. Piety.

adherent (ad-hēr'ent), a. and n. [< F. adhérent, < L. adhæren(t-)s, ppr. of adhærere: see adhere.] I. a. 1. Sticking; clinging; adhering.

Close to the cliff with both his hands he clung,
And stuck adherent, and suspended hung.
Pope, Odyssey, l. 547.

2. In bot., congenitally united, as parts that are normally separate: generally used as equivalent to adnate. See cut under adnate.—3. In logic and metaph., accidentally connected; not belonging to the nature of a thing; not inherent: as, if a cloth is wet, its wetness is a quality adherent to it, not inherent in it.

II. n. 1. A person who adheres; one who follows or upholds a leader, party, cause, opinion, or the like; a follower, partizan, or supporter.

Rip's sole domestic adherent was his dog Wolf, who was as much hen-pecked as his master.
Irving, Rip Van Winkle.

2†. Anything outwardly belonging to a person; an appendage.

His humour, his carriage, and his extrinsic adherents.
Gov. of Tongue.

=Syn. 1. Disciple, pupil, upholder, supporter, dependant.

adherently (ad-hēr'ent-li), adv. In an adherent manner.

adherer (ad-hēr'ėr), n. One who adheres; an adherent. [Rare.]

adherescence (ad-hē-res'ens), n. The state of being so closely connected with or attached to anything as to form with it a quasi-compound or unit. [Rare.]

adherescent (ad-hē-res'ent), a. [< L. adhærescen(t-)s, ppr. of adhærere, adhere: see adhere and -escent.] Tending to adhere or become adherent; adhering. [Rare.]

adhesion (ad-hē'zhon), n. [< F. adhésion, < L. adhæsio(n-), < adhæsus, pp. of adhærere: see adhere.] 1. The act or state of adhering, or of being united and attached; close connection or association: as, the adhesion of parts united by growth, cement, etc.; inflammatory adhesion of surfaces in disease.

One mendicant whom I know, and who always sits upon the steps of a certain bridge, succeeds, I believe, as the season advances, in heating the marble beneath him by firm and unswerving adhesion. Howells, Ven. Life, iii.

2. Steady attachment of the mind or feelings; firmness in opinion; adherence: as, an adhesion to vice.

Obstinate adhesion to false rules of belief.
Whitlock, Manners of the English, p. 216.

The council assigned as motives for its decrees an adhesion of heart on the part of the victims to the cause of the insurgents. Motley, Dutch Republic, II. 404.

3. Assent; concurrence.

To that treaty Spain and England gave in their adhesion. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xiv.

4. That which adheres; accretion.

Casting off all foreign, especially all noxious, adhesions.
Carlyle, Misc., I. 14.

5. In phys., molecular attraction exerted between the surfaces of bodies in contact, as between two solids, a solid and a liquid, or a solid and a gas. See extract, and cohesion.

Adhesion, a term used to denote the physical force in virtue of which one body or substance remains attached to the surface of another with which it has been brought into contact. It is to be distinguished from cohesion, which is the mutual attraction that the particles of the same body exert on each other. Encyc. Brit., I. 153.

6. In bot., the union of parts normally separate.—7. In pathol., especially in the plural, the adventitious bands or fibers by which inflamed parts have adhered, or are held together.—8. In surg., the reunion of divided parts by a particular kind of inflammation, called the adhesive.—9. In mech., often used as synonymous with friction (which see).—Adhesion-car, a railroad-car provided with means for increasing the adhesive or tractive power beyond that due merely to the weight imposed upon the rails. This is usually effected by a center rail, gripped horizontally by a pair of friction-wheels placed on its opposite sides, or by a cogged wheel working into a rack laid parallel with the road-bed. In some cases the treads of the driving-wheels are grooved, and the face of the rails is flanged to correspond to them.—Adhesion of wheels to rails, the friction between the surfaces in contact, acting to prevent slipping, in amount dependent upon the condition of those surfaces and the pressure. For driving-wheels, as of locomotives, it is a fraction of the weight borne by them, ranging from about one twentieth when the rails are "greasy" to one fourth when they are clean and dry. =Syn. Adhesion, Adherence. See adherence.

adhesive (ad-hē'siv), a. [< F. adhésif, -ive, < L. as if adhæsivus*, < adhæsus, pp. of adhærere: see adhere.] 1. Sticky; tenacious, as glutinous substances.

She trusts a place unsound,
And deeply plunges in th' adhesive ground.
Crabbe, Parish Register.

2. Figuratively, cleaving or clinging; adhering; remaining attached; not deviating from.

If slow, yet sure, adhesive to the track.
Thomson, Autumn.

Both were slow and tenacious (that is, adhesive) in their feelings. De Quincey, Secret Societies, ii.

3. Gummed; fitted for adhesion: as, adhesive envelops.—Adhesive felt, a felt manufactured in Great Britain for use in sheathing wooden ships.—Adhesive inflammation, in med. and surg., a term applied to the union of the lips of an incised wound without suppuration; also to inflammations leading to adhesion between normally free surfaces, as between the intestine and the body-wall.—Adhesive knowledge, in metaph., knowledge which implies adhesion or assent, as well as apprehension. See apprehensive.—Adhesive plaster, in surg., a plaster made of litharge-plaster, wax, and resin.—Adhesive slate, a variety of slaty clay which adheres strongly to the tongue, and rapidly absorbs water.

adhesively (ad-hē'siv-li), adv. In an adhesive manner.

adhesiveness (ad-hē'siv-nes), n. 1. The state or quality of being adhesive, or of sticking or adhering; stickiness; tenacity.—2. In phren., a mental faculty manifested in attachment to objects, animate or inanimate, lasting friendships, love of social intercourse, etc., supposed to be located in a special part of the brain. It is said to be strongest in women. See phrenology.

adhibit (ad-hib'it), v. t. [< L. adhibitus, pp. of adhibēre, hold toward, bring to, apply, < ad, to, + habēre, hold, have: see habit.] 1. To use or apply; specifically, to administer as a remedy; exhibit medicinally.

Wine also that is dilute may safely and properly be adhibited. T. Whitaker, Blood of the Grape, p. 33.

2. To attach: as, he adhibited his name to the address.

The greatest lords adhibited . . . faith to his words.
Hall, Chronicles, Hen. VII., an. 7.

3. To take or let in; admit. [Rare in all uses.]

adhibition (ad-hi-bish'on), n. [< L. adhibitio(n-), application, < adhibere: see adhibit.] Application; use; specifically, use as a remedy. [Rare.]

The adhibition of dilute wine.
T. Whitaker, Blood of the Grape, p. 55.

ad hoc (ad hok). [L.: ad, to; hoc, acc. neut. of hic, this: see hic.] To this; with respect to this (subject or thing); in particular.

ad hominem (ad hom'i-nem). [L.: ad, to; hominem, acc. of homo, man: see Homo.] To the man; to the interests or passions of the person.—Argumentum ad hominem, an argument drawn from premises which, whether true or not, ought to be admitted by the person to whom they are addressed, either on account of his peculiar beliefs or experience, or because they are necessary to justify his conduct or are otherwise conducive to his interest. Aristotle (Topics, viii. 11) remarks that it is sometimes necessary to refute the disputant rather than his position, and some medieval logicians taught that refutation was of two kinds, solutio recta and solutio ad hominem, the latter being imperfect or fallacious refutation. Thus, Blundeville says: "Confutation of person is done either by taunting, rayling, rendring checke for checke, or by scorning"; and Wilson says: "Either wee purpose by disputacion to aunswere fully to the matier or els secondly (if power want to compass that) we seke some other meanes to satisfy the man."

My design being not a particular victory over such a sort of men, but an absolute establishing of the truth, I shall lay down no grounds that are merely argumenta ad hominem. Dr. H. More, Immortal. of Soul, ii. 1.

adhort† (ad-hôrt'), v. t. [< L. adhortari, encourage, urge to, < ad, to, + hortari, urge, incite: see exhort.] To exhort; advise.

That eight times martyred mother in the Maccabees, when she would adhort her son to a passive fortitude, . . . desires him to look upon the heavens, the earth, all in them contained. Feltham.

adhortation† (ad-hôr-tā'shon), n. [< L. adhortatio(n-), encouragement, < adhortari: see adhort.] Advice; exhortation; encouragement.

adhortatory† (ad-hôr'ta-tō-ri), a. [< L. as if adhortatorius*, < adhortator, encourager, adviser, < adhortari: see adhort.] Advisory; conveying counsel, warning, or encouragement. Abp. Potter.

adiabatic (ad''i-a-bat'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. ἀδιάβατος, not to be passed over, < ἀ- priv., not, + διαβατός, verbal adj. of διαβαίνειν, pass over: see diabaterial.] I. a. Without transference: used in thermodynamics of a change in volume, whether by expansion or contraction, unaccompanied by a gain or loss of heat.—Adiabatic curve or line, a line exhibiting the relation between the pressure and the volume of a fluid, upon the assumption that it expands and contracts without either receiving or giving out heat. The curves are drawn upon a rectangular system of coördinates, the abscissas representing the volume of the substance and the ordinates the pressure upon it; the curves thus being the loci of points representing different possible states of the body which passes between different states represented by different points on the same curve without imparting heat to other bodies or receiving heat from them. The adiabatic lines are steeper than the isothermal lines, as shown in the figure, where the curves a are adiabatics.

Adiabatic Lines (a).

If a series of adiabatic lines be drawn so that the points at which they cut one of the isothermal lines correspond to successive equal additions of heat to the substance at that temperature, then this series of adiabatic lines will cut off a series of equal areas from the strip bounded by any two isothermal lines. Clerk Maxwell, Theory of Heat, p. 156.

II. n. An adiabatic line.

Mr. W. Peddie gave a communication on the isothermals and adiabatics of water near the maximum density point. Nature, XXX. 403.

adiabatically (ad''i-a-bat'i-kal-i), adv. In an adiabatic manner.

adiabolist (ad-i-ab'ō-list), n. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + διάβολος, devil, + -ist.] A disbeliever in the existence of the devil. [Rare.]

adiactinic (ad''i-ak-tin'ik), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. (a-18) + diactinic.] Impervious to the actinic or chemical rays of light.

Adiantum (ad-i-an'tum), n. [L., < Gr. ἀδίαντος, maidenhair, prop. adj., unwetted (in reference to the resistance which the fronds offer to wetting), < ἀ- priv. + διαντός, capable of being wetted, verbal adj. of διαίνειν, wet.] A large genus of ferns, widely distributed, and great favorites in hothouses on account of their beautiful forms. It includes the common maidenhair ferns, A. Capillus-Veneris and A. pedatum, the latter peculiar to North America. They have been used in the preparation of capillaire.

adiaphora, n. Plural of adiaphoron.

adiaphoracy† (ad-i-af'ō-rā-si), n. [Improp. for adiaphory: see -acy.] Indifference.

adiaphoresis (ad-i-af-ō-rē'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + διαφορεῖν, throw off by perspiration, lit. carry off or away, < διά, apart, + φέρειν = E. bear[1]: see a-18 and diaphoresis.] In pathol., deficiency of perspiration. Also written adiaphorosis.

adiaphorism (ad-i-af'ō-rizm), n. [< adiaphorous + -ism.] Religious tolerance or moderation in regard to indifferent or non-essential matters; hence, latitudinarianism; indifferentism.

The English Thirty-nine Articles on the whole are elevated by the same lofty adiaphorism as that which penetrated the Westminster Confession of Faith.
Dean Stanley, in Macmillan's Mag., XLIV. 291.

adiaphorist (ad-i-af′ō-rist), n. [< adiaphorous + -ist.] A person characterized by indifference or moderation, especially in religious matters. Specifically [cap.], a follower or supporter of Melanchthon in the controversy which arose in the reformed church in the sixteenth century regarding certain doctrines and rites publicly admitted by Melanchthon and his party, in the document known as the Leipsic Interim, to be matters of indifference. See interim. Also called adiaphorite.

He [Lord Burleigh] may have been of the same mind with those German Protestants who were called Adiaphoristæ, and who considered the popish rites as matters indifferent. Macaulay, Burleigh.

adiaphoristic (ad-i-af-ō-ris′tik), a. 1. Pertaining to things which are morally indifferent; adiaphorous.—2. Relating to the adiaphorists. See adiaphorist.

adiaphorite (ad-i-af′ō-rīt), n. [< adiaphorous + *-ite*2.] Same as adiaphorist.

adiaphoron (ad-i-af′ō-ron), n.; pl. adiaphora (-rä). [NL., < Gr. ἀδιάφορον, neut. of ἀδιάφορος, indifferent: see adiaphorous.] In theol. and ethics, a thing indifferent; a tenet or practice which may be considered non-essential.

Life and death are among the adiaphora—things indifferent, which may be chosen or rejected according to circumstances. G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 175.

He [Luther] classed images in themselves as among the adiaphora, and condemned only their cultus.

Encyc. Brit., XII. 714.

adiaphorosis (ad-i-af-ō-rō′sis), n. [NL., improp. for adiaphoresis, assimilated to term. -osis, q. v.] Same as adiaphoresis.

adiaphorous (ad-i-af′ō-rus), a. [< Gr. ἀδιάφορος, not different, indifferent, < ἀ- priv. + διάφορος, different, < διαφέρειν (= L. differe, > E. differ), < διά = L. dis-, apart, + φέρειν = L. ferre = E. *bear*1.] 1. Indifferent; neutral; morally neither right nor wrong.

Why does the Church of Rome charge upon others the shame of novelty for leaving of some rites and ceremonies which by her own practice we are taught to have no obligation in them, but to be adiaphorous?

Jer. Taylor, Liberty of Prophesying, § 5.

Hence—2†. Applied by Boyle to a spirit neither acid nor alkaline.—3. In med., doing neither good nor harm, as a medicament.

adiaphory† (ad-i-af′ō-ri), n. [< Gr. ἀδιαφορία, indifference, < ἀδιάφορος: see adiaphorous.] Neutrality; indifference.

adiapneustia (ad″i-ap-nūs′ti-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀδιαπνευστία, < ἀ- priv. + διαπνευστικός, < διαπνεῖν, breathe through, perspire, < διά, through, + πνεῖν, breathe.] In pathol., defective perspiration; adiaphoresis. Dunglison.

adiathermanous (a-dī-a-thėr′ma-nus), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. (a-18) + diathermanous, q. v. Cf. adiathermic.] Same as adiathermic.

A body impervious to light is opaque, impervious to dark heat it is adiathermanous.

A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 448.

adiathermic (a-dī-a-thėr′mik), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. (a-18) + diathermic.] Impervious to radiant heat.

adicity (a-dis′i-ti), n. [< *-ad*1 (1) + -icity, as in atomicity, periodicity.] In chem., combining capacity, according as an element or a compound is a monad, dyad, etc.; same as valency. N. E. D.

adieu (a-dū′; F. pron. à-dyė′), interj. [Early mod. E. adiew, adew, adue, < ME. adew, adewe, < OF. a Dieu, a Deu, mod. F. adieu, to which the mod. E. conforms in spelling; = It. addio = Sp. adiós or á Dios = Pg. adeos or a Deos; < L. ad Deum: ad, to; Deum, acc. of Deus, God: see deity. Cf. good-by, orig. God be with you.] Literally, to God, an ellipsis for I commend you to God: an expression of kind wishes at the parting of friends, equivalent to farewell; hence, a parting salutation in general: as, adieu to my hopes.

Adewe, and adewe, blis!

Testament of Love, ii. 292.

Adieu, adieu! my native shore
Fades o'er the waters blue.

Byron, Childe Harold, i. 13.

Delightful summer! then adieu! Hood, Summer.

= Syn. Adieu, Farewell, Good-by. These words have completely lost their original meanings. In use the difference between them is only one of formality, good-by being the most common, and adieu the most formal. By the Society of Friends (and perhaps some other sects) farewell is preferred, as not involving the careless mention of the name of God. In strict propriety, farewell is a parting salutation to persons going away.

adieu (a-dū′; F. pron. à-dyė′), n.; pl. adieus or (in French spelling) adieux (a-dūz′, à-dyė′). A farewell or commendation to the care of God: as, an everlasting adieu; to make one's adieus.

We took our last adieu
And up the snowy Splugen drew.

Tennyson, Daisy.

adight† (a-dīt′), v. t. [< ME. adihten, adighten, < AS. ādihtan,* < ā- + dihtan, arrange, dight: see dight.] To set in order. See dight.

adight† (a-dīt′), p. a. [< ME. adiht, adight, pp.: see the verb.] Set in order; arrayed.

ad indefinitum (ad in-def-i-nī′tum). [L.: ad, to; indefinitum, acc. neut. of indefinitus, indefinite: see indefinite.] To the indefinite; indefinitely; to an indefinite extent. An expression used by some writers in place of ad infinitum, as being in their opinion more precise.

ad inf. An abbreviation of Latin ad infinitum (which see).

ad infinitum (ad in-fi-nī′tum). [L.: ad, to, unto; infinitum, acc. neut. of infinitus, infinite: see infinite.] To infinity; endlessly; on and on without end; through an infinite series.

adinole (ad′i-nōl), n. [F. adinole, appar. < Gr. ἀδινός, close, compact.] A hard, compact rock, composed of quartz and albite, produced in the contact metamorphism of certain schists by intruded diabase dikes or sills.

ad inquirendum (ad in-kwi-ren′dum). [L., for the purpose of inquiring: ad, to, for; inquirendum, gerund of inquirere, inquire: see inquire.] In law, a judicial writ commanding inquiry to be made concerning a cause depending in a court.

ad int. An abbreviation of ad interim (which see).

ad interim (ad in′tėr-im). [L.: ad, to, for; interim, meanwhile: see interim.] In the mean time; for the present.

adios (ä-dē-ōs′), interj. [Sp., = Pg. adeos = It. addio = F. adieu: see adieu.] Adieu; good-by. [Southwestern U. S.]

adipate (ad′i-pāt), n. [< L. adeps (adip-), fat, + *-ate*1: see adipic. Cf. L. adipatus, supplied with fat.] A salt of adipic acid.

adipescent (ad-i-pes′ent), a. [< L. adeps (adip-), fat, + -escent.] Becoming fatty.

adipic (a-dip′ik), a. [< L. adeps (adip-), fat, + *-ic*2: see adeps.] Of or belonging to fat.—Adipic acid, $C_6H_{10}O_4$, an acid obtained by treating oleic acid or fatty bodies with nitric acid. It forms soft, white nodular crusts, which seem to be aggregates of small crystals.

adipocerate (ad-i-pos′ė-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. adipocerated, ppr. adipocerating. [< adipocere + *-ate*2.] To convert into adipocere. Craig.

adipoceration (ad-i-pos-ė-rā′shon), n. The act of changing or the state of being changed into adipocere. Craig.

adipocere (ad′i-pō-sēr″), n. [= F. adipocire, < L. adeps (adip-), fat, + cera, wax.] A soft unctuous or waxy substance, of a light-brown color, produced by the decomposition of animal matter when protected from the air, and under certain conditions of temperature and humidity. It consists chiefly of a mixture of palmitic, stearic, and oleic acids, possibly also of margaric acid.—Adipocere mineral, a fatty matter found in some peat-mosses, and in the argillaceous iron ore of Merthyr-Tydvil, Wales; adipocerite. It is inodorous when cold, but when heated it emits a slightly bituminous odor. Also called adipocerite and hatchettin.

adipoceriform (ad″i-pō-sēr′i-fôrm), a. [< adipocere + L. -formis, < forma, form.] Having the appearance or form of adipocere.

adipocerite (ad-i-pos′ė-rīt), n. [< adipocere + *-ite*2.] Adipocere mineral. See adipocere.

adipocerous (ad-i-pos′ė-rus), a. Relating to adipocere; containing adipocere.

adipocire (ad′i-pō-sēr″), n. [F.: see adipocere.] Same as adipocere.

adipo-fibroma (ad″i-pō-fī-brō′mä), n. Same as lipo-fibroma.

adipoma (ad-i-pō′mä), n. Same as lipoma.

adipose (ad′i-pōs), a. and n. [= F. adipeux, Sp. adiposo, etc., < NL. adiposus, < L. adeps (adip-), fat: see adeps.] I. a. Fatty; consisting of, resembling, or having relation to fat.—Adipose arteries, the branches of the diaphragmatic, capsular, and renal arteries which nourish the fat around the kidneys.—Adipose body, in entom., a peculiar fatty substance occupying a considerable portion of the interior of the body, and especially abundant in the full-grown larvæ of insects, consisting of a yellowish lobulated mass lining the walls of the body-cavity and filling up the spaces between the viscera. Dallas.—Adipose fin, a posterior dorsal appendage, generally sacciform or pedunculated and more or less fat-like, but sometimes cariniform, developed in certain fishes, especially the salmonids and silurids.—Adipose membrane, the cell-wall of a fat-cell; the extremely delicate structureless membrane which surrounds a fat-globule or vesicle of fat.—Adipose sac, a fat-cell or fat-vesicle whose limiting cell-wall consists of an adipose membrane, and whose contents are a globule of fat.—Adipose tissue, a connective tissue of loose structure containing masses of fat-cells, that is, cells in which the protoplasm has been largely replaced by fat. Adipose tissue underlies the skin, invests the kidneys, etc.—Adipose tumor, a lipoma.

II. n. Fat in general; specifically, the fat on the kidneys.

adiposis (ad-i-pō′sis), n. [NL., < L. adeps (adip-), fat, + -osis.] 1. General corpulency.—2. The accumulation of fat in or upon a single organ.

adiposity (ad-i-pos′i-ty), n. [< NL. as if adipositas,* < adiposus: see adipose and -ity.] Fatness; adiposis.

adipous (ad′i-pus), a. [< L. adeps (adip-), fat, + -ous. Cf. adipose.] Fat; of the nature of fat; adipose.

adipsia (a-dip′si-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. as if ἀδιψία,* absence of thirst, < ἀδιψος, not thirsty: see adipsous.] In med., absence of thirst. Also called adipsy.

adipsous (a-dip′sus), a. [< Gr. ἀδιψος, not thirsty, < ἀ- priv. + δίψα, thirst: see adipsia.] Tending to quench thirst, as certain fruits.

adipsy (ad′ip-si), n. Same as adipsia.

adit (ad′it), n. [< L. aditus, an approach, < adire, pp. aditus, approach, < ad, to, + ire, go: see itinerant. Cf. exit.] 1. An entrance or a passage; specifically, in mining, a nearly horizontal excavation, or drift (which see), specially used to conduct from the interior to the surface the water which either comes into the workings from above or is pumped up from below. The word tunnel is in general use in the United States, and especially in the western mining regions, for adit; but the former properly signifies an excavation open at both ends, such as is used in railroads. When there are two or more adits, the lowest is called the deep adit. Adits are occasionally several miles in length. The so-called Sutro tunnel, draining the Comstock lode at Virginia City, Nevada, is the most extensive work of this kind yet constructed in the United States. It is about 20,000 feet in length, and intersects the lode at a depth of about 2000 feet. See adit-level, and cut under level.

2. Milit., a passage under ground by which miners approach the part they intend to sap. Wilhelm, Mil. Dict.—3. Admission; access; approach. [Rare.]

Yourself and yours shall have Free adit. Tennyson, Princess, vi.

aditio† (a-dish′on), n. [< L. aditio(n-), approach, < adire: see adit.] The act of approaching.

adit-level (ad′it-lev″el), n. A drainage-level.

To the town there is adjoinant in site . . . an ancient castle. R. Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

adjoint (aj′oint), n. [< F. adjoint, assistant, adjunct, prop. pp. of adjoindre, adjoin, assign as an assistant: see adjoin.] 1†. One who is joined or associated with another as a helper; an adjunct. [Rare.]

You are, madam, I perceive, said he, a public minister, and this lady is your adjoint.
Gentleman Instructed, p. 108.

2. [Pron. a-jwaṅ′.] In France, specifically—(a) An assistant of or substitute for the mayor of a commune, or in Paris of an arrondissement. (b) An assistant professor in a college.

adjourn (a-jėrn′), v. [< ME. ajournen, ajornen, < OF. ajorner, ajurner, F. ajourner = Pg. ajornar = It. aggiornare, < ML. adiurnare, adjurnare, adjornare, fix a day, summon for a particular day, < L. ad, to, + LL. diurnus*, jurnus*, jornus* (> It. giorno = Pr. jorn = OF. jor, jur, F. jour, a day), < L. diurnus, daily, < dies, day: see diurnal, journal.] I. trans. 1. To put off or defer, properly to another day, but also till a later period indefinitely.

Or how the sun shall in mid heaven stand still
A day entire, and night's due course adjourn.
Milton, P. L., xii. 264.

It is a common practice to adjourn the reformation of their lives to a further time. Barrow.

Specifically—2. To suspend the meeting of, as a public or private body, to a future day or to another place; also, defer or postpone to a future meeting of the same body: as, the court adjourned the consideration of the question.

The queen being absent, 't is a needful fitness
That we adjourn this court till further day.
Shak., Hen. VIII., ii. 4.

II. intrans. To suspend a sitting or transaction till another day, or transfer it to another place: usually said of legislatures, courts, or other formally organized bodies: as, the legislature adjourned at four o'clock; the meeting adjourned to the town hall.—To adjourn sine die (literally, to adjourn without day), to adjourn without setting a time to reconvene or sit again; specifically, to adjourn without intending or expecting to sit again: the usual formula of minutes recording the proceedings of a body, as a court martial, whose existence terminates with the business for which it was convened.

adjournal (a-jėr′nal), n. [< adjourn + -al.] In Scots law, the proceedings of a single day in, or of a single sitting of, the Court of Justiciary: equivalent to sederunt as applied to a civil court.—Act of adjournal, the record of a sentence in a criminal cause.—Book of adjournal, a book containing the records of the Court of Justiciary.

adjournment (a-jėrn′ment), n. [< OF. ajournement, earlier ajornement: see adjourn and -ment.] 1. The act of postponing or deferring.

We run our lives out in adjournments from time to time.
L'Estrange.

2. The act of discontinuing a meeting of a public or private body or the transaction of any business until a fixed date or indefinitely.—3. The period during which a public body adjourns its sittings: as, during an adjournment of six weeks.—Adjournment in eyre, in old Eng. law, the appointment by the justices in eyre, or circuit judges, of a day for future session. = Syn. Adjournment, Recess, Prorogation, Dissolution. Adjournment is the act by which an assembly suspends its session in virtue of authority inherent in itself; it may be also the time or interval of such suspension. A recess is a customary suspension of business, as during the period of certain recognized or legal holidays: as, the Easter recess; a recess for Washington's birthday. Recess is also popularly used for a brief suspension of business for any reason: as, it was agreed that there be a recess of ten minutes. A prorogation is the adjournment of the sittings of a legislative body at the instance of the authority which called it together, as the sovereign; during a prorogation it can hold no sittings, but in order to resume business must be again summoned: the close of a session of the British Parliament is called a prorogation. Dissolution is the act by which the body, as such, is broken up, and its members are finally discharged from their duties. The United States House of Representatives dissolves every two years at a time fixed by law, but the Senate has a continuous life, and therefore adjourns from one Congress to another. The dissolution of the British Parliament necessitates a new election; the dissolution of the United States House of Representatives is provided for by law, an election being previously held.

adjoust†, v. Obsolete form of adjust.

adjt. A contraction of adjutant.

adjudge (a-juj′), v.; pret. and pp. adjudged, ppr. adjudging. ★adjuster (a-jus'tėr), n. A person who adjusts; that which regulates.

adjusting-cone (a-jus'ting-kōn), n. An instrument for measuring the distance between the axes of the eyes when they are parallel, as in looking at a distant object. It consists of two hollow cones, each perforated at the apex. Through these perforations the person whose eyes are to be measured looks at a distant object, and the cones are moved until the two fields of vision coincide. The distance between the apexes then gives the measurement sought.

adjusting-screw (a-jus'ting-skrö), n. A screw by which the adjustable parts of an instrument or a machine are moved to required positions. It also often serves to hold the parts firmly in those positions.

adjusting-tool (a-jus'ting-töl), n. A tool for regulating the snail of a fusee in a timepiece, so that its increase of diameter may exactly compensate for the decrease of tension of the spring as it unwinds from the barrel.

adjustive (a-jus'tiv), a. [< adjust + -ive.] Tending or serving to adjust.

★adjustment (a-just'ment), n. [< adjust + -ment, after F. ajustement.] 1. The act of adjusting; a making fit or conformable; the act of adapting to a given purpose; orderly regulation or arrangement: as, the adjustment of the parts of a watch.

The rest of the apparel required little adjustment.
Scott, Waverley, xliii.

2. The state of being adjusted; a condition of adaptation; orderly relation of parts or elements.

Throughout all phases of life up to the highest, every advance is the effecting of some better adjustment of inner to outer actions. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 61.

3. That which serves to adjust or adapt one thing to another or to a particular service; as, the adjustments of constitutional government, of a microscope, a timepiece, etc.

The nicest of all the adjustments involved in the working of the British Government is that which determines, without formally defining, the internal relations of the Cabinet.
Gladstone, Might of Right, p. 162.

4. The act of settling or arranging, as a difference or dispute; settlement; arrangement.—5. In insurance, the act of adjusting, or settling and ascertaining, the amount of indemnity which the party insured is to receive under the policy after all proper allowances and deductions have been made, and the settling of the proportion of that indemnity which each underwriter is liable to bear.=Syn. Arrangement, regulation, settlement, adaptation, accommodation, disposal.

adjustor (a-jus'tor), n. [< adjust + -or.] In anat. and zoöl., that which adjusts, coaptates, or makes to fit together: a name of sundry muscles: as, the dorsal and ventral adjustors of the shells of brachiopods. See extract, and cuts under Lingulidæ and Waldheimia.

The dorsal adjustors are fixed to the ventral surface of the peduncle, and are again inserted into the hinge-plate in the smaller valve. The ventral adjustors are considered to pass from the inner extremity of the peduncle and to become attached by one pair of their extremities to the ventral valve, one on each side of and a little behind the expanded base of the divaricators. Encyc. Brit., IV. 192.

adjutage, n. See ajutage.

adjutancy (aj'ö-tan-si), n. [< adjutan(t) + -cy.] 1. The office of adjutant. Also called adjutantship.—2†. Assistance.

It was, no doubt, disposed with all the adjutancy of definition and division. Burke, Appeal to Old Whigs.

II. n. 1. A helper; an assistant; an aid. [Rare.]

A fine violin must . . . be the best adjutant to a fine voice. W. Mason, Eng. Church Music, p. 74.

2. Milit., properly, a regimental staff-officer appointed to assist the commanding officer of a regiment in the discharge of the details of his military duty. The title is also given to officers having similar functions attached to larger or smaller divisions of troops, to garrisons, and to the War Department of the United States government. (See adjutant-general.) Adjutants are also assigned, as in the British army, to divisions of artillery. Formerly, in England, called aid-major. Often contracted to adjt.

3. The adjutant-bird (which see).—Post adjutant, a person holding the office of adjutant with reference to the organization, of whatever character, of the troops stationed at a post, garrison, camp, or cantonment. —Regimental adjutant, a person holding the office of adjutant with reference to a regimental organization, whether the regiment is in one place or dispersed at different stations.

adjutant-bird (aj'ö-tant-bėrd), n. The name given by English residents of Bengal to a very large species of stork, common in India, the Leptoptilus argala of some naturalists, belonging to the family Ciconiidæ. It is the Ardea dubia of Gmelin, the A. argala of Latham, the Ciconia marabou of Temminck, and the argala of the native Indians. Great confusion has been occasioned by the transference by Temminck of the native name, argala, to a related but distinct African species. The name marabou has likewise been given to both species, since both furnish the ornamental plumes so named in commerce. The African species should be distinguished as the marabou, the Indian species being left to bear its native name argala. The name adjutant, or adjutant-bird, is a nickname bestowed upon the bird from some fancied likeness of its bearing to the stiff martinet air of the military functionary known as an adjutant. The bird is a gigantic stork, 3 or often 4 feet high, and its expanded wings measure 10 feet from tip to tip. It has an enormous bill, nearly bare head and neck, and a sausage-like pouch hanging from the under part of the neck. It is one of the most voracious carnivorous birds known, and in India, from its devouring all sorts of carrion and noxious animals, is protected by law. Also called adjutant-crane, adjutant-stork, and pouched stork. The name is sometimes extended to a related species, L. javanicus, known as the lesser adjutant or adjutant-bird.

Adjutant-bird (Leptoptilus argala).

adjutant-crane (aj'ö-tant-krān), n. Same as adjutant-bird.

adjutant-general (aj'ö-tant-jen'ė-ral), n.; pl. adjutants-general. 1. Milit., an officer on the staff of the commanding general of an army, an army-corps, a division, or a brigade who issues the orders, keeps the records, etc., and acts as chief of staff when there is no regular chief of staff. The adjutant-general of the United States army was an important officer of the army from its establishment until 1903, when his office was abolished. He was adjutant-general both to the Secretary of War and to the commanding general of the army, and was in charge of the Adjutant-General's Department of the War Department. In 1903 his duties were assigned to the newly created offices of chief of staff and military secretary. In Great Britain the adjutant-general ranks next to the commander-in-chief, and in the latter's absence acts in his name. He also has charge of the Adjutant-General's Bureau, which deals with the organization, recruiting, mobilization, and discipline of the army. In the United States most of the individual States have adjutants-general of the militia.

2. Eccles., a title mistakenly given by translators to the assistants of the general of the Jesuits. See assistant, 3.

7. The act of prescribing medically.—8. The act of tendering or imposing, as an oath.—9. In law: (a) The management of the estate of an intestate person, or of a testator having no competent executor, under a commission (called letters of administration) from the proper authority. This management consists in collecting debts, paying debts and legacies, and distributing surplus among the next of kin. (b) In some jurisdictions, the management of the estate of a deceased person by an executor, the corresponding term execution not being in use.

Administration of a deceased person's estate may be granted for general, special, or limited purposes; as: (1) Administration durante absentia (during absence), when the next person entitled to the grant is beyond sea. (2) Administration pendente lite (while the suit is pending), when a suit is commenced in the probate court regarding the validity of a will or the right to administration, and lasting till the suit is determined. (3) Administration cum testamento annexo (with the will annexed), in cases where a testator makes a will without naming executors, or where the executors named in the will are incapable of acting or refuse to act. (4) Administration de bonis non (concerning goods not, that is, not administered), when the first administrator dies before he has fully administered. (5) Administration ad colligendum (for the purpose of collecting), for collecting and preserving goods about to perish. (6) Ancillary administration is subordinate to the principal administration for collecting the assets of foreigners. It is taken out in the country where the assets are. See ancillary. (7) Administration minori ætate (during minor age, or minority) is granted when the executor is a minor. (8) Foreign administration is administration exercised by authority of a foreign power.—Council of administration. See council.= Syn. 1. Conduct, control, superintendence, regulation, execution.

administrational (ad-min-is-trā′shon-al), a. Pertaining or relating to administration.

The administrational merits of Darius are so great that they have obscured his military glories.
G. Rawlinson, Five Great Monarchies, III. 429.

administrative (ad-min′is-trā-tiv), a. [< L. administrativus, practical, < administrare, pp. administratus: see administer, v.] Pertaining to administration; executive; administering.

The production and distribution of wealth, the growth and effect of administrative machinery, the education of the race, these are cases of general laws which constitute the science of sociology. W. K. Clifford, Lect., II. 284.

Sometimes the term Executive, which strictly means an Authority which puts the laws in force, is opposed to the term Administrative, which implies the performance of every other sort of immediate Governmental act, such as collecting taxes, organizing and directing the Army, Navy, and Police, supervising trade, locomotion, postal communication, and carrying out in detail legislative measures for promoting public health, education, morality, and general contentment. S. Amos, Sci. of Pol., p. 99.

administratively (ad-min′is-trā-tiv-li), adv. In an administrative manner; in relation to administration; from an administrative point of view; as regards administration.

Ar. al-, the, and the termination being variously accommodated), < Ar. amīr, emīr, a ruler, commander (see ameer and emir), the -al being due to the Ar. article al, present in all the Arabic and Turkish titles containing the word, as amīr-al-umarā, ruler of rulers, amīr-al-bahr, commander of the sea, amīr-al-mūminīn, commander of the faithful. The present sense of admiral is due to Ar. amīr-al-bahr, Latinized as admiralius maris and Englished under Edward III. as "amyrel of the se," or "admyrall of the navy," afterward simply admiral. N. E. D.] I. n. 1†. An emir or prince under the sultan; any Saracen ruler or commander. [The common Middle English and Old French sense.]—2. A naval officer of the highest rank; a commander-in-chief of a fleet. In the United States navy, as in most foreign services, there are three degrees of this rank, viz., admiral, vice-admiral, and rear-admiral. These titles did not exist in the United States till the grade of rear-admiral was created in 1862, that of vice-admiral in 1864, and that of admiral in 1866. The last was held by Farragut and Porter, and, by law, ceased to exist on the death of the latter in 1891. In 1899 the title of admiral was revived and was conferred upon Rear-admiral Dewey. The office of vice-admiral, which also was held by Farragut and Porter and by Admiral Rowan, was abolished in 1890 on the death of the last-named incumbent. An admiral displays his distinguishing flag at the mainmast, a vice-admiral at the foremast, and a rear-admiral at the mizzenmast. In the British navy, admirals were formerly divided into three classes, named, after the colors of their respective flags, admirals of the red, of the white, and of the blue, with vice-admirals and rear-admirals of each flag; but in 1864 this distinction was abolished, and all British men-of-war now display the white ensign.

3. The recognized chief commander or director of a mercantile fleet, as one of fishing-vessels off Newfoundland or in the North Sea. A royal proclamation in 1708 ordered that the master of the first vessel that entered a harbor or creek in Newfoundland for the fishing season should be admiral thereof, the second vice-admiral, and the third rear-admiral.

4. The ship which carries the admiral; hence, the most considerable ship of any fleet, as of merchantmen or of fishing-vessels.

The mast
Of some great ammiral.
Milton, P. L., i. 294.

5. A collectors' name for butterflies of the family Papilionidæ, especially the Limenitis camilla, distinguished as white admiral, and the Vanessa atalanta, or red admiral.—6. A name given by collectors of shells to a univalve shell, the admiral-shell (which see).—Admiral of the fleet, a title of distinction conferred on a few admirals in the British service, corresponding to that of field-marshal in the army.—Lord high admiral, in Great Britain, the officer at the head of the naval administration when, as has been rarely the case since 1632, the office is held by a single person. See admiralty.—Yellow admiral, a name applied in the British navy to a rear-admiral who is retired without having served afloat after his promotion.

II. a. Carrying an admiral; chief in a fleet.

The admiral galley . . . struck upon a rock.
Knolles, Hist. Turks.

admiral-shell (ad′mi-ral-shel), n. A shell of the genus Conus, the Conus ammiralis, a species formerly esteemed as much for its rarity as for its beauty.

admiralship (ad′mi-ral-ship), n. [< admiral + -ship.] The office or position of an admiral. [Rare.]

admiralty (ad′mi-ral-ti), n. [Early mod. E. admiraltie, amiraltye, amraltie, < ME. amyralte, ameralte, amrelte, < OF. admiralte, amiraulte: see admiral and -ty.] 1. In Great Britain: (a) The office and jurisdiction of the lords commissioners appointed to take the general management of maritime affairs, and of all matters relating to the royal navy, with the government of its various departments. (b) The body of officers appointed to execute the office of lord high admiral; a board of commissioners, called lords (or, in full, lords commissioners) of the admiralty, for the administration of naval affairs. (c) [cap.] The building in which the lords of the admiralty transact business, and in which are the clerks and other officials connected with this department.—2. That branch of law which deals with maritime cases and offenses.

The power [of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States] extends . . . to all cases of admiralty and marine jurisdiction. Calhoun, Works, I. 213.

Admiralty court, or court of admiralty, a tribunal having jurisdiction over maritime causes, whether of a civil or criminal nature. In England it was formerly held before the lord high admiral, and afterward before his deputy or the deputy of the lords commissioners; but now it forms a branch of the probate, divorce, and admiralty division of the High Court of Justice, the judge in it being appointed by the crown as one of the judges of the High Court. The English court of admiralty is twofold, the instance court and the prize court. The civil jurisdiction of the instance court extends generally to such contracts as are made upon the sea, and are founded in maritime service or consideration. It also regulates many other points of maritime law, as disputes between part-owners of vessels, and questions relating to salvage. It has likewise power to inquire into certain wrongs or injuries committed on the high seas, as in cases of collision. In criminal matters the court of admiralty has, partly by common law and partly by a variety of statutes, cognizance of piracy and all other indictable offenses committed either upon the sea or on the coasts when beyond the limits of any English county. The prize court is the only tribunal for deciding what is and what is not lawful prize, and for adjudicating upon all matters, civil and criminal, relating to prize, or every acquisition made by the law of war which is either itself of a maritime character or is made, whether at sea or by land, by a naval force. In Scotland the cases formerly brought before this court, which has been abolished, are now prosecuted in the Court of Session or in the sheriff court, in the same way as ordinary civil causes. In the United States the admiralty powers are exclusively vested in the federal courts. They extend over the great lakes and navigable rivers.—Droits of admiralty. See droit.—High Court of Admiralty, an ancient English court, held before the lord high admiral of England or his deputy (styled judge of the admiralty), with cognizance of all crimes and offenses committed either upon the sea or upon the coasts, out of the body or extent of any English county. It proceeded without jury, a method contrary to the genius of the law of England. Stephen.

admirance† (ad-mīr′ans), n. [< OF. admirance, < admirer; see admire and -ance.] Admiration.

[She] with great admirauncе inwardly was moved,
And honourd him with all that her behoved.
Spenser, F. Q., V. x. 39.

admiration (ad-mi-rā′shon), n. [< late ME. admyracion, < OF. admiration, < L. admiratio(n-), < admirari, admire: see admire.] 1†. Wonder; astonishment; surprise.

And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, . . . and when I saw her, I wondered with great admiration. Rev. xvii. 6.

Your boldness I with admiration see. Dryden.

2. Wonder mingled with approbation, esteem, love, or veneration; an emotion excited by what is novel, great, beautiful, or excellent: as, admiration of virtue or goodness; admiration of a beautiful woman or a fine picture.

Where imitation can go no farther, let admiration step on, whereof there is no end in the wisest form of men.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., III. 2.

If it should be here objected, as Cicero objected to Cæsar, "We have matter enough to admire, but would gladly see something to praise," I answer, that true admiration is a superlative degree of praise.
Bacon, Essays, etc. (Bohn ed.), p. 486.

There is a pleasure in admiration, and this is that which properly causeth admiration, when we discover a great deal in an object which we understand to be excellent.
Tillotson.

3†. The quality of exciting wonder or surprise; marvelousness; admirableness.

Admir'd Miranda!
Indeed the top of admiration.
Shak., Tempest, iii. 1.

4. An object of wonder or approbation: now only in the phrase the admiration of.

He was the admiration of all the negroes.
Irving, Sleepy Hollow.

Note of admiration, an exclamation-point (!).—To admiration, in a very excellent or admirable manner; in a manner to elicit admiration.

They have curious straw worke among the nunns, even to admiration. Evelyn, Diary, March 23, 1646.

[He] . . . moulded heads in clay or plaster of Paris to admiration, by the dint of natural genius merely.
Lamb, Old Benchers.

admirative (ad′mi-rā-tiv), a. and n. I. a. Expressing admiration or wonder. [Rare.]

II.† n. The point of exclamation or admiration (!).

admiratively (ad′mi-rā-tiv-li), adv. In an admirative manner; admiringly. [Rare.]

admire (ad-mīr′), v.; pret. and pp. admired, ppr. admiring. [< F. admirer, OF. admirer, earlier amirer, = Sp. Pg. admirar = It. ammirare, < L. admirari, wonder at, < ad, at, + mirari (for smīrari*), wonder, = Gr. μειδᾶν (for σμει-δᾶν*), smile, = Skt. √ smi, smile: cf. smile, smirk.] I. trans. 1. To regard with wonder or surprise; wonder or marvel at: formerly used literally, but now chiefly in an ironical or sarcastic sense, with reference to meaning 2: as, I admire your audacity.

Neither is it to be admired that Henry, who was a wise as well as a valiant prince, should be pleased to have the greatest wit of those times in his interests.
Dryden, Pref. to Fables.

One hardly knows whether most to admire the stupidity of such a degradation or to detest its guilt.
Farrar, Marlb. Sermons, iv. 36.

2. To regard with wonder mingled with approbation, esteem, reverence, or affection; feel admiration for; take pleasure in the beauty or qualities of; look on or contemplate with pleasure.

The fact seems to be, that the Greeks admired only themselves, and that the Romans admired only themselves and the Greeks. Macaulay, History.

And Enid woke and sat beside the couch,
Admiring him, and thought within herself,
Was ever man so grandly made as he?
Tennyson, Geraint.

II. intrans. 1. To wonder; be affected with surprise; marvel: sometimes with at. [Nearly obsolete in the literal sense.]

Let none admire
That riches grow in hell. Milton, P. L., i. 690.

I admire where a fellow of his low rank should acquire such a nobleness and dignity of sentiment. Henry Brooke.

I more admire at a third party, who were loyal when rebellion was uppermost, and have turned rebels (at least in principle) since loyalty has been triumphant.
Dryden, Ded. of Plutarch's Lives.

2. To feel or express admiration.

I'll report it,
Where senators shall mingle tears with smiles;
Where great patricians shall attend, and shrug,
I' the end admire. Shak., Cor., i. 9.

3. To feel pleasure; be pleased: as, I should admire to go. [Colloq., U. S.]

admired† (ad-mīrd′), p. a. Regarded with wonder; wonderful; astonishing.

You have displac'd the mirth, broke the good meeting,
With most admir'd disorder. Shak., Macbeth, iii. 4.

admirer (ad-mīr′ėr), n. One who admires; specifically, one who pays court to or manifests his admiration of a woman; a lover.

For fear of Lucia's escape, the mother is . . . constantly attended by a rival that explains her age, and draws off the eyes of her admirers. Tatler, No. 206.

admiringly (ad-mīr′ing-li), adv. In an admiring manner; with admiration; in the manner of an admirer.

admissibility (ad-mis-i-bil′i-ti), n. [< admissible, after F. admissibilité.] The quality of being admissible.

admissible (ad-mis′i-bl), a. [< F. admissible, < ML. admissibilis, < L. admissus, pp. of admittere, admit: see admit.] 1. Capable or worthy of being admitted or suffered to enter.

They were admissible to political and military employment. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

2. That may be allowed or conceded; allowable: as, your proposals are not admissible.—3. In law, capable of being considered in reaching a decision: used of evidence offered in a judicial investigation.

No confession is admissible when made in terror.
W. Phillips, Speeches, p. 200.

admissibleness (ad-mis′i-bl-nes), n. The quality or state of being admissible or allowable.

admissibly (ad-mis′i-bli), adv. In an admissible manner; so as to be admitted, entertained, or allowed.

★admission (ad-mish′on), n. [< ME. admyssion, < L. admissio(n-), < admissus, pp. of admittere, admit: see admit.] 1. The act of admitting or allowing to enter; the state of being admitted; entrance afforded by permission, by provision or existence of means, or by the removal of obstacles: as, the admission of aliens into a country; the admission of light into a room by a window or by opening the window.

Some minds seem well glazed by nature against the admission of knowledge.
George Eliot, Theophrastus Such, p. 91.

2. Admittance; power or permission to enter; entrance; access; power to approach: as, to grant a person admission.

I . . . applied to one of the vergers for admission to the library. Irving, Mutability of Lit.

3. The price paid for entrance; admission fee: as, the admission was one dollar.—4. Eccles.: (a) In the Church of England, an act of a bishop accepting a candidate presented to a benefice. (b) In the Presbyterian churches, especially in Scotland, a similar official act of a presbytery admitting a minister to his church.—5. The act of expressing assent to an argument or proposition, especially one urged by an opponent or adversary; hence, a point or statement admitted; concession; allowance: as, this admission lost him the argument.—6. Acknowledgment; confession of a charge, an error, or a crime: as, he made full admission of his guilt.

Maggie had no sooner uttered this entreaty than she was wretched at the admission it implied.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, vi. 9.

7. In law: (a) A voluntary acknowledgment that something is true. Admissions in an action may be made by a party to it, or by his attorney, in writing or in open court. Other admissions, whether by word or act, may be proved against a party if they were made by him or by one authorized by or sufficiently identified with him. (b) The act of receiving evidence offered upon a judicial investigation, as competent for consideration in reaching a decision.

= Syn. 2. Admittance, Admission. See admittance.

admissive (ad-mis′iv), a. [< LL. admissivus (used once in sense of 'permissive'), < L. admissus, pp. of admittere, admit: see admit.] Tending to admit; having the nature of an admission; containing an admission or acknowledgment.

A compliment which is always more admissive than excusatory. Lamb, Elia.

admissory (ad-mis′ō-ri), a. [< L. as if admissorius*, < admissor, one who grants or allows, < admittere, pp. admissus, admit: see admit.] Granting admittance; admitting.

admit (ad-mit′), v.; pret. and pp. admitted, ppr. admitting. [< ME. admitten, amitten, amytten, < OF. admettre, amettre, < L. admittere, lit. send to, < ad, to, + mittere, send: see missile.] I. trans. 1. To suffer to enter; grant or afford entrance to: as, to admit a student into college; windows admit light and air; to admit a serious thought into the mind.

Mirth, admit me of thy crew. Milton, L'Allegro, l. 38.

O, I am a brute, when I but admit a doubt of your true constancy! Sheridan, The Rivals, iii. 2.

2. To give right or means of entrance to: as, a ticket admits one into a theater; this key will admit you to the garden.—3. To permit to exercise a certain function; grant power to hold a certain office: as, he was admitted to the bar; to admit a man to the ministry.—4. To have capacity for the admission of at one time: as, this passage admits two abreast.—5. To grant in argument; receive as true; concede; allow: as, the argument or fact is admitted.

It was admitted that the heavy expenditure which had been occasioned by the late troubles justified the king in asking some further supply. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

It is so hard for shrewdness to admit
Folly means no harm when she calls black white!
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 36.

6. To permit, grant, allow, or be capable of: as, the words do not admit such a construction. See II.—7. To acknowledge; own; confess: as, he admitted his guilt. = Syn. Acknowledge, Admit, Confess, etc. (see acknowledge); to let in, receive, take in.

II. intrans. To give warrant or allowance; grant opportunity or permission: with of: as, circumstances do not admit of this; the text does not admit of this interpretation.

Economy is a subject which admits of being treated with levity, but it cannot so be disposed of.
Thoreau, Walden, p. 33.

To answer a question so as to admit of no reply, is the test of a man,—to touch bottom every time.
Emerson, Clubs.

admittable (ad-mit′a-bl), a. [< admit + -able. Cf. admissible.] Capable of being admitted or allowed. Sometimes spelled admittible. [Rare.]

★admittance (ad-mit′ans), n. [< admit + -ance.] 1. The act of admitting.—2. Permission to enter; the power or right of entrance; hence, actual entrance: as, he gained admittance into the church.

[Bacon's philosophy] found no difficulty in gaining admittance, without a contest, into every understanding fitted . . . to receive her. Macaulay, Lord Bacon.

3†. Concession; admission; allowance: as, the admittance of an argument.—4†. The custom or privilege of being admitted to the society of the great.

Sir John, . . . you are a gentleman of excellent breeding, . . . of great admittance. Shak., M. W. of W., ii. 2.

5. In law, the giving possession of a copyhold estate. = Syn. 1 and 2. Admittance, Admission, introduction, initiation, reception, welcome, access. In the separation of admittance and admission, the latter has taken the figurative senses, while not yet wholly abandoning to the former the literal ones. Hence in its figurative use admission has meanings that admittance has not. When admission has the literal meaning, its use is generally broader, having less definiteness with respect to place. No admittance except through the office; admission to the harbor; admission to the peerage; he gave no admission to unkind thoughts; admission of a fault. Perhaps admission implies somewhat more of selection or judgment passed upon the person admitted: as, admission to society.

He [the traveler] must obtain admittance to the convivial table and the domestic hearth. Macaulay, Hist. Eng.

When once love pleads admission to our hearts,
In spite of all the virtue we can boast,
The woman who deliberates is lost.
Addison, Cato, iv. 1.

It is to M. Guizot that I was . . . obliged for admission to the French archives. Bancroft, Hist. Const., Pref.

admittatur (ad-mi-tā′tėr), n. [L., let him be admitted, 3d pers. sing. pres. subj. pass. of admittere, admit: see admit.] A certificate of admission to membership in a university or college.

admittedly (ad-mit'ed-li), adv. In an acknowledged manner; confessedly.

The influence of ocean-currents in the distribution of heat over the surface of the globe would still be admittedly erroneous. J. Croll, Climate and Time, p. 52.

admittendo clerico (ad-mi-ten'dō kler'i-kō). [ML., for admitting a clerk (clergyman): L. admit'endo, abl. of admittendus, gerund of admittere, admit: see admit; ML. clerico, abl. of clericus, a clerk: see clerk.] An old English writ, issued to the bishop instead of to the sheriff as in ordinary actions, to enforce a judgment establishing the right of the crown to make a presentation to a benefice.

admittendo in socium (ad-mi-ten'dō in sō'shi-um). [ML., for admitting as an associate: L. admittendo: see above; in, to, as; socium, acc. of socius, a fellow, associate: see social.] An old English writ addressed to justices of assize requiring them to associate with themselves other designated persons, commonly knights of the county, in holding assizes at the circuit.

admitter (ad-mit'ėr), n. One who or that which admits.

admittible (ad-mit'i-bl), a. [< admit + -ible: see -able, -ible.] Same as admittable.

admix (ad-miks'), v. t.; pret. and pp. admixed and admixt, ppr. admixing. [First in p. a. admixed, prop. admixt, of L. origin, < admixtus, pp. of admiscere, mix with, < ad, to, + miscere = AS. miscan, E. mix, q. v.] To mingle with something else; add to something else. See mix.

The small quantities of alkalies present [in the topaz] may be attributed either to admixed impurity, or to an incipient alteration. Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXIX. 329.

admixtion† (ad-miks'chọn), n. [< L. admixtio(n-), < admiscere, pp. admixtus, mix with: see admix.] The act of mingling or admixing; a mingling of different substances; the addition of an ingredient; admixture.

All metals may be calcined by strong waters, or by admixtion of salt, sulphur, and mercury. Bacon.

admixture (ad-miks'tụ̈r), n. [< L. admixtus, pp. of admiscere, mix with: see admix and mixture.] 1. The act of mingling or mixing; the state of being mingled or mixed.

When a metallic vapour is subjected to admixture with another gas or vapour, or to reduced pressure, its spectrum becomes simplified. J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 154.

2. That which is mingled or formed by mingling; a compound made by mixture.—3. An ingredient different in kind from that which gives a mixture its principal properties.—4. In general, anything added; especially, any alien element or ingredient.

ad modum (ad mō'dum). [L.; lit., to the way, mode, means, manner: ad, to; modum, acc. of modus: see mode.] In the manner; in such way, or to such effect; as; like.

admonish (ad-mon'ish), v. t. [< ME. admonysshen, amonysshen, -esshen, -asen, etc., earlier and prop. amonesten, -isten (adm- for am- in imitation of the L. original, and -ish for -est in imitation of verbs in -ish[2]), < OF. amonester (F. admonester), advise, < ML. admonistare*, a corruption of admonitare, freq. of L. admonere, pp. admonitus, advise, < ad, to, + monere, advise, warn: see monish, monition.] 1. To notify of or reprove for a fault; reprove with mildness.

Count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother. 2 Thes. iii. 15.

2. To counsel against something; caution or advise; exhort; warn.

I warn'd thee, I admonish'd thee, foretold
The danger and the lurking enemy.
Milton, P. L., ix. 1171.

Me fruitful scenes and prospects waste Alike admonish not to roam.
Cowper, The Shrubbery.

3. To instruct or direct; guide.

Ye choice spirits that admonish me.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 3.

Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle. Heb. viii. 5.

This view, which admonishes me where the sources of wisdom and power lie, carries upon its face the highest certificate of truth. Emerson, Nature.

4. To inform; acquaint with; notify; remind; recall or incite to duty.

The angel bright,
Ere he drew nigh, his radiant visage turn'd, Admonish'd by his ear. Milton, P. L., iii. 647.

But Maggie stood, right sair astonish'd,
Till by the heel and hand admonish'd.
Burns, Tam o' Shanter.

admonisher (ad-mon'ish-ėr), n. One who reproves or counsels.

Horace was a mild admonisher, a court satirist fit for the gentle times of Augustus. Dryden.

admonishingly (ad-mon'ish-ing-li), adv. By way of admonition; in an admonishing manner.

admonishment (ad-mon'ish-mẹnt), n. Admonition; counsel; warning. [Rare.]

When was my lord so much ungently temper'd
To stop his ears against admonishment?
Unarm, unarm, and do not fight to-day.
Shak., T. and C., v. 3.

Thy grave admonishments prevail with me.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., ii. 5.

admonition (ad-mō-nish'ọn), n. [< ME. amonicion, -oun, < OF. amonition, later admonition, < L. admonitio(n-), < admonere, advise, admonish: see admonish.] 1. The act, or an act, of admonishing; counsel or advice; gentle reproof; instruction in duties; caution; direction.

Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples: and they are written for our admonition. 1 Cor. x. 11.

He learns the look of things, and none the less
For admonitions from the hunger-pinch.
Browning, Fra Lippo Lippi.

2. Eccles., public or private reproof to reclaim an offender: the first step in church discipline, followed, when unheeded, by suspension or excommunication.—Syn. Admonition, Reprehension, Reproof, Monition, Censure, Reproach, Rebuke, Reprimand, remonstrance, expostulation, warning, suggestion, hint, intimation. In the primary and almost invariable sense, admonition, reprehension, and reproof are bestowed upon conduct which is morally defective. Censure and reprehension may or may not be addressed directly to the person blamed; the utterances expressed by the other words are always so addressed. Admonition is caution or warning with reference to future conduct; it is often based upon past failures: as, admonition not to repeat a fault. It is often an official act, as of the authorities of a church, school, or college. Monition is a softer word, and is mostly confined to subjective promptings or warnings: as, the monitions of conscience or of reason. The other words are wholly retrospective. Reprehension may be the mildest of them, or may be strengthened by an adjective: as, the severest reprehension. It is unofficial, and may denote the act of an equal. Reproof is the act of a superior or elder, an authoritative and personal censure. Censure is unfavorable judgment, generally severe, possibly official. Reproach is censure with opprobrium; it is used chiefly as a relief to excited feelings, and is intended to humiliate rather than correct. Rebuke is energetic and summary, like stopping one's mouth; it implies feeling, like reproach, but more self-control. Reprimand is the act of a superior, is severe, and is often official and public as a form of penalty: as, sentenced to receive a reprimand from his commanding officer in the presence of the regiment. (See the discrimination of corresponding verbs under censure, v.)

A man that is an heretic, after the first and second admonition, reject. Tit. iii. 10.

The admonitions, fraternal or parental, of his fellow-Christians, or the governors of the church, then more public reprehensions. Hammond.

Those best can bear reproof who merit praise.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 583.

Divine monition Nature yields,
That not by bread alone we live.
Wordsworth, Devotional Incitements.

The pain of a little censure, even when it is unfounded, is more acute than the pleasure of much praise.
Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 440.

Dread of reproach, both by checking cowardice in battle and by restraining misbehaviour in social life, has tended to public and private advantage.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 526.

My caution was more pertinent
Than the rebuke you give it. Shak., Cor., ii. 2.

The knight . . . inquires how such an one's wife, or mother, or son, or father do[es], whom he does not see at church; which is understood as a secret reprimand to the person absent. Addison, Spectator.

admonitioner (ad-mō-nish'ọn-ėr), n. [Formerly also admonishioner; < admonition + -er[1].] An admonisher; a dispenser of admonitions; specifically, an Admonitionist (which see). Hales.

Admonitionist (ad-mō-nish'ọn-ist), n. [< admonition + -ist.] A name given to the followers of Thomas Cartwright, two of whom in 1572 published "An Admonition to Parliament," followed by a second one by himself, strongly advocating church government by presbyters as opposed to bishops, and the supremacy of the church over the state.

admonitive (ad-mon'i-tiv), a. [< L. admonitus, pp. of admonere: see admonish.] Containing admonition. [Rare.]

Instructive and admonitive emblems.
Barrow, Works, II. xxvi.

admonitor (ad-mon'i-tọr), n. [L., < admonere: see admonish.] An admonisher; a monitor.

Conscience . . . is at most times a very faithful and very prudent admonitor. Shenstone, Essays (1763), p. 222.

admonitorial (ad-mon-i-tō'ri-al), a. [< admonitory + -al.] Reproving; admonishing; having the manner of an admonitor; admonitory.

Miss Tox . . . had acquired an admonitorial tone, and a habit of improving passing occasions.
Dickens, Dombey and Son, li.

admonitorily (ad-mon'i-tō-ri-li), adv. In an admonitory manner; with warning or reproof. Carlyle.

admonitory (ad-mon'i-tō-ri), a. [< L. as if admonitorius;* cf. admonitorium, an admonition.] Containing admonition; tending or serving to admonish: as, "admonitory of duty," Barrow, Works, I. 430.

II. n. Doing; action; business; bustle; trouble; labor; difficulty: as, to persuade one with much ado.

Let's follow, to see the end of this ado.
Shak., T. of the S., v. i.

We had much ado to keepe ourselves above water, the billows breaking desperately on our vessel.
Evelyn, Diary, Sept. 22, 1641.

And what is life, that we should moan? why make we such ado?
Tennyson, May Queen, Conclusion.

-ado. [Sp. Pg. -ado, It. -ato = F. é, < L. ātus, m.: see -ate[1].] A suffix of Latin origin, the Spanish masculine form of -ade[1], -ate[1], as in renegado, desperado, etc. In some words -ado is an erroneous form of -ada, as in bastinado. See -ada.

★adobe (a-dō'bi), n. and a. [Also adobie, adobi, and dobie: Sp. adobe, in Valencia adob, atoba = Pg. adobe, adobo, < Ar. aṭṭúba, collective aṭṭúb, < al, the, + túb, ṭób, < Coptic tôbe, tôbi, < Egypt. (hieroglyphic) tb, burnt brick.] I. n. 1. An unburnt, sun-dried brick: in common use in countries of small rainfall.

This is a desolate town of two thousand inhabitants dwelling in low dilapidated huts of the most common building material in the Andes — adobe, or sun-dried blocks of mud mingled with straw.
J. Orton, Andes and Amazon, p. 46.

2. Clay or soil from which sun-dried bricks are made, or which is suitable for making them.— 3. In the quicksilver-mines of the Pacific coast, a brick made of the finer ores mixed with clay, for more convenient handling in the furnace.

II. a. 1. Built or made of adobes or sun-dried bricks.—2. Suitable for making sun-dried bricks: as, an adobe soil.

★adolescence (ad-ō-les'ens), n. [< ME. adolescence, < OF. adolescence, < L. adolescentia, usually adulescentia, < adolescen(t-)s, usually adulescen(t-)s, young: see adolescent.] The state of growing; specifically, youth, or the period of life between puberty and the full development of the frame, extending in man from about the age of fourteen years to twenty-five, and in woman from twelve to twenty-one: applied almost exclusively to the young of the human race.

★adolescency (ad-ō-les'en-si), n. The quality or state of being adolescent or in the growing age.

adolescent (ad-ō-les'ent), a. and n. [< late ME. adolescente, n., < OF. adolescent, < L. adolescen(t-)s, usually adulescen(t-)s, growing up, not yet grown, young, a youth, prop. ppr. (and as such prop. written adolescen(t-)s) of adolescere, grow up (see adult), < ad, to, + olescere, the inceptive form of olēre*, grow, < alĕre, nourish: see aliment.] I. a. Growing up; advancing from childhood to manhood or womanhood; youthful.

Schools, unless discipline were doubly strong,
Detain their adolescent charge too long.
Cowper, Tirocinium.

II. n. One who is growing up; a person of either sex during the period of adolescence.

adolode (ad'ō-lōd), n. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + δόλος, fraud (see dole[3], deceit), + ὁδός, way.] An apparatus for detecting fraud in distillation.

Adonai (ad-ō-nā'ī or a-dō'nī), n. [Heb. adōnāi, lit. 'my lords,' < adōn, lord. Cf. Adonis.] A Hebrew name of God, reverentially used in reading as a substitute for the "ineffable name" JHVH, that is, Jehovah. See Adonist and Jehovah.

Adonean (ad-ō-nē'an), a. [< L. Adonēus, < Gr. Ἀδώνειος, < Ἄδωνις, Adonis.] Pertaining to or connected with Adonis: as, "fair Adonean Venus," Faber.

Adonia (a-dō'ni-ạ), n. pl. [L., < Gr. Ἀδώνια, prop. neut. pl. of adj. Ἀδώνιος, pertaining to Ἄδωνις, Adonis.] A festival of two days' duration (properly, the rites performed during the festival), anciently celebrated by women in honor of Adonis, among the Phenicians and Greeks. The first day was spent in mourning and lamentation, and the second in feasting and merrymaking, commemorating the periodical death and return to life of Adonis, personifying the alternation of the seasons and the productive forces in nature.

Adonian (a-dō'ni-an), a. Same as Adonic.

Quevedo . . . must have done violence to his genius in the composition of ten short pieces, which he calls Eudechas, in Adonian verse. Ticknor, Span. Lit., III. 52.

Adonic (a-don'ik), a. and n. [< L. as if Adonicus*, < Adonis.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Adonis. See Adonis, etymology.—Adonic verse. See II.

II. n. An Adonic verse: so called, it is said, because used in songs sung at the Adonia, or festival of Adonis. It consists of a dactyl and a spondee or trochee, as rārā jŭvĕntŭs, and on account of its animated movement is adapted to gay and lively poetry. It is seldom used by itself, but is joined with other kinds of verse. It is said to have been devised by Sappho.

Adonis (a-dō'nis), n. [< L. Adōnis, < Gr. Ἄδωνις, also Ἄδων, in myth., a favorite of Aphrodite (Venus); according to the oldest tradition, the son of Theias, king of Assyria, and his daughter Myrrha or Smyrna. He was killed by a wild boar, but was permitted by Zeus to pass four months every year in the lower world, four with Aphrodite, and four where he chose. The name, like the myth, is of Phenician origin, akin to Heb. adōn, lord: see Adonai.] 1. A beau; a dandy; an exquisite: as, he is quite an Adonis.—2. In bot., a genus of European ranunculaceous herbs which have dissected leaves. In the corn-adonis, or pheasant's-eye, A. autumnalis, the petals are bright scarlet, and are considered as emblematical of the blood of Adonis, from which the plant is fabled to have sprung.

3†. [l. c.] A kind of wig formerly worn.

He puts on a fine flowing adonis or white periwig.
R. Graves, Spirit. Quixote, III. xix.

Adonist (a-dō'nist), n. [< Heb. adōnāi (see Adonai) + -ist.] One who maintained that the vowel-points ordinarily written under the consonants of the Hebrew word JHVH (pronounced since the sixteenth century, except among the Jews, Jehovah) are not the natural points belonging to that word, but are vowel-points belonging to the words Adonai and Elohim; these words are substituted in reading by the Jews for the name JHVH, a name which they are forbidden to utter, and the true pronunciation of which is lost. Those persons who held the opposite view were termed Jehovists.

adonize (ad'ō-nīz), v. t. [= F. adoniser; < Adonis, q. v., + -ize.] To make beautiful or attractive; adorn one's self with the view of attracting admiration: said only of men. [Rare.]

I employed three good hours at least in adjusting and adonizing myself. Smollett, tr. of Gil Blas, III. 418.

adoors† (a-dōrz'), prep. phr. as adv. [A reduced form of both of doors and at doors, as in the phrases out of doors, out o' doors, forth a doors, and in a doors, in at doors: see a-[3], a-[7], and door.] At doors; at the door.

If I get in a-doors, not the power o' th' country,
Nor all my aunt's curses shall disembogue me.
Fletcher and Shirley, Night-Walker, v. 1.

adopt (a-dopt'), v. [< F. adopter, < L. adoptare, adopt, choose, < ad, to, + optare, wish: see optative.] I. trans. 1. To choose for or take to one's self; make one's own by selection or assent; receive or agree to as a personal belonging or opinion: as, to adopt a name or an idea; an adopted citizen or country; the meeting adopted the resolution.

Tell me, may not a king adopt an heir?
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., i. 1.

I have adopted the Roman sentiment, that it is more honourable to save a citizen than to kill an enemy.
Johnson, Pref. to Shak.

Men resist the conclusion in the morning, but adopt it as the evening wears on, that temper prevails over everything of time, place, and condition.
Emerson, Experience.

2. Specifically, to admit into a relation of affiliation; confer the rights or privileges of kinship upon, as one who is not naturally related or connected; especially, to receive and treat as a child or member of one's family, etc.: as, the orphans were adopted by friends. See adoption, 2.—3. To take or receive into any kind of new relationship: as, to adopt a person as an heir, or as a friend, guide, or example.

Titus, I am incorporate in Rome,
A Roman now adopted happily.
Shak., Tit. And., i. 2.

Strangers were very rarely adopted into a right of property in clan land in the early time.
D. W. Ross, German Land-holding, p. 73.

II. intrans. In euchre, to play with the suit turned up for trumps: a privilege of the dealer.

adoptability (a-dop-ta-bil'i-ti), n.; pl. adoptabilities (-tiz). The state of being adoptable; the capability of being adopted; that which can be adopted or made use of: as, "the select adoptabilities," Carlyle, Past and Present, II. xvii.

adoptable (a-dop'ta-bl), a. [< adopt + -able.] Capable of being adopted; fit or worthy to be adopted.

The Liturgy or adoptable and generally adopted set of prayers. Carlyle, Past and Present, II. xvii.

adoptant (a-dop'tant), a. and n. [< F. adoptant, < L. adoptan(t-)s, ppr. of adoptare: see adopt.] I. a. Adopting.

II. n. One who adopts a child or thing as his own.

adoptate† (a-dop'tāt), v. t. [< L. adoptatus, pp. of adoptare: see adopt.] To adopt.

adoptative (a-dop'ta-tiv), a. [< L. adoptatus, pp. of adoptare (see adopt), + -ive.] Same as adoptive. [Rare.]

adoptedly† (a-dop'ted-li), adv. By adoption.

Lucio. Is she your cousin?
Isab. Adoptedly, as school-maids change their names.
Shak., M. for M., i. 5.

★adopter (a-dop'tėr), n. One who or that which adopts.

adoptian (a-dop'shan), a. [< ML. Adoptiani, the adoptian heretics, irreg. < L. adoptare: see adopt.] In theol., of or pertaining to the doctrine of adoption.—Adoptian controversy. See adoptionism.

adoptianism (a-dop'shan-izm), n. [< adoptian + -ism.] Same as adoptionism.

The recantation was probably insincere, for on returning to his diocese he [Felix, bishop of Urgel] taught adoptianism as before. Encyc. Brit., I. 163.

adoptianist (a-dop'shan-ist), n. [< adoptian + -ist.] Same as adoptionist.

It was under this pontificate [Leo III.] that Felix of Urgel, the adoptianist, was anathematized by a Roman synod. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 449.

adoption (a-dop'shon), n. [< L. adoptio(n-), a shorter form of adoptatio(n-), < adoptare, adopt: see adopt.] 1. The act of adopting or taking as one's own; a choosing for use, or by way of preference or approval; assumption; formal acceptance: as, the adoption of a distinctive dress; he favored the adoption of the bill; the adoption of a new word into a language.

The adoption of vice has ruined ten times more young men than natural inclinations. Lord Chesterfield.

2. The act of taking into an affiliated relation; admission to some or all of the privileges of natural kinship or membership: as, the adoption of a child; adoption into a tribe; a son by adoption. Simple adoption of a child extends only to his treatment as a member of the household; legal adoption may confer upon him any or all of the rights of actual relationship. In the absence of any legally assumed obligation, an adopted child is not in law deemed a relative of the adopting parent, and does not inherit as such, and the adopting parent acquires no other authority than that which affection or the consent of the natural parent may give. The civil or statute laws of most countries strictly regulate the principles of legal adoption with reference to its limitation, the rights of natural heirs, etc.

3. In theol., that act of divine grace by which, through Christ, those who have been justified "are taken into the number and enjoy the liberties and privileges of the children of God." West. Conf. of Faith, xii.

But ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. Rom. viii. 15.

adoptional (a-dop'shon-al), a. [< adoption + -al.] Relating to adoption.

adoptionism (a-dop'shon-izm), n. [< adoption + -ism.] In theol., the doctrine that Christ is the Son of God by adoption only. It was held that, as the son of David, he had simply a human nature, which afterward by an act of adoption became united with the divine nature, or the eternal Word. This doctrine, though not unknown in the early church, was first distinctly propounded in Spain near the end of the eighth century by Felix, bishop of Urgel, and Elipandus, archbishop of Toledo. It was opposed by Alcuin, and condemned by three councils, at Ratisbon in 792, at Frankfort in 794, and at Aix-la-Chapelle about 799. Also written adoptianism.

adoptionist (a-dop'shon-ist), n. [< adoption + -ist.] One who holds the doctrine of adoptionism. Also written adoptianist.

adoptious† (a-dop'shus), a. [< adoption + -ous. Cf. ambitious, ambition.] Adoptive; adopted or assumed.

Pretty, fond, adoptious christendoms.
Shak., All's Well, i. 1.

adoptive (a-dop'tiv), a. [< L. adoptivus, < adoptare: see adopt.] 1. Fitted for or given to adopting: as, a receptive and adoptive language.—2. Constituted by adoption; adopting or adopted: as, an adoptive father or son.—3. Assumed: as, "adoptive and cheerful boldness," Milton, Ref. in Eng., i.—Adoptive arms, in her., arms which the adopter is obliged to marshal with his own, as the condition of some honor or estate left him.

adoptively (a-dop'tiv-li), adv. In an adoptive manner; by way of adoption.

adorability (a-dōr-a-bil'i-ti), n. [< adorable: see -bility.] The quality of being adorable. Coleridge.

adorable (a-dōr'a-bl), a. [< F. adorable, < L. adorabilis, < adorare, adore: see adore[1].] 1. Demanding adoration; worthy of being adored; worthy of divine honors.

There are those who have treated the history of Abraham as an astronomical record, and have spoken of our adorable Saviour as the sun in Aries.
J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 364.

2. Worthy of the utmost love or admiration: as, she is an adorable creature; an adorable statue.

When he [the pope] touched, as he did briefly, on the misfortunes of the church, an adorable fire came into his eyes. T. B. Aldrich, Ponkapog to Pesth, p. 114.

adorableness (a-dōr′a-bl-nes), n. The quality of being adorable, or worthy of adoration.

adorably (a-dōr′a-bli), adv. In a manner worthy of adoration.

adoral (ad-ō′ral), a. [< L. ad, to, + os (ōr-), mouth, + -al; after aboral.] In zoöl., situated at or near the mouth; being relatively toward the mouth: the opposite of aboral.

They [Halteriæ] have a spiral adoral wreath of cilia for swimming. Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 43.

The object of the unique, one-sided arrangement of the adoral cilia is to direct food-particles to the mouth.
Amer. Jour. of Sci., 3d ser., XXIX. 328.

adorally (ad-ō′ral-i), adv. Toward or in the direction of the mouth.

adoration (ad-ō-rā′shon), n. [< F. adoration, < L. adoratio(n-), < adorare: see adore[1].] 1. The act of paying honors, as to a divine being; worship addressed to a deity; the supreme worship due to God alone. [Sometimes used specifically of words addressed to the Deity expressive of a sense of his infinite holiness and perfection.] In the Rom. Cath. Ch., adoration is applied to any one of three kinds of worship (though properly only to the first), namely: latria, or worship due to God alone; dulia, or the secondary worship paid to angels and saints directly, or through the veneration of relics and images; and hyperdulia, the higher worship paid to the Virgin Mary. The saints and the Virgin are adored as the friends of God, having intercessory power with him.

Lowly reverent
Towards either throne they bow, and to the ground
With solemn adoration down they cast Their crowns. Milton, P. L., iii. 351.

Knowledge is the fire of adoration, adoration is the gate of knowledge. Bushnell, Sermons for New Life, p. 163.

They [Indians] perform their adorations and conjurations in the general language before spoken of, as the Catholics of all nations do their mass in the Latin.
Beverley, Virginia, iii. ¶ 31.

2. Homage, or an act of homage, paid to one in high place or held in high esteem; profound reverence; the utmost respect, regard, or esteem; the highest degree of love, as of a man for a woman; heart's devotion.

Oli. How does he love me?
Vio. With adorations, with fertile tears,
With groans that thunder love, with sighs of fire.
Shak., T. N., i. 5.

3. In art and archæol.: (a) A representation of the adoration of the infant Jesus by the magi or the shepherds. (b) A representation of the worship of an ancient divinity, of the deified dead, or of a king or an emperor. In Latin, adoratio. Such representations are common in Greek vase-paintings and funeral sculptures, and in Roman reliefs and medals. The ancient adoration is usually characterized by the gesture of raising the right hand, particularly with the thumb laid on the first finger; though it is sometimes exhibited, chiefly in Oriental examples, in a prostrate position.

An ancient Adoration.—Coin of Ephesus struck under Macrinus; British Museum. (Size of the original.)

4. A method of electing a pope. See extract.

The third way of creating Popes is by Adoration, which is perform'd in this manner: That Cardinal who . . . desires to favour any other Cardinal . . . puts himself before him in the Chappel, and makes him a low Reverence; and when it falls out that two thirds of the Cardinals do the same, the Pope is then understood to be created.
G. H., tr. of Hist. Cardinals, III. 286. (N. E. D.)

Adoration of the blessed sacrament, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., supreme worship (latria) paid to the eucharist. "Catholics pay to the eucharist . . . wherever it may be present that supreme worship which is due to God alone." Cath. Dict. (1884), p. 321. Religious communities of women for the perpetual adoration of the blessed sacrament have been founded at various times, the first by Anne of Austria, mother of Louis XIV.—Adoration of the cross, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., that part of the service on Good Friday, following the prayers, in which the cross is exposed to view and "adored" by clergy and people.—Adoration of the host, in the celebration of the mass, the silent worship paid by the congregation, kneeling, at the elevation of the host. See host[3].—Adoration of the pope, a mark of homage paid to the pope immediately after his election, by kissing the golden cross on the sandal worn on his right foot. Cardinals also kiss his right hand, receiving in return the kiss of peace. The ceremony is four times repeated; the first two adorations take place in the conclave itself, the third in the Sistine chapel, and the fourth in St. Peter's, where the homage of the people is received.

adoratory (a-dōr′a-tō-ri), n.; pl. adoratories (-riz). [< ML. adoratorium, explained as a place where the Indians worship their deities and sacrifice to them, < L. adorare, adore: see adore[1] and oratory.] A place of worship; especially, a pagan temple or place of sacrifice. [Rare.]

adore[1] (a-dōr′), v.; pret. and pp. adored, ppr. adoring. [< ME. adouren, < OF. adourer, adorer (earlier ME. aouren, < OF. aourer, aürer, aörer), mod. F. adorer = Pr. Sp. Pg. adorar = It. adorare, adore, < L. adorare, speak to, address, beseech, pray to, adore, worship, < ad, to, + orare, speak, pray, < os (ōr-), the mouth: see oral.] I. trans. 1. To worship; pay supreme reverence to; address in prayer and thanksgiving; pay divine honors to; honor as divine.

Bishops and priests . . . bearing the host, which he publicly adored. Smollett, Hist. Eng., an. 1689.

God shall be all in all. But, all ye gods,
Adore him, who to compass all this dies;
Adore the Son, and honour him as me.
Milton, P. L., iii. 342.

2. To honor and regard in a very high degree; regard with the utmost esteem, love, and respect.

The people appear adoring their prince. Tatler, No. 57.

Thus, Madam, in the midst of crowds, you reign in solitude; and are adored with the deepest veneration, that of silence. Dryden, Ded. of State of Innocence.

When he who adores thee has left but the name
Of his faults and his follies behind. Moore, Irish Mel.

=Syn. Adore, Worship, Reverence, Venerate, Revere, idolize, deify, pay homage to. Adore and worship, when not applied exclusively to God or gods, are manifestly hyperbolical: as, he worshiped the ground she trod on. The others seem literal when applied to men, places, or things. Adore and worship are applied primarily to acts and words of homage; the others are not. None of them primarily includes the idea of intercessory prayer. Adore is the noblest of the words. To worship is to pay homage by outward forms or in customary places: "A man of Ethiopia . . . had come to Jerusalem for to worship." Acts viii. 27. In the Bible worship is used to express also extreme manifestations of respect paid to men: "As Peter was coming in, Cornelius met him, and fell down at his feet, and worshipped him." Acts x. 25. Reverence is upon a plane a little different from that of venerate, there being sometimes more fear suggested by the former and more sacredness by the latter. We should reverence position, ability, and character; we should venerate old age. Revere differs from reverence chiefly in suggesting rather less solemnity or awe.

It [worship] is also an act of the will, whereby the soul adores and reverences his majesty. . . . We must worship God understandingly; it is not else a reasonable service.
Charnock, Attributes.

Fall down and dy before her;
So dying live, and living do adore her.
Spenser, Sonnets, xiv.

I love Quaker ways and Quaker worship, I venerate the Quaker principles. Lamb, Elia.

A foolish world is prone to laugh in public at what in private it reveres as one of the highest impulses of our nature; namely, love. Longfellow, Hyperion, iii. 8.

II. intrans. To perform an act of worship; be filled with adoration, reverence, or reverential admiration.

If the stars should appear one night in a thousand years, how would men believe and adore! Emerson, Nature.

Litanies, chanted day and night by adoring hearts.
De Quincey, Secret Societies, i.

adore[2]† (a-dōr′), v. t. [A poet. perversion of adorn; perhaps only in the two passages quoted.] To gild; adorn.

Like to the hore
Congealed litle drops which doe the morne adore.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. xi. 46.

Armlets for great queens to adore.
Fletcher and Massinger, Elder Brother, iv. 3. (N. E. D.)

adorement† (a-dōr′ment), n. Adoration; worship.

Adorement of cats, lizards, and beetles.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 3.

adorer (a-dōr′ėr), n. [< adore[1] + -er[1].] One who adores. (a) One who worships or honors as divine. (b) One who esteems or respects highly; a lover; an admirer.

I profess myself her adorer, not her friend.
Shak., Cymbeline, i. 5.

adoring (a-dōr′ing), n. [Verbal n. of adore[1].] An act of adoration, or one of homage paid by a lover.

And soft adorings from their loves receive.
Keats, Eve of St. Agnes, vi.

adoringly (a-dōr′ing-li), adv. With adoration.

adorn (a-dôrn′), v. t. [< ME. adornen, adournen, < OF. adorner, adourner (earlier ME. aournen, aornen, < OF. aourner, aürner, aörner), mod. F. adorner = Sp. Pg. adornar = It. adornare, < L. adornare, < ad, to, + ornare, deck, beautify: see ornate.] 1. To beautify or decorate; increase or lend beauty or attractiveness to, as by dress or ornaments; hence, in general, to render pleasing, or more pleasing or attractive; embellish.

A bride adorneth herself with her jewels. Isa. lxi. 10.

Virtue adorn'd his mind, triumph his brow.
Ford, Fame's Memorial.

He left the name at which the world grew pale,
To point a moral, or adorn a tale.
Johnson, Van. of Hum. Wishes, l. 222.

2. To display the beauty or excellence of: as, to "adorn the doctrine of God," Tit. ii. 10.

=Syn. Adorn, Ornament, Decorate, Embellish, Beautify, Deck, Array, grace, garnish, bedeck, set off. (See decorate.) The italicized words, except deck and array, are expressive of the attempt to add or increase beauty. Adorn has the most nobleness and spirituality; it is the least external. Garments that adorn a woman seem a part of her personality and bring out her comeliness; many virtues adorn his character; the hall was adorned with the portraits of their ancestors. In these examples, no other word in the list is high enough or near enough to take the place of adorn. Ornament and decorate express the addition of something external, which still preserves its separate character and may perhaps be easily removed. Ornament, as kindred to adorn, is nearer to its meaning; decorate expresses that which is more showy: ornamented with pictures; the bare walls were decorated for the occasion with flags and wreaths. Both express the adding of beauty to that which was deficient in it before. Embellish implies previous beauty, to which luster or brilliancy is added by something which perhaps becomes a part of the original: as, a book embellished with plates; a style embellished with figures of speech. The word is sometimes used of over-ornamentation. Beautify is the most direct in its expression of the general idea. Of the first five words, decorate is the least often used figuratively; decorated speech is speech in which the ornaments have no vital connection or harmony with the thought, so that they seem merely ornamental. Deck is to cover, and hence to cover in a way to please the eye: as, decked with flowers. Array is used especially of covering with splendid dress, the meaning being extended from persons to animals, etc.: the fields were arrayed in green.

But that which fairest is, but few behold,
Her mind adornd with vertues manifold.
Spenser, Sonnets, xv.

A whimsical fashion now prevailed among the ladies, of strangely ornamenting their faces with abundance of black patches cut into grotesque forms.
I. D'Israeli, Curios. of Lit., I. 311.

Ivy climbs the crumbling hall
To decorate decay. Bailey, Festus.

We are to dignify to each other the daily needs and offices of man's life, and embellish it by courage, wisdom, and unity. Emerson, Friendship.

Nature has laid out all her art in beautifying the face.
Addison, Spectator, No. 98.

And, with new life from sun and kindly showers,
With beauty deck the meadow and the hill.
Jones Very, Poems, p. 90.

Even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these [lilies]. Mat. vi. 29.

adorn† (a-dôrn′), n. [=It. Sp. adorno, ornament; from the verb.] Ornament.

Tho' passing strange indeed the tale.
Percy's Reliques, I. iii. 14.

Adoxa (a-dok′sä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄδοξος, without glory, < ἀ- priv. + δόξα, glory: see doxology.] A genus of plants, the type of the family Adoxaceæ. The only species, A. Moschatellina (hollowroot), is a little inconspicuous plant, 4 or 5 inches high, found in woods and moist shady places in the cooler regions of the northern hemisphere. The pale-green flowers have a musky smell, whence its common name of moschatel.

adoze (ą-dōz′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3], prep., + doze.] In a doze or dozing state.

adpao (ad′pou), n. [E. Ind., < ad, ād (cerebral d) = Hind. ar, ār, a prefix implying deviation or inferiority, + Hind., etc., pauwā, pāo, a quarter.] An East Indian weight, the quarter of a seer or ser, a weight which varies widely in different localities. Thus in Malabar a seer is 3.3 pounds avoirdupois. See seer[4].

ad patres (ad pā′trēz). [L.: ad, to; patres, acc. pl. of pater = E. father.] Literally, to the fathers; gathered to one's fathers, that is, dead.

adpress (ad-pres′), v. t. [< L. adpressus, pp. of adprimere, < ad, to, + premere, press.] To lay flat; press closely (to or together).

Birds when frightened, as a general rule, closely adpress all their feathers. Darwin, Express. of Emot., p. 100.

A most artfully coloured spider lying on its back, with its feet crossed over and closely adpressed to its body.
H. O. Forbes, Eastern Archipelago, p. 64.

adpressed (ad-prest′), p. a. In bot., growing parallel to and in contact with the stem, without adhering to it, as leaves or branches. Also written appressed.

adpromissor (ad-prō-mis′ȯr), n. [L., < adpromittere, promise in addition to, < ad, to, + promittere, promise: see promise.] In Rom. law, a surety for another; security; bail.

adras (a-dras′), n. A stuff, half silk and half cotton, woven in central Asia, having a gloss, and usually striped. The gloss is heightened by beating with a broad, flat wooden instrument. E. Schuyler, Turkistan, I. 5.

adread[1]† (ą-dred′), v. [< ME. adreden (pret. adredde, adradde, adred, adrad, pp. adred, adrad, adredde, adradde), < AS. ādrǣdan, reduced form of anddrǣdan, andrǣdan, ondrǣdan (= OS. andrādan, antdrādan, andrādan* = OHG. intrātan), tr. and intr., dread, fear, refl. fear, be afraid, < and-, an-, on- (E. a-[5]) + drǣdan* (only in comp.), dread. Mixed in ME. and later with adread[2], q. v.] I. trans. To dread; fear greatly.

The pes is sauf, the werre is ever adrad.
Pol. Poems and Songs, II. 6. (N. E. D.)

II. intrans. or refl. To fear; be afraid.

Ganhardin seighe that sight,
And sore him gan adrede.
Sir Tristrem, l. 288. (N. E. D.)

adread[2]† (ą-dred′), v. t. [< ME. adreden, ofdreden, < AS. ofdrǣdan, make afraid, terrify, < of- (E. a-[4]) + drǣdan*, dread. Hence p. a. adread[2], q. v. Mixed in ME. and later with adread[1], q. v.] To make afraid; terrify.

With these they adrad, and gasten, sencelesse old women. Harsnet, Pop. Impost., p. 135. (N. E. D.) adread[2]† (ą-dred′), p. a. [< ME. adred, adrad, adredde, adradde, earlier ofdred, ofdrad, pp. of adreden, ofdreden, E. adread[2], v., make afraid: see adread[2], v.] Affected by dread.

Thinking to make all men adread.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia (1622), p. 126.

adreamed, adreamt (ą-drēmd′, ą-dremt′), p. a. [< a- + dream + -ed[2]. The formation is unusual, and the prefix is uncertain, prob. a-[2], the suffix -ed[2] being used, as sometimes in other instances, for the suffix -ing[1]. To be adreamed would thus be equiv. to to be a-dreaming.] In the state of dreaming.—To be adreamed or adreamt (the only form of its use). (a†) To dream.

Hee is adreamd of a dry summer.
Withals, Dict. (1556). (N. E. D.)

I was a-dream'd I overheard a ghost.

(b) To doze; be between sleeping and waking. [Prov. Eng.] Halliwell.

adrectal (ad-rek′tal), a. [< ad- + rectum.] Situated at or by the rectum: specifically applied to the purpuriparous gland or purple-gland of mollusks.

The presence of glandular plication of the surface of the mantle-flap and an adrectal gland (purple-gland) are frequently observed. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 648.

ad referendum (ad ref-e-ren′dum). [L.: ad, to; referendum, gerund of referre: see refer.] To be referred; to be held over for further consideration.

ad rem (ad rem). [L.: ad, to; rem, acc. of res, thing, matter, case, point, fact: see res.] To the point or purpose; pertinently to the matter in hand; to the question under consideration; practically, considering the peculiarities of the special case.

Your statements of practical difficulty are indeed much more ad rem than my mere assertions of principle.
Ruskin, Daily Telegraph, Sept. 7, 1865.

★adrenal (ad-rē′nal), n. [< L. ad, to, + ren, only in pl. renes, kidney: see renal.] In anat., a suprarenal capsule; one of a pair of small glandular or follicular but ductless bodies, of unknown function, capping the kidneys in mammals and most other vertebrates. Also called atrabiliary capsule. In man the adrenals are an inch or two long, less in width, and about a fourth of an inch thick, and consist essentially of an outer yellowish cortical portion, an inner medullary portion (of very dark color, whence the term atrabiliary), with vessels, nerves, etc. See Addison's disease, under disease. See cut under kidney.

Adrian (ā′dri-an), a. [< L. Adrianus, prop. Hadrianus, Adriatic.] Same as Adriatic.

Adrianite (ā′dri-an-īt), n. [< ML. Adrianitæ, < L. Adrianus, prop. Hadrianus.] 1. A member of a supposed Gnostic school of heretics mentioned by Theodoret.—2. One of a sect of Anabaptists in the sixteenth century, followers of Adrian Hamstedius, who held, among other things, that Jesus Christ was formed solely from the substance of his mother. Also Adrianist.

Adrianople red. See red.

Adriatic (ā-dri-at′ik), a. [< L. Adriaticus, prop. ★Hadriaticus, < Hadria (now Adria), a town between the mouths of the Po and the Adige, after which the sea was named.] Appellative of the sea east of the peninsula of Italy (the Adriatic sea); pertaining to that sea: as, the Adriatic coast.

adrift (a-drift′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3] + drift.] 1. Floating at random; not fastened by any kind of moorings; at the mercy of winds and currents.

Trees adrift
Down the great river. Milton, P. L., xi. 832.

So on the sea she shall be set adrift,
And who relieves her dies.
Dryden, Marriage à la Mode, iii.

Hence—2. Figuratively, swayed by any chance impulse; all abroad; at a loss.

Frequent reflection will keep their minds from running adrift. Locke, Education.

To turn adrift, to unmoor; set drifting; hence, figuratively, to turn away, dismiss, or discharge, as from home, employment, etc.; throw upon the world.

Great multitudes who had been employed in the woollen manufactories, or in the mines, were turned adrift.
Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., i.

adrip (ą-drip′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3] + drip.] In a dripping state. D. G. Mitchell.

adrogate (ad′rō-gāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. adrogated, ppr. adrogating. [< L. adrogatus, pp. of adrogare, later arrogare, take a homo sui juris (a person not under the power of his father) in the place of a child, adopt, < ad, to, + rogare, ask. The same word in other senses gave rise to arrogate, q. v. See adrogation.] To adopt by adrogation.

Clodius, the enemy of Cicero, was adrogated into a plebeian family. Smith, Dict. Antiq., p. 15.

adrogation (ad-rō-gā′shon), n. [< L. adrogatio(n-), later arrogatio(n-), < adrogare: see adrogate.] A kind of adoption in ancient Rome, by which a person legally capable of choosing for himself was admitted into the relation of son to another by a vote of the people in the Comitia Curiata, or in later times by a rescript of the emperor: so called from the questions put to the parties. Also written arrogation.

adrogator (ad′rō-gā-tȯr), n. [L., < adrogare: see adrogate and arrogate.] One who adrogates.

adroit (ą-droit′), a. [< F. adroit, dexterous, < à droit, right, rightly: à, to, toward; droit, right, < ML. directum, prop. directum, right, justice, neut. of directus, right: see direct. Cf. maladroit.] Dexterous; skilful; expert in the use of the hand, and hence of the mind; ingenious; ready in invention or execution; possessing readiness of resource.

You may break every command of the decalogue with perfect good-breeding: nay, if you are adroit, without losing caste. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 68.

=Syn. Cunning, Artful, Sly, etc. See cunning[1]. Adroit, Dexterous, Expert, Skilful, Clever, smart, handy, apt, quick, subtle. The first four words express primarily various degrees in the combination of manual facility with knowledge. Adroit and dexterous make prominent the idea of a trained hand: as, an adroit pickpocket; a dexterous conjurer, swordsman. Adroitness implies quickness or suddenness; dexterity may require sustained agility. Adroit tends toward sinister figurative meanings: as, an adroit rogue; but mental adroitness may be simply address or tact. Expert emphasizes experience, practice, and hence is commonly a lower word than skilful, which makes knowledge the principal thing: a skilful mechanic makes more use of his mind than an expert mechanic. Clever implies notable quickness, readiness, resource in practical affairs, and sometimes the lack of the larger powers of mind: a clever mechanic has fertility in planning and skill in executing what is planned. A clever statesman may or may not be an able one; a man may be clever in evil.

Why, says Plato, if he be manually so adroit, likely he will turn pickpocket. S. Lanier, The Eng. Novel, p. 117.

The dexterous management of terms, and being able to fend and prove with them, passes for a great part of learning. Locke.

His only books were an almanac and an arithmetic, in which last he was considerably expert.
Thoreau, Walden, p. 161.

Thus, like a skilful chess-player, by little and little he draws out his men, and makes his pawns of use to his greater persons. Dryden, Dram. Poesy.

But the names of the clever men who invented canoes and bows and arrows are as utterly unknown to tradition as the names of the earliest myth-makers.
J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 204.

adroitly (ą-droit′li), adv. In an adroit manner; with dexterity; readily; skilfully.

He [Eadmund] turned his new conquest adroitly to account by using it to bind to himself the most dangerous among his foes. J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 266.

adroitness (ą-droit′nes), n. The quality of being adroit; dexterity; readiness in the use of the hands or of the mental faculties.

Sir John Blaquire had some debating power and great skill and adroitness in managing men.
Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xvi.

adroop (ą-dröp′), prep. phr. as adv. [< a[3] + droop.] In a drooping position. J. D. Long, Æneid, xi. 1128.

adrostral (ad-ros′tral), a. [< L. ad, to, at, + rostrum, beak.] In zoöl., pertaining to or situated at the beak or snout.

adry (ạ-drī′), a. [< a-4 + dry; prob. in imitation of athirst, q. v.] In a dry condition; thirsty.

Doth a man that is adry desire to drink in gold?
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 355.

adscite (ad′sīt), a. [< L. adscitus, derived: see below.] In entom., pertaining to the Braconidæ, or Ichneumones adsciti.

Adsciti (ad′si-tī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. adscitus, derived, assumed, foreign: see adscititious.] A group of ichneumon-flies which have only one recurrent nervure in the fore wing instead of two. It corresponds to the modern family Braconidæ (which see).

adscititious (ad-si-tish′us), a. [< L. as if adscititius,* < adscitus, derived, assumed, foreign, pp. of adsciscere, later asciscere, take knowingly to one's self, appropriate, assume, adopt, < ad, to, + sciscere, seek to know, < scire, know: see science.] Added or derived from without; not intrinsic or essential; supplemental; additional. Also written ascititious.

The fourth epistle on happiness may be thought adscititious, and out of its proper place.
J. Warton, Essay on Pope.

The first s of the tense-sign sis is an adscititious sibilant added to the root. Am. Jour. of Philol., VI. 280.

adscititiously (ad-si-tish′us-li), adv. In an adscititious manner.

adscript (ad′skript), a. and n. [< L. adscriptus, pp. of adscribere, later ascribere, enroll, < ad, to, + scribere, write: see ascribe.] I. a. 1. Written after, as distinguished from subscript, or written under: as, in Greek grammar, an iota (ι) adscript.—2. Attached to the soil, as a slave or feudal serf. See adscriptus glebæ.

II. n. A serf attached to an estate and transferable with it.

adscripted (ad-skrip′ted), a. Same as adscript.

adscription (ad-skrip′shon), n. [< L. adscriptio(n-), later ascriptio(n-), > E. ascription, q. v.] 1. Same as ascription.—2. Attachment to the soil, or as a feudal inferior to a superior or overlord.

adscriptitious (ad-skrip-tish′us), a. [< L. adscripticius, ascripticius, enrolled, bound, < adscriptus, ascriptus: see adscript.] Bound by adscription. N. E. D.

adscriptive (ad-skrip′tiv), a. [< L. adscriptivus, enrolled, adscript, < adscriptus: see adscript.] Held to service as attached to an estate, and transferable with it, as a serf or slave.

Many estates peopled with crown peasants have been ceded to particular individuals on condition of establishing manufactories; these peasants, called adscriptive, working at the manufactories on fixed terms. Brougham.

adscriptus glebæ (ad-skrip′tus glē′bē); pl. adscripti glebæ (-ti). [L.: adscriptus, adscript; glebæ, gen. of gleba, glebe.] Belonging or attached to the soil, as a serf. In Roman law this term was applied to a class of slaves attached in perpetuity to and transferred with the land they cultivated. The same custom prevailed among all Germanic and Slavic peoples, and has been but gradually abolished during the past three hundred years, down to the emancipation of the Russian serfs in 1861.

adsignification (ad-sig″ni-fi-kā′shon), n. [< ML. adsignificatio(n-), < L. adsignificare, make evident: see adsignify.] The act of adsignifying; a modification of meaning by a prefix or suffix; an additional signification. [Rare.]

And in this opinion (viz., that there is no adsignification of manner or time in that which is called the indicative mood, no adsignification of time in that which is called the present participle) I am neither new nor singular.
Horne Tooke, Purley.

Adulation pushed to the verge, sometimes of nonsense, and sometimes of impiety, was not thought to disgrace a poet. Macaulay.

And there he set himself to play upon her
With . . . amorous adulation, till the maid Rebell'd against it.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

=Syn. Adulation, Flattery, Compliment. These are varieties of praise. Adulation is servile and fulsome, proceeding either from a blind worship or from the hope of advantage. It may not be, but generally is, addressed directly to its object. Flattery is addressed to the person flattered; its object is to gratify vanity, with or without a selfish ulterior object. It is generally praise beyond justice. Compliment is milder, and may be expressive of the truth; it may be sincere and designed to encourage or to express respect and esteem. We may speak of a compliment, but not of an adulation or a flattery. Adulation of the conqueror; gross or delicate flattery of those in power; the language of compliment. In conduct, the correspondent to adulation is obsequiousness.

Adulation ever follows the ambitious; for such alone receive most pleasure from flattery.
Goldsmith, Vicar, iii.

Flattery corrupts both the receiver and the giver; and adulation is not of more service to the people than to kings. Burke, Rev. in France.

Who flatters is of all mankind the lowest,
Save he who courts the flattery.
Hannah More, Daniel.

The salutations of Arabs are such that . . . "compliments in a well-bred man never last less than ten minutes." H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 343.

adulatory (ad′ū-lā-tō-ri), a. [< L. adulatorius, < adulator: see adulator.] Characterized by adulation; fulsomely flattering; servilely praising: as, an adulatory address.

You are not lavish of your words, especially in that species of eloquence called the adulatory. Chesterfield.

adulatress (ad′ū-lā-tres), n. [= F. adulatrice, < L. adulatricem, acc. of adulatrix, fem. form of adulator: see adulator.] A female adulator.

Indiana, when the first novelty of tête-à-têtes was over, wished again for the constant adulatress of her charms and endowments. Miss Burney, Camilla, x. 14.

Adullamite (ạ-dul′am-īt), n. [< Adullam + *-ite*2.] 1. An inhabitant of the village of Adullam. Gen. xxxviii. 12.—2. In Eng. hist., one of a group of Liberals who seceded from the Whig party and voted with the Conservatives when Earl Russell and Mr. Gladstone introduced a measure for the extension of the elective franchise in 1866. They received the name from their being likened by Mr. Bright to the discontented persons who took refuge with David in the cave of Adullam (1 Sam. xxii. 1, 2). The party was also known collectively as the Cave.

The Conservative party then presented a tolerably solid front against the extension of the suffrage, and received besides a large reinforcement of Adullamites from the Liberal side. New York Times, July 19, 1884.

adult (ạ-dult′), a. and n. [< L. adultus, grown up, pp. of adolescere, grow up: see adolescent.] I. a. 1. Having arrived at mature years, or attained full size and strength: as, an adult person, animal, or plant.

The elaborate reasonings of the adult man.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol.

2. Pertaining or relating to adults; suitable for an adult: as, adult age; an adult school.

II. n. A person or (sometimes) an animal grown to full size and strength; one who has reached the age of manhood or womanhood.

Embryos and adults of common and curious forms are constantly met with, thus furnishing material both for general work and original investigation. Science, V. 212.

adulted† (ạ-dul′ted), a. Completely grown.

Now that we are not only adulted but ancient Christians, I believe the most acceptable sacrifice we can send up to heaven is prayer and praise.
Howell, Letters, I. vi. 32.

adulter† (ạ-dul′tėr), n. [L., an adulterer, a counterfeiter, adulter, adj., adulterous; formation uncertain, perhaps < ad, to, + alter, other, different. In mod. E. adulter, adulterer, etc., have been substituted for the older avouter, advouter, etc.: see advouter, etc.] An adulterer.

It must be, however, understood that strong moral repugnance to the fictitious affiliation of these illegitimate and adulterine children begins to show itself among the oldest of the Hindu law-writers whose treatises have survived. Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 99.

2. Relating or pertaining to adultery; involving or implying adultery: as, adulterine fiction; adulterine marriage (used by St. Augustine of a second marriage after divorce).—3. Characterized by adulteration; spurious; base: as, adulterine drugs or metals. [A Latinism, now rare.]—4†. Illegitimate; illicit; unauthorized: as, adulterine castles (castles built by the Norman barons in England, after the conquest, without royal warrant).

The adulterine guilds, from which heavy sums were exacted in 1180, were stigmatised as adulterine because they had not purchased the right of association, as the older legal guilds had done, and had set themselves up against the government of the city which the king had recognised by his charter. Stubbs, Const. Hist., III. 584.

II. n. In civil law, a child begotten in adultery.

adulterize (ạ-dul'tėr-īz), v. i. [< adulter + -ize.] To be guilty of adultery. Milton. Also spelled adulterise. [Rare.]

adulterously (ạ-dul'tėr-us-li), adv. In an adulterous manner.

adultery (ạ-dul'tėr-i), n.; pl. adulteries (-iz). [< L. adulterium, < adulter; substituted for the older form advoutry, q. v.] 1. Violation of the marriage-bed; carnal connection of a married person with any other than the lawful spouse; in a more restricted sense, the wrong by a wife which introduces or may introduce a spurious offspring into a family. It is sometimes called single adultery when only one of the parties is married, and double adultery when both are married. In some jurisdictions the law makes adultery a crime, in some only a civil injury. In England, formerly, it was punished by fine and imprisonment, and in Scotland it was frequently made a capital offense. In Great Britain at the present day, however, it is punishable only by ecclesiastical censure; but when committed by the wife, it is regarded as a civil injury, and forms the ground of an action of damages against the paramour. Contrary to the previous general opinion, it has recently been held in the United States that the wife may have a corresponding action against a woman who seduces away her husband. In England and Scotland the husband's recovery of damages against the paramour can now be had only by joining him with the wife in an action for divorce. See divorce.

2. In the seventh commandment of the decalogue, as generally understood, all manner of lewdness or unchastity in act or thought. See Mat. v. 28.—3. Eccles., intrusion into a bishopric during the life of the bishop.—4. In old arboriculture, the grafting of trees: so called from its being considered an unnatural union.—5†. Adulteration; corruption: as, "all the adulteries of art," B. Jonson, Epicœne, i. 1.—6†. Injury; degradation; ruin.

You might wrest the caduceus out of my hand to the adultery and spoil of nature.
B. Jonson, Mercurie Vindicated.

8. To raise; lift up; elevate.

They . . .
Advanc'd their eyelids. Shak., Tempest, iv. 1.

O, peace! Contemplation makes a rare turkey-cock of him! how he jets under his advanced plumes!
Shak., T. N., ii. 5.

A cherub tall;
Who forthwith from the glittering staff unfurl'd
The imperial ensign, which, full high advanced, Shone like a meteor. Milton, P. L., i. 536.

9. To put forth or exhibit with a view to display. [Rare.]

And every one his love-feat will advance Unto his several mistress. Shak., L. L. L., v. 2.

10†. To commend; extol; vaunt.

Greatly advauncing his gay chivalree.
Spenser, F. Q., I. v. 16.

11†. To impel; incite.

That lewd rybauld with vyle lust advaunst.
Spenser, F. Q., II. i. 10.

=Syn. 4. To elevate, exalt, prefer, aggrandize, dignify. —5. To increase, augment.—6. Adduce, Allege, Assign (see adduce); propound, bring forward, lay down.

II. intrans. 1. To move or go forward; proceed: as, the troops advanced.

But time advancing: facts accumulate; doubts arise. Faint glimpses of truth begin to appear, and shine more and more unto the perfect day.
Macaulay, Sir James Mackintosh.

They watched the reapers' slow advancing line.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 375.

2. To improve or make progress; grow, etc.: as, to advance in knowledge, stature, wisdom, rank, office, dignity, or age.

A great advancing soul carries forward his whole age; a mean, sordid soul draws it back.
J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 34.

3. To increase in quantity, price, etc.: as, the stock advanced three points.

★advance (ad-vȧns'), n. [=F. avance; from the verb.] 1. A moving forward or toward the front; a forward course; progress in space: as, our advance was impeded by obstructions.

Don Alonzo de Aguila and his companions, in their eager advance, had . . . got entangled in deep glens and the dry beds of torrents. Irving, Granada, p. 90.

2. Milit., the order or signal to advance: as, the advance was sounded.—3. A step forward; actual progress in any course of action: often in the plural: as, an advance in religion or knowledge; civilization has made great advances in this century.

Witness the advance from a rustic's conception of the Earth to that which a travelled geologist has reached.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 481.

4. An act of approach; an effort for approximation or agreement; anything done to bring about accord or any relation with another or others: with to before the person and toward before the object or purpose. as, A made an advance or advances to B, or toward acquaintance with B.

Frederic had some time before made advances toward a reconciliation with Voltaire.
Macaulay, Frederic the Great.

5. A forward position; place in front, at the head, or in the lead: as, his regiment took the advance in the march.—6. The state of being forward or in front; a being or going at the head or in the lead: chiefly in the phrase in advance: as, the groom rode in advance of the carriage; he is far in advance of the other pupils. In this sense the word is often used in composition, sometimes without joining, giving it the appearance of an adjective, as it has been called in such use, although it is never really one. Thus, an advance (-) agent is an agent sent out in advance of a theatrical company, exhibition, etc., to make preliminary arrangements; an advance (-) ditch or foss is a ditch around the esplanade or glacis of a fortified place, and hence in advance of it; advance (-) sheets are sheets of a printed work sent to somebody in advance of publication.

7. He who or that which is at the head or in the lead; the foremost or forward part; especially, the leading body of an army.

I got back on the 5th with the advance, the remainder following as rapidly as the steamers could carry them.
U. S. Grant, Pers. Mem., I. 290.

8. In schools, a lesson not previously learned: opposed to review.—9. Advancement; promotion; preferment: as, an advance in rank or office.—10. An offer or tender.

The advance of kindness which I made was feigned.
Dryden, All for Love, iv.

11. In com.: (a) Addition to price; rise in price: as, an advance on the prime cost of goods; there is an advance on cottons. (b) A giving beforehand; a furnishing of something before an equivalent is received, as money or goods, toward a capital or stock, or on loan, or in expectation of being reimbursed in some way: as, A made large advances to B.

I shall, with great pleasure, make the necessary advances. Jay.

The account was made up with intent to show what advances had been made. Kent.

(c) The money or goods thus furnished.—12. In naval tactics, the distance made by a ship under way, in the direction of her course, after the helm has been put to one side and kept there: opposed to transfer, the distance made at right angles to the original course of the vessel before the helm was put over.—In advance. (a) Before; in front: as, the cavalry marched in advance, or in advance of the artillery. See above, 6. (b) Beforehand; before an equivalent is received: as, to pay rent in advance.

A B C, ship's track.
B, point where helm is put over.
D C, advance } of curve
B D, transfer } B C.

They . . . paid you in advance the dearest tribute of their affection.

The special advantage of manhood over youth lies . . . in the sense of reality and limitation.
J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 145.

3. Benefit; gain; profit.

What advantage will it be unto thee? Job xxxv. 3.

Yet hath Sir Proteus, for that's his name,
Made use and fair advantage of his days.
Shak., T. G. of V., ii. 4.

4†. Usury; interest; increase.

Methought you said, you neither lend nor borrow Upon advantage. Shak., M. of V., i. 3.

And with advantage means to pay thy love.
Shak., K. John, iii. 3.

5†. A thirteenth article added to a dozen, making what is commonly known as a baker's dozen.

If the Scripture be for reformation, and Antiquity to boot, it is but an advantage to the dozen.
Milton, Ref. in Eng., i.

6. In lawn-tennis, the first point gained after deuce. Commonly called vantage. See lawn-tennis.—To advantage, with good effect; advantageously.—To have the advantage of, to have superiority over; be in a more favorable position than; in particular, to know without being known; have a personal knowledge that is not reciprocal: as, you have the advantage of me.—To play upon advantage†, to cheat.—To take advantage of. (a) To avail one's self of; profit by in a legitimate way. (b) To overreach or impose upon. (c) To utilize as a means toward overreaching or imposition.

The restrictions both on masters and servants were so severe as to prevent either from taking advantage of the necessities of the other. Froude, Sketches, p. 146.

=Syn. 1 and 3. Advantage, Benefit, Utility, Profit, help, vantage-ground, good, service. Advantage is the possession of a good vantage-ground for the attainment of ulterior objects of desire: as, he has the advantage of a good education. Benefit is a more immediate and realized good: as, a chief benefit of exercise is the improvement of health. Utility is usefulness in the practical or material sense: the utility of an education is a small part of the benefit derived from it. Profit signifies gain, with a suggestion of trade or exchange. A man may have good advantages, but derive from them little benefit or profit; even their utility to him may be small.

And deny his youth
The rich advantage of good exercise.
Shak., K. John, iv. 2.

The importance of the American revolution, and the means of making it a benefit to the world.
Washington, Letter to Dr. Price.

advene (ad-vēn'), v. i. [< L. advenire, come to, arrive at, < ad, to, + venire, come, = E. come, q. v. Cf. convene, intervene, supervene.] To accede or come; be added or become a part, though not essential. [Rare.]

Where no act of the will advenes as a co-efficient. Coleridge, Remains (1836), III. 19.

advenient† (ad-vē'nient), a. [< L. advenien(t-)s, ppr. of advenire: see advene.] Advening; coming from without; superadded.

Divided from truth in themselves, they are yet farther removed by advenient deception. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 3.

★advent (ad'vent), n. [< ME. advent, < L. adventus, a coming to, approach, < advenire: see advene.] 1. A coming into place, view, or being; visitation; arrival; accession: as, the advent of visitors, of an infant, or of death. [A modern use of the word, the ecclesiastical use having been the original one in English.]

With the advent of the empire all this was destined to undergo a complete change. Merivale, Roman Empire, xxxv.

With the advent to power of a liberal-minded Sovereign . . . it might have been expected that there would be an immediate change in the Government of Piedmont. E. Dicey, Victor Emmanuel, p. 54.

Specifically—2. The coming of Christ as the Saviour of the world. Hence—3. [cap.] Eccles., the period immediately preceding the festival of the Nativity. It includes four Sundays, reckoning from the Sunday nearest St. Andrew's day (Nov. 30) to Christmas eve, and has been observed since the sixth century as a season of devotion with reference to the coming of Christ in the flesh and to his second coming to judge the world; in the Roman Catholic Church observed also as a time of penance and fasting. In the Oriental and Greek Churches the period includes six Sundays, or forty days.—Second advent, the second coming of Christ to establish a personal reign upon the earth, as its king. See millenarianism and premillennialism.

Adventist (ad'ven-tist), n. [< advent + -ist.] One who believes in the second coming of Christ to establish a personal reign upon the earth; a millenarian; a Second-adventist. The Adventists of the United States owe their origin to the millenarian teachings of William Miller (see Millerite), most of them believing at first in various dates fixed for the second coming of Christ from 1843 to 1861, but afterward abandoning the attempt to determine the date. There are seven Adventist bodies, of which the largest body is the Seventh-day Adventists, numbering over 100,000. They observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, and, while believing in the personal, literal coming of Christ, have not attempted to set a time for that event. The second largest body of Adventists is the Advent Christian Church, numbering about 27,000 members. The body known as Churches of God in Christ Jesus have a membership of over 2,000; other bodies have only a few hundred adherents. There is no affiliation between the various bodies of Adventists.

adventitia (ad-ven-tish'i-ä), n. [NL., fem. sing. (sc. membrana, or tunica) of L. adventitius: see adventitious.] In anat., any membranous structure covering an organ but not properly belonging to it (in full, membrana adventitia, adventitious membrane); specifically, the outermost of the three coats of a blood-vessel (in full, tunica adventitia, adventitious tunic), consisting of connective tissue.

★adventitious (ad-ven-tish'us), a. [< L. adventitius, prop. adventicius, coming from abroad, < adventus, pp. of advenire: see advene.] 1. Added extrinsically; not springing from the essence of the subject, but from another source; foreign; accidentally or casually acquired: applied to that which does not properly belong to a subject, but which is superadded or adopted, as in a picture or other work of art, to give it additional power or effect.

Every subject acquires an adventitious importance to him who considers it with application. Goldsmith, Polite Learning, xiv.

But apart from any adventitious associations of later growth, it is certain that a very ancient belief gave to magic the power of imparting life, or the semblance of it, to inanimate things. Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 117.

2. In bot. and zoöl., appearing casually, or in an abnormal or unusual position or place; occurring as a straggler or away from its natural position or habitation; adventive.

The inflorescence [of Cuscuta glomerata] is developed from numerous crowded adventitious buds, and not by the repeated branching of axillary, flowering branches, as commonly stated. Science, IV. 342.

3. In anat., of the nature of adventitia: as, the adventitious coat of an artery.

adventitiously (ad-ven-tish'us-li), adv. In an adventitious or extrinsic manner; accidentally.

adventitiousness (ad-ven-tish'us-nes), n. The state or quality of being adventitious.

adventive (ad-ven'tiv), a. and n. [< L. adventus, pp. of advenire (see advene), + -ive.] I. a. 1†. Accidental; adventitious.

The relative and adventive characters of offences. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

Specifically—2. In bot. and zoöl., only transient and locally spontaneous, not thoroughly naturalized: applied to introduced plants and animals.

II.† n. One who or that which comes from without; an immigrant.

That the natives be not so many, but that there may be elbow-room enough for them, and for the adventives also. Bacon, Advice to Villiers.

adventry† (ad-ven'tri), n. [< adventure, as if adventry*.] An enterprise; an adventure. [Rare.]

Act a brave work, call it thy last adventry. B. Jonson, Epigrams.

Adventual (ad-ven'tū-al), a. [< L. as if adventualis*, < adventus (adventu-), approach: see advent.] Relating to the season of Advent. Bp. Sanderson.

adventure (ad-ven'tūr), n. [Early mod. E. often also adventer, < ME. aventure, auenture, often contr. auntour, aunter, anter, etc., < OF. (and F.) aventure = Pr. Sp. Pg. aventura = It. avventura = Fries. aventure = MHG. aventiure, G. abenteuer = Dan. æventyr, eventyr = Sw. äfventyr, < ML. aventura, also adventura, lit. a thing about to happen, < L. advenire, fut. part. act. adventurus, come to, happen: see advene. The ME. prefix a- (*a-*11) has been restored to its orig. L. form ad-. Hence peradventure, q. v. Cf. venture.] 1†. That which comes or happens to one; hap; chance; fortune; luck.

Searching of thy wound,
I have by hard adventure found mine own. Shak., As you Like it, ii. 4.

And as my fair adventure fell, I found
A lady all in white, with laurel crown'd. Dryden, Flower and Leaf, l. 463.

2. A hazardous enterprise; an undertaking of uncertain issue, or participation in such an undertaking.

He forged,
But that was later, boyish histories
Of battle, bold adventure, dungeon, wreck. Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

3. A remarkable occurrence in one's personal history; a noteworthy event or experience in one's life.

Come, never mind our uncle's age, let us hear his adventures. Irving, Tales of a Traveler.

4. A speculation of any kind, commercial, financial, or mining; a venture; specifically, a speculation in goods sent abroad.

Lafayette directed the captain to steer for the United States, which, especially as he had a large pecuniary adventure of his own on board, he declined doing. Everett, Orations, I. 467.

5†. Peril; danger.

He was in great adventure of his life. Berners.

6. Adventurous activity; participation in exciting or hazardous undertakings or enterprises: as, a spirit of adventure.—At all adventures†, at all hazards; whatever may be the consequence.

In this mist at all adventures go. Shak., C. of E., ii. 2.

Bill of adventure. See *bill*3.

adventure (ad-ven'tūr), v.; pret. and pp. adventured, ppr. adventuring. [< ME. aventuren, usually contr. to aunteren, auntren (which survives, prob., in saunter, q. v.), < OF. aventurer = Pr. Sp. Pg. aventurar = It. avventurare, < ML. adventurare; from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To risk or hazard; put in the power of unforeseen events: as, to adventure one's life.

My father fought for you, and adventured his life far. Judges ix. 17.

2. To venture on; take the chance of; run the risk of doing or suffering.

So bold Leander would adventure it. Shak., T. G. of V., iii. 1.

Well, my lord, I do adventure, on your word,
The duke's displeasure. Dekker and Webster(?), Sir Thomas Wyat, p. 15.

II. intrans. To take the risk involved in doing anything; proceed at a venture.

Still ye plague continuing in our parish, I could not without danger adventure to our church. Evelyn, Diary, Sept. 7, 1666.

Its government began to adventure on a lenient policy. Bancroft, Hist. U. S., I. 349.

adventureful (ad-ven'tūr-fûl), a. Given to adventure; full of enterprise. [Rare.]

adventurement† (ad-ven'tūr-ment), n. Hazardous enterprise.

Wiser Raymundus, in his closet pent, Laughs at such danger and adventurement. Bp. Hall, Satires, IV. iii. 35.

adventurer (ad-ven'tūr-ėr), n. [Late ME. adventorer, a gamester, suggested by F. aventurier, with same sense, < ML. adventurarius, -erius: see adventure and -er.] 1. One who engages in adventure; an undertaker of uncertain or hazardous actions or enterprises, as in travel, war, trade, speculation, etc.: as, the Young Adventurer, a title given to Prince Charles Edward Stuart on account of his leading the desperate insurrection of 1745. Specifically—(a) One of a class of soldiers in the middle ages who sold their services to the highest bidder, or fought and plundered on their own account. (b) Formerly, a seeker of fortune by foreign trade, travel, or emigration; one who engaged in foreign discovery, colonization, or speculation for the sake of profit, especially in North America.

While these things were thus acting in America, the adventurers in England were providing, though too tediously, to send them recruits. Beverley, Virginia, i. ¶ 7.

The [colonial] governor [of Maryland] was authorized to erect each holding of 1,000 acres and over into a manor, to be called by such name as the adventurer or adventurers shall desire. Johns Hopkins Univ. Stud., III. 319.

(c) In general, one who undertakes any great commercial risk or speculation; a speculator; in mining, a shareholder in or promoter of mines, particularly under the cost-book system. See cost-book.

2. In a bad sense, a seeker of fortune by underhand or equivocal means; a speculator upon the credulity or good nature of others; especially, one who ingratiates himself with society by false show or pretense in order to gain a surreptitious livelihood.—Adventurer tunnel. See tunnel.—Merchant Adventurers, the title of a commercial company first established in Antwerp, and chartered in England by Henry IV. in 1406, and by successive sovereigns down to Charles I. in 1634, who carried on trading and colonizing enterprises in North America and other parts of the world. Several local associations of merchants still exist in England under this name, that of Newcastle reckoning its origin from the seventeenth year of King John (1216).

adventuresome (ad-ven'tūr-sum), a. [< adventure, n., + -some.] Bold; daring; adventurous; incurring hazard. See venturesome.

Adventuresome, I send My herald thought into a wilderness. Keats, Endymion, i.

adventuresomeness (ad-ven'tūr-sum-nes), n. The quality of being bold and venturesome.

adventuress (ad-ven'tūr-es), n. [< adventurer + -ess.] A female adventurer; a woman engaged in or capable of bold enterprises, especially enterprises of equivocal character.

It might be very well for Lady Bareacres . . . and other ladies . . . to cry fie at the idea of the odious adventuress making her curtsey before the sovereign.
Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xlviii.

adventurous (ad-ven'tūr-us), a. [< ME. aventurous, aventurus, aunterous, etc., < OF. aventeros, F. aventureux = Pr. aventuros = It. avventuroso: see adventure, n., and -ous.] 1. Inclined or willing to incur hazard or engage in adventures; bold to encounter danger; daring; venturesome; courageous; enterprising.

In many a doubtful fight,
Was never known a more advent'rous knight.
Dryden, Hind and Panther, I. 2207.

Th' adventurous baron the bright locks admired.
Pope, R. of the L., ii. 29.

2. Full of hazard; attended with risk; exposing to danger; requiring courage; hazardous: as, an adventurous undertaking.

Of instrumental harmony, that breathed Heroic ardour to adventurous deeds.
Milton, P. L., vi. 66.

A Greek temple preserves a kind of fresh immortality in its concentrated refinement, and a Gothic cathedral in its adventurous exuberance.
H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 36.

=Syn. 1. Adventurous, Enterprising, Rash, Reckless, Foolhardy, venturesome, venturous. The adventurous man incurs risks from love of the novel, the arduous, and the bold, trusting to escape through the use of his bodily and mental powers; he would measure himself against difficult things. When this spirit does not go so far as to deserve the name of rashness or foolhardiness, it is considered a manly trait. The enterprising man is alert to undertake new and large things, not necessarily involving risk; he is constantly breaking out of routine. The rash man hastens to do a thing with little thought of the consequences, and generally in the heat of feeling. With the foolhardy man the risks are so great and the absence of thought is so entire that he seems to have the hardihood of the fool. The reckless man has the impetuosity of the rash man, but he is more careless of consequences. The rash man is too precipitate; the reckless man shows temerity; the foolhardy man is careless or defiant even when he undertakes the impossible.

Commerce is unexpectedly confident and serene, alert, adventurous, and unwearied. Thoreau, Walden, p. 130.

There have not been wanting enterprising and far-seeing statesmen who have attempted to control and direct the Spirit of the Age. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 80.

He is rash, and very sudden in choler, and, haply, may strike at you. Shak., Othello, ii. 1.

I am one, my liege,
Whom the vile blows and buffets of the world
Have so incens'd, that I am reckless what I do to spite the world. Shak., Macbeth, iii. 1.

The foolhardy levity of shallow infidelity proceeds from a morbid passion for notoriety, or the malice that finds pleasure in annoyance. Bancroft, Hist. U. S., I. 194.

adventurously (ad-ven'tūr-us-li), adv. In an adventurous manner; boldly; daringly.

They are both hanged; and so would this be, if he durst steal anything adventurously. Shak., Hen. V., iv. 4.

adventurousness (ad-ven'tūr-us-nes), n. The quality of being adventurous; daring.

adverb (ad'vėrb), n. [< F. adverbe, < L. adverbium, an adverb (a tr. of Gr. ἐπίρρημα, an adverb, something additional to the predication), < ad, to, + verbum, a word, verb: see verb.] In gram., one of the indeclinable parts of speech: so called from being ordinarily joined to verbs for the purpose of limiting or extending their signification, but used also to qualify adjectives and other adverbs: as, I readily admit; you speak wisely; very cold; naturally brave; very generally acknowledged; much more clearly. Adverbs may be classified as follows: (1) Adverbs of place and motion, as here, there, up, out, etc. (2) Of time and succession, as now, then, often, ever, etc. (3) Of manner and quality, as so, thus, well, truly, faithfully, etc. (4) Of measure and degree, as much, more, very, enough, etc. (5) Of modality, as surely, not, perhaps, therefore, etc. Often abbreviated adv.

adverbial (ad-vėr'bi-al), a. [< L. adverbialis, < adverbium, adverb: see adverb.] 1. Pertaining to, or having the character or force of, an adverb.—2. Much inclined to use adverbs; given to limiting or qualifying one's statements. [Rare.]

He is also wonderfully adverbial in his expressions, and breaks off with a "Perhaps" and a nod of the head upon matters of the most indifferent nature. Tatler, No. 191.

Adverbial modality (of a proposition), in logic, modality expressed by an adverb: as, offenses necessarily come: opposed to nominal modality, which is expressed by an adjective: as, it is necessary that offenses should come.—Adverbial phrase, or adverb-phrase, a collocation of two or more words in a sentence having conjointly the grammatical force of an adverb. The most distinct adverbial phrases consist of a preposition and a noun or a word used as a noun, with or without adjuncts, as on the whole, in very deed, by the way, by chance, of course. In this dictionary many such phrases in common use are defined under their principal words. Many elliptical phrases without a preposition are in reality adverbial, but are not usually treated as such: as, he goes there every day; this is many times larger than that. Some phrases have been made compound adverbs by coalescence, as indeed, perchance, nevertheless, nowadays. See prepositional phrase, under prepositional.

adverbiality (ad-vėr-bi-al'i-ti), n. [< adverbial + -ity; = F. adverbialité.] The state or quality of being adverbial; adverbial form of expression. N. E. D.

adverbialize (ad-vėr'bi-al-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. adverbialized, ppr. adverbializing. [< adverbial + -ize.] To give the form or force of an adverb to; use as an adverb.

adverbially (ad-vėr'bi-al-i), adv. In the manner or with the force or character of an adverb; as an adverb.

adversaria (ad-vėr-sā'ri-ą), n. pl. [L. (sc. scripta), miscellaneous notes, memoranda, lit. writings lying before one's eyes, < adversarius, turned toward, being in front of, standing opposite: see adversary.] A miscellaneous collection of notes, remarks, or selections; a commonplace-book; memoranda or annotations.

These parchments are supposed to have been St. Paul's adversaria. Bp. Bull, Sermons.

adversarious (ad-vėr-sā'ri-us), a. [< L. adversarius: see adversary.] Adverse; hostile.

adversary (ad'vėr-sā-ri), a. and n. [< ME. adversary, adversarie (also adversere, < AF. adverser, OF. adversier, aversier, mod. F. adversaire), < L. adversarius, a., standing opposite or opposed to, turned toward, < adversarius, n., antagonist, opponent, < adversus, opposite: see adverse, a.] I. a. 1. Opposed; opposite to; adverse: antagonistic: as, "adversary forces," Bp. King. [Rare or obsolete.]—2. In law, having an opposing party, in contradistinction to unopposed: as, an adversary suit.

II. n.; pl. adversaries (ad'vėr-sā-riz). 1. One who acts adversely or inimically; an unfriendly opponent or antagonist; an enemy.

The Lord will take vengeance on his adversaries.
Nahum i. 2.

We carry private and domestic enemies within, public and more hostile adversaries without.
Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, ii. 7.

Specifically—2. [cap.] The devil; Satan as the general enemy of mankind: as, the wiles of the Adversary.—3. An opponent in a contest; one who contends against another or strives for victory; a contestant.

Agree with thine adversary quickly, . . . lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge. Mat. v. 25.

Forsaketh yet the lists
By reason of his adversary's odds.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 5.

The adversaries may consult as to a fresh deal [in whist].
American Hoyle, p. 2.

=Syn. 1 and 3. Adversary, Antagonist, Opponent, Enemy, Foe. These words vary in strength according as they express spirit, action, or relation. A foe has most of the spirit of enmity, or is actively hostile. The word is more used in poetry than in prose. Enemy, as denoting an opponent in war, or a member of an opposing party, does not necessarily imply personal hostility. Opponent, adversary, and antagonist are less severe in their opposition, and need have no animosity. Opponent is often a passive word; antagonist is always active and personal. A man may be our opponent in an argument or a lawsuit, our adversary in a game, as chess, our antagonist in a wrestling- or boxing-match, or other occasion of strenuous exertion: the choice between the three words depends chiefly upon the measure of activity involved. In the Bible, adversary covers the meaning of all five words.

I will be . . . an adversary to thine adversaries.
Ex. xxiii. 22.

He that wrestles with us strengthens our nerves and sharpens our skill. Our antagonist is our helper.
Burke, Rev. in France.

In the Socratic way of dispute you agree to everything your opponent advances. Addison, Spectator, No. 239.

If they are spared by the humanity of the enemy and carried from the field, it is but a prolongation of torment.
R. Hall, Mod. Infidelity.

Those who are national or political enemies are often private friends. Crabb.

No man's defects sought they to know,
So never made themselves a foe. Prior, Epitaph.

adversary† (ad'vėr-sā-ri), v. t. [< adversary, a.] To antagonize; oppose.

To give any retorting accounts of the principal persons who thus adversaried him. C. Mather, Mag. Chris., ii. 12.

adversation† (ad-vėr-sā'shon), n. [< L. adversatio(n-), < adversari, pp. adversatus, oppose: see adverse, v.] The state of being adverse; adverseness; opposition; hostility.

adversative (ad-vėr'są-tiv), a. and n. [< LL. adversativus, < adversatus, pp. of adversari, oppose: see adverse, v.] I. a. 1. Expressing difference, contrariety, opposition, or antithesis: as, an adversative conjunction. In the sentence, he is an honest man, but a fanatic, but has an adversative force, and is called an adversative conjunction, and the whole proposition is called an adversative proposition.

2†. Of adverse nature; inimical.

II. n. A word or proposition denoting contrariety or opposition.

adversatively (ad-vėr'są-tiv-li), adv. In an adversative or opposing manner.

adverse (ad'vėrs, sometimes ad-vėrs'), a. [< ME. adverse, < OF. advers, earlier avers, auvers, F. adverse = Pr. adverse = Sp. Pg. adverso = It. avverso, < L. adversus, earlier advorsus, turned toward, over against, opposite, opposed, pp. of advertere, earlier advortere, turn to: see advert.] 1. Being or acting in a contrary direction; opposed or opposing in position or course; opposite; confronting: most commonly used of hurtful or hostile opposedness, but sometimes of mere opposition in space.

With adverse blast upturns them from the south Notus. Milton, P. L., x. 701.

Thus marching to the trumpet's lofty sound,
Drawn in two lines adverse they wheel'd around.
Dryden, Flower and Leaf, l. 286.

He looked upon the bright green slope, that skirts the adverse hills.
Blackie, Lays of Highlands, p. 167. (N. E. D.)

2. Antagonistic in purpose or effect; opposite; hostile; inimical: as, an adverse party; adverse criticism.

The spirit of personal invective is peculiarly adverse to the coolness of rhetoric. De Quincey, Rhetoric.

Error is adverse to human happiness.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 238.

3. Opposing desire; contrary to the wishes or to supposed good; hence, unfortunate; calamitous; unprosperous: as, adverse fate or circumstances.

He lived, we are told, to experience sport of adverse fortune. Merivale, Roman Empire, xlii.

In studying the minor poets, we see with especial clearness the adverse influences of a transition era, composite though it be. Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 28.

4. In bot., turned toward the axis: the opposite of averse, but rarely used. See anatropous. [The early botanists used the term in the sense of opposite.]—Adverse leaf, a leaf which has its upper surface turned toward the stem.—Adverse possession, in law, occupancy of realty as if by right without molestation, which may at length ripen into a sufficient title.—Adverse radicle, in bot., a radicle turned toward the hilum, as in anatropous seeds. See anatropous. =Syn. 1. Opposite, contrary, unfavorable.—2. Averse, Inimical, etc. See hostile.—3. Unfortunate, unlucky, calamitous, untoward, disastrous.

adverse† (ad-vėrs'), v. t. [< L. adversari, oppose, < adversus, opposite: see adverse, a.] To oppose.

Fortune should him adverse. Gower, Conf. Amant., ii.

adversely (ad'vėrs-li), adv. In an adverse manner; oppositely; inimically; offensively; unfortunately; unprosperously; in a manner contrary to desire or success.

If the drink you give me touch my palate adversely, I make a crooked face at it. Shak., Cor., ii. 1.

adverseness (ad'vėrs-nes), n. 1. Opposition; repugnance.

This would account for an adverseness to all our overtures for peace. Hallam.

2. Adversity; unprosperousness: as, adverseness of circumstances.

adversifoliate (ad-vėr-si-fō'li-āt), a. [< L. adversus, opposite, + folium, leaf, + -ate[1].] In bot., having opposite leaves: applied to plants where the leaves are arranged opposite to each other on the stem.

adversifolious (ad-vėr-si-fō'li-us), a. [As adversifoli-ate + -ous.] Same as adversifoliate.

adversion† (ad-vėr'shon), n. [< L. adversio(n-), a turning to, < advertere, pp. adversus, turn to: see advert.] Attention; perception.

The soul bestoweth her adversion
On something else.
Dr. H. More, Phil. Poems, p. 294.

adversity (ad-vėr'si-ti), n.; pl. adversities (-tiz). [< ME. adversite, < OF. adversitét, adversitet, aversitet, < L. adversita(t-)s, < adversus, adverse: see adverse, a.] 1. Adverse fortune or fate; a condition or state marked by misfortune, calamity, distress, or unhappiness.

Sweet are the uses of adversity,
Which, like the toad, ugly and venomous,
Wears yet a precious jewel in his head.
Shak., As you Like it, ii. 1.

2. An unfortunate event or circumstance; an ill chance; a misfortune or calamity: generally in the plural.

Ye have this day rejected your God, who himself saved you out of all your adversities. 1 Sam. x. 19.

=Syn. Trouble, distress, misery, disaster, woe, ill luck.

advert (ad-vėrt'), v. [< ME. adverten, averten, < OF. avertir, later advertir, "to inform, certifie, advertise," etc. (Cotgrave), < L. advertere, earlier advortere, turn toward; animum advertere (see animadvert), or simply advertere, turn the mind toward, advert to, notice, regard; < ad, to, + vertere, earlier vortere, turn: see vertex, vortex, verse, etc. Cf. advertise.] I. intrans. 1. To turn the mind; fix the attention; give or pay heed: with to, and sometimes upon, before the object of attention.

He was so strangely advisable that he would advert unto the judgement of the meanest person.
Bp. Fell, Life of Hammond.

As I cannot be conscious of what I do not perceive, so I do not perceive that which I do not advert upon. That which makes me feel makes me advert.
W. Wollaston, Religion of Nature, ii.

Even these primæval mountains
Teach the adverting mind.
Shelley, Mont Blanc, iv.

I will only advert to some leading points of the argument. Emerson, Am. Civilization.

=Syn. 2. Advert (to), Refer (to), Allude (to), Hint (at), remark (upon), take notice (of), dwell (upon), glance (at), animadvert (upon). These words are primarily used of the speaker in the conduct of his discourse. Advert, to turn to a thing directly and plainly, perhaps abruptly, so that the hearer's attention is fixed upon it for a time. Refer implies a lighter treatment than advert. Allude, to play upon, is a still more delicate reference to something that is well enough known to make an allusion sufficient, or is too much a matter of sensitiveness to permit the speaker to advert, or even refer, to it plainly; for these or other reasons, the mention is slight or indefinite. A still lighter reference is expressed by hint (at). See hint, v.

When . . . a well-dressed gentleman in a well-dressed company can advert to the topic of female old age without exciting, and intending to excite, a sneer. Lamb.

I proceed to another affection of our nature which bears strong testimony to our being born for religion. I refer to the emotion which leads us to revere what is higher than ourselves. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 11.

There is one Principle of the Gospel, which constitutes its very essence, to which I have not even alluded.
Channing, Perfect Life, p. 278.

And one, in whom all evil fancies clung
Like serpent eggs together, laughingly
Would hint at worse in either.
Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

II.† trans. 1. To turn the mind or attention to; take note of; observe.

Adverting his father's dear-bought experience.
Wagstaffe, Vind. Carol., Int., p. 12. (N. E. D.)

2. To advise, warn, or counsel.

I can no more, but in my name, advert
All earthly powers beware of tyrant's heart.
Mir. for Mags., p. 442.

advertence (ad-vėr'tens), n. [< ME. advertence, advertens, < OF. advertence, earlier avertance, < ML. advertentia, < L. adverten(t-)s: see advertent.] A turning or directing of the mind; attention; notice; consideration; heed; reference.

Such a process of reasoning is more or less implicit, and without the direct and full advertence of the mind exercising it. J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent.

advisable (ad-vī'za-bl), a. [< advise + -able.] 1. Proper to be advised; prudent; expedient; proper to be done or practised.

Some judge it advisable for a man to account with his heart every day; and this, no doubt, is the best and surest course. South, Sermons.

2. Open to or desirous of advice; capable of being influenced by advice. [Rare.]

Pray for an advisable and teachable temper.
Wesley, in Four Cent. of Eng. Letters, p. 231. (N. E. D.)

=Syn. 1. Fit, desirable, wise, best.

advisableness (ad-vī'za-bl-nes), n. The quality of being advisable or expedient; advisability.

advisably (ad-vī'za-bli), adv. In an advisable manner; with advice.

advisatory (ad-vī'za-tō-ri), a. Pertaining to an adviser, or to the giving of advice; advising; advisory. [Rare.]

Though in recent times Church dignitaries do not actively participate in war, yet their advisatory function respecting it—often prompting rather than restraining—has not even now ceased.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 492.

advise (ad-vīz'), v.; pret. and pp. advised, ppr. advising. [Early mod. E. also advice, advyse, avize, < late ME. advysen, earlier avisen, < OF. aviser, rarely adviser, F. aviser = Pr. Sp. Pg. avisar = It. avvisare, < ML. advisare, advise, inform, give notice to; from the noun, ML. advisum, OF. avis, etc.: see advice.] I. trans. 1†. To look at; view.

Advise you what you say; the minister is here.
Shak., T. N., iv. 2.

2. To take counsel; join others in deliberating; seek the advice of another or others: followed by with: as, I shall advise with my friends as to what is to be done.

Advising with me often as to projected changes, she was sometimes more conservative than myself.
H. James, Jr., Pass. Pilgrim, p. 134.

3. To counsel; give advice: as, I will act as you advise.

[Advise and its derivatives have been used by old writers in a number of other applications connected with the notions of seeing, viewing, reflecting, etc., suggested by the etymology.]

advised (ad-vīzd'), p. a. 1†. Cautious; prudent; acting with deliberation.

With the well advised is wisdom. Prov. xiii. 10.

Let him be . . . advised in his answers. Bacon, Essays.

2. Marked by or resulting from advice or deliberation; considerate or considered; prudent; expedient: now used chiefly in composition with well or ill: as, a well-advised movement; your conduct is very ill-advised.

We have no express purpose . . . nor any advised determination. Hooker, Works, I. 49.

advisedly (ad-vī'zed-li), adv. With advice or deliberation; heedfully; purposely; by design: as, I speak advisedly; an enterprise advisedly undertaken.

advisedness (ad-vī'zed-nes), n. The state of being advised; deliberate consideration; prudent procedure.

advisement (ad-vīz'ment), n. [< ME. avisement, < OF. avisement = Pr. avisament = Pg. avisamento = It. avvisamento; from the verb: see advise and -ment.] 1†. Counsel; advice.

I will, according to your advisement, declare the evils which seem most hurtful. Spenser, State of Ireland.

2. Deliberation; circumspection; consultation: now used chiefly in the phrase under advisement.

Among those that do all things with advisement there is wisdom. Prov. xiii. 10 (trans. 1539).

I have not decided against a proclamation of liberty to the slaves, but hold the matter under advisement. Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 215.

adviser (ad-vī'zėr), n. [< advise + *-er*1. Cf. ML. advisor.] One who advises or counsels; one who gives advice; a counselor: as, a legal adviser. Specifically, in politics, one of the counselors or ministers about a ruler, who may or may not be legally responsible for their superior's official acts. In the United States government the official advisers of the President are the heads of the various departments, collectively called the Cabinet. He requests their opinions in accordance with custom, but not through any provision of the Constitution. In England, until the middle of the seventeenth century, the Privy Council formed the King's executive advisers. This body, greatly enlarged, is now summoned in full only upon extraordinary occasions, and the ordinary advisers of the crown are those members of the ministry who constitute the Cabinet, which is in effect a committee of the Privy Council. The responsibility rests with the ministry, and not with the sovereign. See cabinet, and privy council, under council.

advisership (ad-vī'zėr-ship), n. The office of an adviser. [Rare.]

advising (ad-vī'zing), n. Advice; counsel.

Fasten your ear on my advisings. Shak., M. for M., iii. 1.

aviso† (ad-vī'zō), n. [With orig. ad- for a-, < Sp. Pg. aviso = It. avviso: see advice.] 1. Advice; suggestion; information given: as, "counsels and advisos," Whitlock, Manners of English, p. 176.—2. An advice- or despatch-boat; an aviso.

advisory (ad-vī'zō-ri), a. [< advise + -ory.] Pertaining to or giving advice; having power to advise: as, their opinion is only advisory; an advisory council.

The powers of both these bodies are merely advisory. J. Adams, Works, IV. 356.

The general association has a general advisory superintendence over all the ministers and churches. B. Trumbull, Hist. Conn.

ad vivum (ad vī'vum). [L.: ad, to; vivum, acc. neut. of vivus, alive: see vivid.] To the life; lifelike; strikingly exact or good: said of portraits, etc.

advocacy (ad'vō-kā-si), n.; pl.† advocacies (-siz). [< ME. advocacye, < OF. advocatie, advocacie, advocassie, < ML. advocatia, < L. advocatus, advocate: see advocate, n., and -acy.] 1. The act of pleading for, supporting, or recommending; active espousal.

His advocacy or denunciation of a measure is to affect for evil or good the condition of millions. Whipple, Ess. and Rev., I. 193.

2†. A lawsuit; a plea or pleading: as, "advocacies newe," Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 1469.

advocate (ad'vō-kāt), n. [< ME. advocat, advoket, -ette, earlier avocat, avoket, in late ME. also clipped vocate, voket, < OF. avocat, later advocat, F. avocat, vernacular OF. avoet, avoe, avoue (> E. avowee, advowee, q. v.), = Pr. avoucat = Sp. abogado = Pg. advogado = It. avvocato, < L. advocatus, an advocate, attorney, orig. a person called by one of the parties in a suit to aid as a witness or counsel, < advocatus, pp. of advocare, call to, < ad, to, + vocare, call, < vox, voice: see voice, vocation.] 1. One who pleads the cause of another in a court of law; specifically, a lawyer of full rank in a country, or practising before a court, in which the civil or the canon law prevails, as France and Scotland, and the admiralty and ecclesiastical courts of England.—2. One who defends, vindicates, or espouses a cause by argument; a pleader in favor of any person or thing; an upholder; a defender: as, an advocate of peace or of the oppressed.

That cause seems commonly the better that has the better advocate. Sir W. Temple, Miscellanies.

This is the mode of the advocate rather than of the critic. Whipple, Ess. and Rev., II. 138.

Advocate of the church (ML. advocatus ecclesiæ), a person, usually a layman, appointed, according to a custom originating in the fifth century, to protect the property of a church or an abbey, to plead its causes in the civil courts, and to manage its temporal affairs.—Devil's advocate (ML. advocatus diaboli). (a) In the Rom. Cath. Ch., a name commonly applied to the promoter of the faith, one of the college of consistorial advocates in the papal court, from his office of urging the objections against the virtues, miracles, etc., of a person proposed for canonization. Hence—(b) One given to bringing forward accusations against personal character.—Faculty of Advocates, in Scotland, a society consisting of the whole body of lawyers who practise in the highest courts, and who are admitted members after following a certain course of study, undergoing the prescribed examinations, and paying the requisite fees. It consists of about 400 members, and from this body vacancies on the bench are supplied.—God's advocate (ML. advocatus Dei), in the Rom. Cath. Ch., the procurator of the cause in a canonization, regularly one of the same order or country as the person to be canonized. See devil's advocate, above.—Judge-advocate, a person, generally a military officer, detailed by the authority appointing a court martial or military commission to prosecute cases before it and to act as its legal adviser. It is, in general, the duty of the judge-advocate to see that the court conforms to the law and to military custom, to secure for the accused his rights before the court, to summon witnesses, and to administer oaths.—Judge-advocate general. (a) In the United States army, a staff-officer with the rank of brigadier-general, who is also chief of the bureau of military justice, and whose duty it is to receive, revise, and record the proceedings of all courts martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions. (b) In England, formerly, an official who prosecuted in all criminal cases falling under military law which concerned the crown; now, a subordinate member of the government who acts as the legal adviser of the crown in all matters of military law.—Lord advocate, in Scotland, the principal crown counsel in civil causes, the chief public prosecutor of crimes, and an important political functionary in the management of Scottish affairs. His tenure of office ceases with that of the administration with which he is connected. He is assisted in the discharge of his duties by the solicitor-general and four advocates depute, appointed by himself. The lord advocate has usually a seat in Parliament, and before the union he had ex officio a seat in the Scots Parliament. He is also called crown advocate, queen's (or king's) advocate.

advocate (ad'vō-kāt), v.; pret. and pp. advocated, ppr. advocating. [< L. advocatus, pp. of advocare: see advocate, n. In the sense of 'act as an advocate,' the verb is from the noun.] I. trans. 1†. To invoke.

[The mercy of God] is not to be advocated upon every vain trifle. Bp. Andrewes, Sermons, V. 534.

2. To plead in favor of; defend by argument before a tribunal; support or vindicate.

This is the only thing distinct and sensible which has been advocated. Burke, Ref. of Representation.

The most eminent orators were engaged to advocate his cause. Mitford.

3. In Scots law, formerly, to transfer from an inferior court to the Court of Session, as an action while still pending, or after judgment might be reviewed. See advocation, 2. = Syn. 2. To plead for, stand up for, favor, uphold.

II. intrans. To act as an advocate; plead. [Rare.]

To advocate in my own child's behalf. Dawbeny, Hist. Cromwell (1659), Pref.

I am not going to advocate for this sense of actual. F. Hall, False Philol., p. 75.

advocateship (ad'vō-kāt-ship), n. The office or duty of an advocate.

advocatess† (ad'vō-kā-tes), n. [Improp. < advocate + -ess.] A female advocate. [Rare.] See advocatress.

God hath provided us of an advocatess [in some editions, advocatress]. Jer. Taylor, Diss. from Popery, i. § 8.

advocation (ad-vō-kā'shon), n. [< L. advocatio(n-), a calling in of legal assistance, legal assistance, time allowed for procuring it, any kind of delay or adjournment, < advocare, call in legal assistance: see advocate, n. See also advowson, which is a doublet of advocation. The first sense of advocation is due to advocate, v.] 1†. The act of advocating; a pleading for; plea; apology.

My advocation is not now in tune. Shak., Oth., iii. 4.

2. In Scots law, a form of process, now obsolete, the object of which was to remove a cause from an inferior to the supreme court for review or continuance.

advocator (ad'vō-kā-tor), n. [< LL. advocator, an advocate, < L. advocare: see advocate, n.] An advocate; a supporter.

The advocators of change in the present system of things. Browning, Soul's Tragedy, ii. (N. E. D.) advocatory (ad'vō-kā-tō-ri), a. [< ML. advocatorius, < LL. advocator: see above.] Of or pertaining to an advocate or his functions.

advocatress (ad'vō-kā-tres), n. [< advocator, q. v., + -ess; prob. after advocatrice.] A female advocate; an advocatrix or advocatess.

advocatrice† (ad'vō-kā-tris), n. [ME. advocatrice, < OF. advocatrice, < ML. advocatrix, acc. advocatricem: see advocatrix.] An advocatrix.

Swich an advocatrice who can dyvyne
. . . our greeves to redresse.
Chaucer, Mother of God, l. 40.

The emperour reioysed to him selfe, that Cinna had founde such an advocatrice. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 7.

advocatrix† (ad'vō-kā-triks), n. [ML., fem. of LL. advocator, advocate: see advocator.] A female advocate; an advocatress. [Rare.]

advocatus Dei (ad-vō-kā'tus dē'ī). [ML.] Same as God's advocate (which see, under advocate).

advocatus diaboli (ad-vō-kā'tus dī-ab'ō-lī). [ML.] Same as devil's advocate (which see, under advocate).

advoke† (ad-vōk'), v. t. [< L. advocare, summon, call to: see advocate, n.] To transfer; relegate; specifically, call to a higher court.

Queen Katharine had privately prevailed with the Pope to advoke the cause to Rome. Fuller, Ch. Hist., I. 48.

advouter† (ad-vou'tėr), n. [< late ME. advouter, advoutour, advoutre (also advow-), earlier avouter, avoutere, avoutier (also avow-), < OF. avoutre, aoutre, earlier avoltre, avultre, later advoultre, = Pr. avoutre, avoutro, < L. adulter, an adulterer: see advoutrer (with additional suffix), and the later substituted forms adulter, n., and adulterer.] An adulterer.

advoutrer† (ad-vou'trėr), n. [< late ME. advoutrer, advouterer, advouterere (also advow-), earlier avoutrer, avouterer, avouterere (also avow-), < advouter, avouter, + *-er*1. See the later substituted form adulterer.] An adulterer.

advoutress† (ad-vou'tres), n. [Early mod. E. advoutresse, -trice, < ME. avoutres, avoutresse (also avow-), < OF. avoutresse, avotresse, < avoutre, an adulterer (see advouter), + -esse, E. -ess. See the later substituted form adulteress.] An adulteress.

advoutrous† (ad-vou'trus), a. [< late ME. advoutrous, < advouter + -ous. See the later substituted form adulterous.] Adulterous.

advoutry† (ad-vou'tri), n. [Early mod. E. advoutry, -trie, -tery, advoultry, etc., < ME. avoutrie, avowtrie, avutry, -trie, -terye, etc., also avowter, < OF. avoutrie, avouterie, earlier aouterie, aulterie (< L. as if adulteria,* f.), also avoutire, avoutere, avoltere, avultere, < L. adulterium, neut., adultery, < adulter, an adulterer. See the later substituted form adultery.] Adultery. Also written avowtry.

A marriage compounded between an advoutry and a rape. Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII.

advowee (ad-vou-ē'), n. [Early mod. E. avowee, < ME. avowe, < OF. avoue, earlier avoe, avoet, < L. advocatus, patron, advocate: see advocate, n., and advowson.] In England, one who has the right of advowson. So called originally as being the advocate, protector, or patron of an ecclesiastical office, house, or benefice.

advowson (ad-vou'zn), n. [Early mod. E. also advowzen, advouson, < ME. avowson, avoweson, avoweisoun, < AF. advouison, advoweson, advoeson, OF. avoeson, < L. advocatio(n-), a calling to or summoning of legal assistance, hence in ML. the duty of defense or protection, the right of presentation, < advocare, call to defend: see advocation, and cf. advowee.] 1†. Originally, the obligation to defend an ecclesiastical office or a religious house. See advocate of the church, under advocate.—2. In Eng. law, the right of presentation to a vacant benefice. It was originally vested in the bishop of the diocese, but was often transferred to the founder or patron of the church. Advowsons are of three kinds, presentative, collative, and donative: presentative when the patron presents a clergyman to the bishop with a petition that he be instituted with the benefice; collative when the bishop is the patron, and both presents and institutes (or collates) the incumbent; donative when the sovereign, or any subject by his license, having founded a church, appoints its incumbent without any reference to the bishop. Advowsons are also appendant, that is, annexed to the possession of a certain manor; or in gross, that is, separated by legal conveyance from the ownership of the manor.

advoyer (ad-voi'ėr), n. Same as avoyer.

advt. A common contraction of advertisement.

award† (ad-wârd'), n. and v. A forced spelling of award. Spenser, F. Q., IV. x. 17.

adynamia (ad-i-nā'mi-ă), n. [NL. (> E. adynamy = F. adynamie), < Gr. ἀδυναμία, weakness, < ἀδύναμος, weak, < ἀ- priv., without, + δύναμις, power: see dynamic.] In pathol., weakness; want of strength occasioned by disease; a deficiency of vital power; asthenia. Also called adynamy.

adynamic (ad-i-nam'ik), a. [As adynamia + -ic: see a-[18] and dynamic.] 1. In pathol., of or pertaining to adynamia; characterized by or resulting from vital debility; asthenic: as, adynamic fevers; an adynamic condition; the adynamic sinking of typhoid fever.—2. In phys., characterized by absence of force.

adynamy (a-din'a-mi), n. Same as adynamia.

adyt† (ad'it), n. Same as adytum.

> Behold, amidst the adyts of our gods, . . .
> The ghosts of dead men howling walk about.
> Greene and Lodge, Looking Glass for Lond. and Eng.

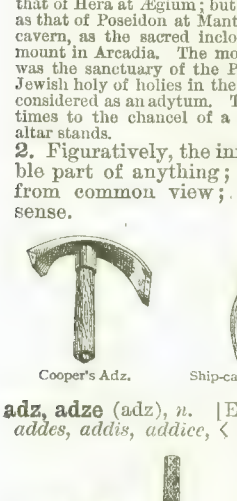
adytum (ad'i-tum), n.; pl. adyta (-tă). [L., < Gr. ἄδυτον, an adytum, a shrine, a place not to be entered, neut. of ἄδυτος, not to be entered, < ἀ- priv. + δυτός, verbal adj. of δύειν, enter.] 1. In ancient worship, a sacred place which the worshipers might not enter, or which might be entered only by those who had performed certain rites, or only by males or by females, or only on certain appointed days, etc.; also, a secret sanctuary or shrine open only to the priests, or whence oracles were delivered; hence, in general, the most sacred or reserved part of any place of worship. In Greece an adytum was usually an inner recess or chamber in a temple, as in that of Hera at Ægium; but it might be an entire temple, as that of Poseidon at Mantinea, or a grove, inclosure, or cavern, as the sacred inclosure of Zeus on the Lycæan mount in Arcadia. The most famous adytum of Greece was the sanctuary of the Pythic oracle at Delphi. The Jewish holy of holies in the temple at Jerusalem may be considered as an adytum. The word is also applied sometimes to the chancel of a Christian church, where the altar stands.

2. Figuratively, the innermost or least accessible part of anything; that which is screened from common view; hidden recess; occult sense.

Cooper's Adz.



Ship-carpenter's Adz.

Railroad Adz.

adz, adze (adz), n. [Early mod. E. ads, adds, addes, addis, addice, < ME. adis, adse, adese, < AS. adesa, an adz or ax, a word thought by some to be a corruption of an older acwesa* (= Goth. akwisi), the full form of eax, æx, æcs, acas, ONorth. acasa, acase, ax; but in the earliest example adesa occurs in connection with æcs as a different word: see ax[1].] A cutting-tool somewhat like an ax, but having the blade placed at right angles to the handle and formed to a curve nearly corresponding to its sweep through the air when in use. It is used for dressing timber, and has its cutting edge ground upon the concave side. The adz is also used, though rarely, as a weapon; and among certain savage tribes adzes of hard stone are richly adorned for ceremonial uses.—Hollow adz, a tool with a curved blade used in chamfering the chine of a cask on the inner side.

South-Sea Island Adzes.

adz, adze (adz), v. t. [< adz, n.] To chip or shape with an adz: as, to adz logs or timber.

adz-plane (adz'plān), n. A tool adapted for Adz-plane and Specimen of Work.

molding and rabbeting, used in panel-work by coach- and pattern-makers.

ae (ā), a. [For Sc. ane, = E. a (emphatic) for one: see a[2] and one.] One. [Scotch.]

æ[1]. (As a character, pron. ē, or, spelled out, ā-ē; in words, E. or L., according to the E. pron. regularly as e in similar positions, that is, either e or ē: often improp. pron. ē in all positions. In the Continental pron. of Latin, e or ā; in the 'Roman,' āi or ī.) A digraph or ligature appearing in Latin and Latinized Greek words. In Middle Latin and New Latin it is usually written and printed as a ligature, and sounded like Latin e, with which in Middle Latin it constantly interchanges. In classical Latin it was usually written separately (and hence usually so printed in modern editions of classical texts), and pronounced probably as a diphthong. In Old Latin ai appears instead of ae, and Latin ae, œ is the regular transliteration of Gr. αι, as aegis or ægis, from Gr. αἰγις. In English words of Latin or Greek origin ae or œ is usually reduced to e, except generally in proper names, as Cæsar, Æneas, in words belonging to Roman or Greek antiquities, as ægis, and modern words of scientific or technical use, as phœnogamous. But the tendency is to reduce ae or œ to e in all words not purely Latin or New Latin, except proper names in their original forms. In some names of changed form the æ has become permanently eliminated, as Egypt, and in some of otherwise unchanged form nearly or quite so, as Etna, Ethiopia. When ae represents the diphthong æ, it should be distinguished from ae not a diphthong, the latter being commonly marked with a dieresis, as in aëro-, aërial, etc.

æ[2]. A character in the Anglo-Saxon alphabet representing a simple vowel, having when short the sound of English a in glad (ă), and when long the sound of English a in glare, dare, etc. (ā), as commonly pronounced in the United States. The form is that of the late Latin æ, which had a sound nearly the same as simple e (see æ[1]). In the twelfth century short æ began to disappear, being represented by a (sometimes by e), without, however, any appreciable change of sound. Long æ also disappeared, being regularly replaced by ę (long) or ee, with a change of sound through Middle English ē (that is, ā in modern pronunciation) to modern ī (that is, ē in modern pronunciation). Examples are: (1) short æ, whence Middle English and modern English a: as, Anglo-Saxon glæd, sæd, æt, hæt, etc., whence Middle English and modern English glad, sad, at, hat, etc.; (2) long æ, whence Middle English ē or ee, modern English ee or ea: as, Anglo-Saxon ǣd, rǣdan, sǣ, etc., Middle English seed, rede, se or see, etc., modern English seed, read, sea, etc. Before r, long æ has usually retained its Anglo-Saxon sound (at least in the United States): as, Anglo-Saxon ǣr, thǣr, hwǣr, hǣr, etc., modern English ere, there, where, hair, etc. In British works the vowel in these words is usually treated as a prolonged "short e" (as in met), or as a slightly modified "long a" (as in mate).

Æ[3]. The symbol used in Lloyd's Register for third-class wooden and composite ships. This class includes vessels unfit for the conveyance of dry and perishable goods on short voyages, and of cargoes in their nature subject to sea-damage on any voyage. See *A*1, under a[1].

-æ. The nominative plural termination of Latin and Latinized Greek words in -a (in Latinized Greek also -e, -as, -es) of the first declension, feminine, sometimes masculine. This plural termination is sometimes retained in English, as in formulæ, nebulæ, vertebræ, minutiæ, etc., in some cases alongside of a regular English plural, as in formulas, nebulas, etc. In the formal and technical terminations, -aceæ, -eæ, -idæ, -inæ, in botany and zoölogy, -æ ends the plural names of orders, tribes, etc., of plants, and of families and subfamilies of animals.

Æchmophorus (ek-mof'ō-rus), n. [NL. (Coues, 1862), < Gr. αἰχμοφόρος, one who carries a spear, < αἰχμή, a spear, + -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].]

Western Grebe (Æchmophorus occidentalis).

A genus of large, long-necked grebes of America, having the bill extremely long, slender, and acute, whence the name. The type is Æ. occidentalis, known as the western grebe.

æcidia, n. Plural of æcidium, 2.

æcidial (ē-sid'i-al), a. Relating or pertaining ★to Æcidium (which see).

> A monograph . . . by Von Thümen contains an account of the æcidial forms attacking Coniferæ, and includes a number of species found in the United States.
> Smithsonian Rep., 1880, p. 324.

æcidioform (ē-sid'i-ō-fôrm), n. [< NL. æcidium + L. forma, form.] Same as æcidiostage.

Æcidiomycetes (ē-sid″i-ō-mī-sē'tēz), n. pl. [NL., < Æcidium + Gr. μύκητες, pl. of μύκης, a mushroom, fungus.] A group of parasitic fungi, synonymous with the present order Uredinales. Uromyces and Puccinia, commonly called rusts, are the most frequent and widely distributed genera, causing great injury to many cultivated plants.

æcidiospore (ē-sid'i-ō-spōr), n. [< NL. æcidium + Gr. σπορά, seed, spore.] A spore produced in the æcidiostage of growth of certain parasitic fungi, distinguished by or peculiar in their development by a process of abstriction. See æcidiostage.

æcidiostage (ē-sid'i-ō-stāj), n. [< NL. æcidium + E. stage.] The first of the alternations of development of numerous fungi of the order Uredinales. See Æcidium. Also called æcidioform.

Æcidium (ē-sid'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. αἰκία, injury, + dim. -ιδιον.] 1. A form-genus of fungi, formerly regarded as distinct, but now known to represent merely an early stage in the life-history of Uromyces, Puccinia, and closely related genera of the order Uredinales. Commonly called cluster-cups.—2. [l. c.] pl. æcidia (ē-sid'i-ă). The cup-like organ (pseudoperidium) characteristic of the genus or form. See pseudoperidium.

> These æcidium-fruits, which arise from the same mycelium as the spermogonia, lie at first beneath the epidermis of the leaf.
> Sachs, Botany (trans.), p. 247.

ædes (ē'dēz), n.; pl. ædes. [L., a house, a temple: see edify.] 1. In Rom. antiq., any edifice, sacred or profane. Specifically, as distinguished from a temple (templum), a building set apart for the cult of a divinity, but not solemnly consecrated by the augurs. Thus, the "temple" of Vesta is properly an ædes, and was so termed in antiquity.

2. In Christian arch., a chapel.

ædicula (ē-dik'ū-lă), n.; pl. ædiculæ (-lē). [ML., dim. of L. ædes: see above.] In Rom. antiq.: (a) A very small house or chapel. (b) A shrine in the form of a small building; a recess in a wall for an altar or statue.

> Every division of the city had likewise its Lares compitales, now three in number, who had their own ædicula at the cross-roads.
> Encyc. Brit., XIV. 313.

ædile, ædileship, etc. See edile, etc.

ædœalogy (ē-dē-al'ō-ji), n. A less proper form of ædœology.

ædœology (ē-dē-ol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. αἰδοῖα, the private parts, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That part of medical science which treats of the organs of generation; also, a treatise on or an account of the organs of generation.

ædœoptosis (ē-dē-op-tō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. αἰδοῖα, the private parts, + πτῶσις, a falling, < πίπτειν, fall.] Displacement downward of some part of the female genital organs, and also of the bladder.

ædœotomy (ē-dē-ot'ō-mi), n. [< Gr. αἰδοῖα, the private parts, + τομή, a cutting, < τέμνειν, cut.] Dissection of the organs of generation.

aefauld (ā'fâld), a. [Sc., = E. onefold, q. v.] 1. Honest; upright; without duplicity.—2†. Single; characterized by oneness: as, the aefauld Godhead. Barbour. [Scotch, and rare.]

aefauldness (ā'fâld-nes), n. [< Sc. aefauld + -ness.] Honesty; uprightness; singleness of heart; freedom from duplicity. [Scotch.]

Æga (ē'gă), n. [NL. (Leach, 1815), < Gr. αἴξ (αἰγ-), goat.] A genus of isopods giving name to the family Ægidæ. Æ. psora, known as the salve-bug, is a fish-louse found attached by its sharp claws to cod and halibut. See cut under salve-bug.

Ægæonichthyinæ (ē″jē-on-ik-thi-ī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Ægæonichthys + -inæ.] A subfamily of pediculate fishes, of the family Ceratiidæ. The mouth is of moderate size; the cephalic spine has its basal element subcutaneous, procumbent, and at an acute or a right angle with the distal element; the second dorsal spine is wanting; the body and head are depressed; and the mouth is vertical or inclined forward, the mandibular articulation being projected forward. The aspect of the fish is very singular.

ægæonichthyine (ē″ji-on-ik'thi-in), n. A fish of the subfamily Ægæonichthyinæ.

Ægæonichthys (ē″ji-on-ik'this), n. [NL., < Gr. Αἰγαίων, in myth., a name of Briareus, also the Ægean sea, + ἰχθύς, a fish.] The typical genus of pediculate fishes of the subfamily Ægæonichthyinæ. But one species is known, Æ. appelli, occurring in the deep sea near New Zealand.

ægagre (ē-gag'rē), n. Same as ægagrus.

ægagri, n. Plural of ægagrus.

ægagropila (ē-ga-grop'i-lă), n.; pl. ægagropilæ ★(-lē). [NL., < Gr. αἰγαγρος, the wild goat (see ægagrus), + L. pila, a ball (or pilus, hair).] A ball of hair found in the stomach of some ruminating quadrupeds, as the goat.

ægagropile (ē-gag'rō-pīl), n. Same as ægagropila. Also contracted ægropile.

ægagrus (ē-gag'rus), n.; pl. ægagri (-rī). [L., < Gr. αἰγαγρος, the wild goat, < αἴξ (αἰγ-), goat, + ἀγρός, field, ἄγριος, wild.] A wild goat, supposed to be the species now known to inhabit the mountains of the Caucasus, Persia, etc., the paseng or pasing of the Persians, and the wild stock of most if not all of the breeds of the domestic goat. It is the Capra hircus of Linnæus, C. ægagrus of Gmelin and Pallas, C. caucasica of H. Smith, and Wild Goat (Capra ægagrus).

Hircus ægagrus of J. E. Gray. J. F. Brandt asserts that this is incontestably and exclusively the source of the domestic goat. In fact, the name ægagrus may have been applied sometimes to goats run wild, and the Capra ægagrus of both G. and F. Cuvier, the bezoar-goat, ascribed to Persia and the Alps, is said to have been merely the domestic goat run wild. The celebrated Angora goat may have been derived from a different species or variety, Capra falconeri, originating in central Asia. The goat or ægagrus in all its varieties is closely related to the ibex, Capra ibex, which, however, is a distinct species. In the stomach and intestines of the goat, as in those of other artiodactyls, are found the concretions called bezoar-stones. Also written ægagre.

Whether the Capra ægagrus or the Capra ibex should be regarded as the stock of the domesticated goat of Europe has long been a question among naturalists; the weighty arguments which may be drawn from the character of the wild species which was contemporary with the Bos primigenius . . . [are] shown . . . to be in favor of Capra ægagrus. Owen.

Ægean, Egean (ē-jē′an), a. or n. [< L. Ægæum (sc. mare, sea), < Gr. Αἰγαῖον (sc. πέλαγος), or Αἰγαῖος (sc. πόντος), the Ægean sea, < Αἰγαί, Ægæ, a town in Eubœa, and also the name of several cities.] A name often applied to that part of the Mediterranean sea otherwise called the Archipelago.

æger (ē′jėr), n. [L., sick.] Same as ægrotat.

Ægeria (ē-jē′ri-ą), n. [NL., named after Ægeria, or Egeria, a prophetic nymph or Camena celebrated in Roman legend, instructress of Numa.] In entom.: (a) The typical genus of the family Ægeriidæ, order Lepidoptera. It consists of brightly colored moths with the wings wholly or in part transparent. The larvæ are endophytous, boring into the stems and trunks of shrubs and trees, and embrace some of the most destructive enemies to cultivated fruit-trees. See borer and maple-borer. Also sometimes called Sesia. (b) A genus of Diptera founded by Robineau-Desvoidy. Also spelled Egeria.

ægerian (ē-jē′ri-an), a. Of or belonging to the Ægeriidæ. Also spelled egerian.

An Ægerian enemy of the native pines. Science, VI. 542.

ægeriid (ē-jē′ri-id), n. A moth of the family Ægeriidæ; a clearwing.

Ægeriidæ (ē-jē-rī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ægeria + -idæ.] In entom., a family of Lepidoptera, section Heterocera, comprising a number of interesting moths related to the sphinxes, hawk-moths, or Sphingidæ, and commonly called clearwings, from the transparency of their wings. The larvæ live in the interior of the branches and roots of trees. Some attack the apple, and one, the Sesia tipuliformis, or currant-clearwing, feeds upon the pith of currant-bushes. Also written Ægeridæ, Ægeriadæ, and with initial E instead of Æ. Also sometimes called Sesiidæ.

Ægialites (ē″ji-ą-lī′tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. αἰγιαλός, the sea-shore, beach (that over which the sea rushes? < ἀίσσειν, rush, + ἁλς, the sea), + -ites.] 1. In ornith., a genus of Limicolæ, of the family Charadriidæ, or plovers, chiefly distinguished from Charadrius by color, having the upper parts not speckled, the lower never extensively black, and bars or rings upon the head, neck, or breast. The tarsus is comparatively short, with large scutella arranged in two or three special rows. The sexes are usually distinguishable, though similar. The genus contains the numerous species of small plovers known as ring-plovers, inhabiting all parts of the world. The killdeer (Æ. vociferus), the ring-neck (Æ. semipalmatus), and the piping plover (Æ. melodus) are characteristic species of the United States. Also written Ægialitis. 2. In entom., the typical genus of the family Ægialitidæ. Eschscholtz, 1833.

ægialitid (ē-ji-ą-lit′id), n. A beetle of the family Ægialitidæ.

Ringed Plover (Ægialites hiaticula).

Ægialitidæ (ē″ji-ą-lit′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ægialites, 2, + -idæ.] A family of heteromerous coleopterous insects, having the anterior coxal cavities closed behind, the tarsal claws simple, and six ventral segments, the last two being closely united and the first two connate. J. L. Le Conte, 1862.

Ægiceras (ē-jis′ē-ras), n. [NL., < Gr. αἴξ (αἰγ-), a goat, + κέρας, a horn: see Cerastes.] A genus of plants consisting of a single species, Æ. majus, belonging to the family Myrsinaceæ. It is a shrub or small tree, found on the swampy shores of the East Indies and Australia. Its seeds germinate while still on the tree, and send down perpendicular roots into the mud, thus forming impenetrable thickets, which constitute the only vegetation for miles along some coasts, particularly of Sumatra.

ægid (ē′jid), n. An isopod of the family Ægidæ.

Ægidæ (ē′ji-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ægæ + -idæ.] A family of isopod crustaceans, typified by the genus Ægæ, having all the segments beyond the head distinct, and no operculum closing the branchial chamber.

ægilopic, egilopic (ē-ji-lop′ik), a. 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of ægilops.—2. Affected with ægilops.

ægilopical, egilopical (ē-ji-lop′i-kal), a. Same as ægilopic.

ægilops, egilops (ē′ji-lops), n. [NL., < Gr. αἰγίλωψ (-ωπ-), an ulcer in the eye; also, a kind of wild oats, and a kind of oak with sweet fruit. Cf. αἰγιλος, an herb of which goats were said to be fond; appar. < αἴξ (αἰγ-, αἰγιλ-*), a goat, + ὄψ, eye; cf. ὤψ, face, appearance.] 1. In pathol., goat-eye; a tumor, abscess, or other affection of the inner angle (canthus) of the eye; sometimes, a fistula lacrymalis or other affection of the lacrymal duct. In a mild form, it is simply a swelling of the lacrymal papilla, and is very common.—2. [cap.] In bot., a genus of grasses allied to Triticum, or wheat-grass, growing wild in the south of Europe and parts of Asia. It is believed by many botanists to be the origin of cultivated wheat.—3. A species of oak, Quercus Ægilops; the valonia-oak of the Levant.—4. [cap.] A genus of lamellibranchs. James E. Hall, 1850.

Ægina (ē-jī′nä), n. [NL., < L. Ægīna, < Gr. Αἴγινα, an island in the Saronic gulf; also, in myth., a nymph of Argolis, beloved by Zeus.] 1. The typical genus of the family Æginidæ. Eschscholtz, 1829.—2. A genus of crustaceans.

Æginetan (ē-ji-nē′tan), a. and n. [< L. Æginēta, < Gr. Αἰγινήτης, an inhabitant of Αἴγινα: see Ægina.] I. a. Relating or pertaining to the island of Ægina or its inhabitants.—Æginetan sculptures, or Ægina marbles, a collection of ancient sculptures discovered in 1811 on the island of Ægina, which originally decorated the temple of Athena. They date from about 475 B. C., and, although in general true to nature, their faces bear that forced smile which characterizes the portrayal of the human subject in all early Greek art. These sculptures are now the most notable ornament of the Glyptothek at Munich.

Æginetan Sculpture.
Herakles, from the eastern pediment of the temple of Athena.

II. n. An inhabitant of Ægina.

Æginetic (ē-ji-net′ik), a. [< Gr. Αἰγινητικός, pertaining to Αἴγινα, Ægina.] Æginetan; resembling Æginetan work.

The coinage of Locris, Phocis, and Bœotia is entirely on the Æginetic standard. ★ Encyc. Brit., XVII. 642.

Æginidæ (ē-jin′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ægina, 1, + -idæ.] A family of Trachymedusæ, typified by the genus Ægina, containing craspedote acalephs with a hard discoidal umbrella, pouch-like enlargements of the digestive cavity, and the circular vessel usually reduced to a row of cells: related to Geryoniidæ and Trachynemidæ. The order to which the Æginidæ pertain is called Hydromedusæ, Haplomorpha, and by other names; it is that in which there is no hydriform trophosome, the medusæ developing directly from the ovum.

Ægiothus (ē-jī′ō-thus), n. [NL., < Gr. αἰγίοθος, also αἰγιθος, and later αἰγινθος, a bird, perhaps the hedge-sparrow.] The redpolls or redpoll linnets, a notable genus of Fringillidæ, founded by Cabanis in 1851. There are several species, of Europe, Asia, and North America; the common redpoll is Æ. linaria; the mealy redpoll is Æ. canescens. They are small finches, chiefly boreal in distribution, streaked with dusky and flaxen brown and white, the males with crimson poll and rosy breast. See cut under redpoll.

Ægipan (ē′ji-pan), n. [L., < Gr. Αἰγίπαν, < αἴξ (αἰγ-), goat, + Πάν, Pan.] 1. An epithet of the god Pan, having reference to his goat-like lower limbs, short horns, and upright pointed ears, the other portions of his body being like those of a man. See Diopan, and also satyr and faun.—2. In entom., a genus of orthopterous insects, of the family Locustidæ. Scudder, 1877.

ægirine (ē′ji-rin), n. Same as ægirite.

ægirite (ē′ji-rīt), n. [< Ægir, the Icel. god of the sea (or Ægirus?), + *-ite*2.] A mineral occurring in greenish-black prismatic crystals, isomorphous with pyroxene. In composition it is nearly identical with acmite: found in southern Norway, Hot Springs, Arkansas, and elsewhere, commonly in elæolite-syenite. Also written ægyrite and ægirine.

Ægirus (ē-jī′rus), n. [NL., < (?) Gr. Αἰγειρος, a city of Lesbos. Cf. αἴγειρος, the black poplar.]

Ægirus punctilucens, dorsal view.

A genus of nudibranchiate or notobranchiate gastropods, of the family Polyceridæ, having large tubercles on the convex back. Three species are known from the European seas. Also written Ægires. Lovén, 1844.

ægis (ē′jis), n. [L. ægis, < Gr. αἰγίς, the ægis, also a rushing storm, hurricane, appar. < ἀίσσειν, shoot, dart, glance; popularly identified with αἰγίς, a goat-skin, < αἴξ (αἰγ-), a goat: see Aix.] 1. In Gr. myth., originally the storm-cloud enveloping the thunderbolt, the especial weapon of Zeus; afterward considered as the skin of the goat Amalthea, the foster-mother of Zeus, which the latter took for defensive armor in his war with the Titans. According to another conception, it was a terrible and immortal arm wrought by Hephæstus after the fashion of a thunder-cloud fringed with lightning. It was intrusted by Zeus to Apollo and to Athena, and became a characteristic attribute of the latter.

Ægis.—Varvakeion Statuette of Athena.

2. In art, a representation of the ægis as a sort of mantle fringed with serpents, much more ample in archaic examples than later, generally worn covering the breast, but sometimes held extended over the left arm, or thrown over the arm to serve as a shield. The ægis of Athena, except in the most primitive representations, bears in the midst the head of the Gorgon Medusa, and is usually covered with scales like those of a serpent. Hence, figuratively—3. Any influence or power which protects: as, under the imperial ægis.

Also spelled egis.

Ægithalinæ (ē-jith-ą-lī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Ægithalus + -inæ.] A subfamily of titmice, family Paridæ, typified by the genus Ægithalus. It was named by Reichenbach in 1850, and by Gray is made to include Panurus and a number of other genera of tits of Europe, Asia, and Africa.

Ægithalus (ē-jith'a-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. αἰγίθαλος, the tit, L. parus.] The typical genus of Ægithalinæ, based upon Parus pendulinus, one of the European bottle-tits. The name is also used for another genus of tits, more commonly called Acredula (which see), of which A. caudata is the type. Also written Ægithalos.

Ægithognathæ (ē-ji-thog'nā-thē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. αἰγίθος, also αἰγιθος, the hedge-sparrow, or perhaps the bunting, + γνάθος, jaw.] In Huxley's classification of birds, a suborder of Carinatæ, having the bones of the palate disposed as in the sparrow and other passerine birds, and embracing the passerines, swifts, and woodpeckers. See ægithognathism.

ægithognathism (ē-ji-thog'nā-thism), n. The quality or condition of being ægithognathous; that structure of the bony palate of birds which consists in the union of the vomer with the alinasal walls and turbinals, and is characteristic of the suborder Ægithognathæ. Parker distinguishes four styles: (a) incomplete, very curiously exhibited by the low Turnix, which is closely related to gallinaceous birds; (b, c) complete, as represented under two varieties, one typified by the crow, an oscine passerine, the other by the clamatorial passerines Pachyrhamphus and Pipra; (d) compound, that is, mixed with a kind of desmognathism.

Ægithognathism is exhibited almost unexceptionally by the great group of passerine birds; it is also nearly coincident with Passeres, though a few other birds, notably the swifts, also exhibit it. Coues, N. A. Birds, p. 172.

ægithognathous (ē-ji-thog'nā-thus), a. [As Ægithognathæ + -ous.] Of, pertaining to, or having the characteristics of the Ægithognathæ; having the vomer united with the alinasal walls and turbinals. See ægithognathism.

Ægle (ē'glē), n. [L., < Gr. αἴγλη, splendor, a female name in Greek mythology.] 1. A genus of plants of tropical India, allied to and resembling the orange-tree, but with trifoliate leaves. Æ. Marmelos, the Bengal quince, golden apple, or bel, has an aromatic fruit, somewhat like an orange. A perfume and a yellow dye are obtained from the rind, and the dried fruit is a popular remedy in diarrhea and dysentery.

2. A genus of brachyurous decapodous crustaceans, or crabs, of which a species, Ægle rufopunctata, is found in Mauritius and the Philippine islands.—3. A genus of mollusks. Oken, 1815. See Pneumodermon.—4. A genus of lepidopterous insects. Hübner, 1816.

ægobronchophony (ē″gō-brong-kof'ō-ni), n. [< Gr. αἴξ (αἰγ-), goat, + βρόγχια, the bronchial tubes, + φωνή, voice.] In pathol., a combination of two sounds, ægophony and bronchophony, heard by auscultation in pleuro-pneumonia. See ægophony and bronchophony.

ægocerine (ē-gos'e-rin), a. Pertaining to or characteristic of the genus Ægocerus: as, an ægocerine goat or antelope; ægocerine horns. Also written aigocerine.

Ægocerus (ē-gos'e-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. αἴξ (αἰγ-), goat, + κέρας, a horn.] 1. A genus of wild goats, related to the ibexes, of the subfamily Caprinæ. P. S. Pallas, 1811; J. E. Gray.—2. A genus of antelopes with long spiral horns, related to the oryx and the addax, of the subfamily Antilopinæ: equal to Hippotragus (Sundevall). Hamilton Smith, 1827; H. N. Turner, 1849. Also written Aigocerus, Ægoceros.

ægophonic (ē-gō-fon'ik), a. Of or pertaining to ægophony. Sometimes written egophonic.

ægophony (ē-gof'ō-ni), n. [< Gr. αἴξ (αἰγ-), a goat, + φωνή, voice, sound.] In pathol., a form of vocal resonance, broken and tremulous, heard in auscultation, and suggesting the bleating of a goat. It is best heard in hydrothorax at the level of the fluid. Sometimes written egophony.

ægropile (ē'grō-pīl), n. Same as ægagropile.

ægrotans (ē-grō'tanz), n.; pl. ægrotantes (ē-grō-tan'tēz). [L., ppr. of ægrotare, be sick: see ægrotat.] In English universities, one who is sick; one who holds an ægrotat (which see).

ægrotant (ē-grō'tant), n. [< L. ægrotan(t-)s, ppr. of ægrotare: see ægrotat.] One who is sick; an invalid. [Rare.]

ægrotantes, n. Plural of ægrotans.

ægrotat (ē-grō'tat), n. [L., he is sick, 3d pers. sing. pres. ind. of ægrotare, be sick, < ægrotus, sick, < æger, sick.] In English universities, a medical certificate given to a student showing that he has been prevented by sickness from attending to his duties. Also called æger.

I sent my servant to the apothecary for a thing called an ægrotat, which I understood . . . meant a certificate that I was indisposed.

Babbage, Pass. from Life of a Phil. (1864), p. 37.

Reading ægrotat, in some universities, leave taken, commonly in December, in order to get time to read for one's degree.

ægyrite, n. See ægirite.

ælurid (ē-lū'rid), n. A carnivorous mammal of the family Æluridæ.

Æluridæ (ē-lū'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ælurus + -idæ.] A family of carnivorous quadrupeds, of the order Feræ, suborder Fissipedia, and series Arctoidea, closely related to the Ursidæ (bears). It is based upon a single genus and species, Ælurus fulgens, the panda, resembling a racoon in some respects. The technical characters of the family are found chiefly in the details of the skull and teeth, as compared with those of either bears or racoons. The tail is well developed (rudimentary in Ursidæ); the teeth are 36 in number (40 in Procyonidæ); there are only 2 true molars on each side of either jaw, with 3 premolars, 1 canine, and 3 incisors. The alisphenoid canal is well developed; the auditory bulla is very small, and is separated from the long trigonal paroccipital process. Also written Ailuridæ.

æluroid (ē-lū'roid), a. and n. [< Gr. αἴλουρος, a cat (see Ælurus), + εἶδος, form.] I. a. Feline; cat-like; specifically, of or pertaining to the Æluroidea.

II. n. A member of the Æluroidea.

Æluroidea (ē-lū-roi'dē-ạ), n. pl. [NL.: see æluroid.] A superfamily section of feline fissiped carnivorous mammals, typified by the cat family, Felidæ, and containing also the families Cryptoproctidæ, Protelidæ, Hyænidæ, Viverridæ, and Eupleridæ (but not the family Æluridæ): distinguished as a series from the Cynoidea or canine series, and the Arctoidea or ursine series (to which the family Æluridæ belongs). The carotid canal is not well developed; the glenoid foramen is minute or wanting; the foramen lacerum posterius and the condyloid foramen debouch together; Cowper's glands are present; and the os penis is rudimentary, except in Cryptoprocta. Æluroidea typica are the true felines or cats, of the families Felidæ and Cryptoproctidæ. Æluroidea hyæniformia are the hyenas, of the families Hyænidæ and Protelidæ. Æluroidea viverriformia are the civets, ichneumons, etc., of the families Viverridæ and Eupleridæ. See these family names. Flower; Gill. Also written Ailuroidea.

It is unfortunate that the two names Æluroidea and Æluridæ should clash, as not belonging to the same sections [of the Carnivora]. Pascoe, Zoöl. Class., p. 258.

Æluropoda (ē-lū-rop'ō-dạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of æluropus (-pod-), adj.: see æluropodous.] A name given by J. E. Gray to the typical viverrine division of the family Viverridæ, the species of which division are æluropodous (which see). The name is contrasted with Cynopoda.

æluropodous (ē-lū-rop'ō-dus), a. [< NL. æluropus (-pod-), adj., cat-footed: see Æluropus.] Cat-footed; having feet like a cat, that is, with sharp, retractile claws: opposed to cynopodous, or dog-footed, and specifically applied to the typical viverrine division of the family Viveridæ.

Æluropus (ē-lū'rō-pus), n. [NL., < Ælurus, q. v., + Gr. πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] A remarkable Æluropus melanoleucus.

genus of carnivorous quadrupeds of the arctoid series of the order Feræ, connecting the true bears with Ælurus and other genera. In the upper jaw they have 3 incisor, 1 canine, 4 premolar, and 2 molar teeth, and in the lower 3 incisors, 1 canine, 3 premolars, and 3 molars; the skull has a short facial portion, the bony palate not extending back of the teeth, an alisphenoid canal, an enormous sagittal crest, and zygomatic arches; the tail is very short, and the feet are less plantigrade and the soles more hairy than in the true bears. Æ. melanoleucus, of Tibet, the type and only species, is of the size of a small brown bear, of a whitish color, with black limbs, shoulders, ears, and eye-ring. Also written Ailuropus.

Ælurus (ē-lū'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. αἴλουρος, a cat, perhaps < αἰόλος, quick-moving, + οὐρά, tail. The early history of the domestic cat being involved in doubt (see cat), some identify the Gr. αἴλουρος with the ferret or polecat, Putorius furo, and others with the genet or civet-cat, a species of Viverra.] The typical genus of the family Æluridæ (which see), containing the wah or panda, Ælurus fulgens, of India. Also written Ailurus.

Æolian[1] (ē-ō'li-an), a. [< L. Æolius, < Gr. Αἰόλιος, Æolian, < Αἰολος, Æolus, the god of the winds: see Æolus.] 1. Pertaining to Æolus, the god of the winds in Greek mythology, and hence sometimes (with or without a capital) to the wind in general: as, the Æolian Isles (now the Lipari islands, north of Sicily), the fabled home of the god. Also written Eolian and Aiolian.

The breezes blur the fountain's glass,
And wake Æolian melodies.

T. B. Aldrich, Pampinea.

2. [l. c.] Due to atmospheric action; wind-blown: as, an æolian deposit: applied, in geol., to accumulations of detrital material, especially fine sand and loam, which have been carried to their present position by the wind. By far the most important deposit of this kind is the loess of northwestern China (see loess), and it was to designate this peculiar and most remarkable formation that the term æolian was applied in geology in place of subaërial (which see). Also written eolian.—Æolian attachment, a contrivance attached to a pianoforte, by which a stream of air can be thrown upon the wires, prolonging their vibration and greatly increasing the volume of sound.—Æolian harp or lyre, a stringed instrument that is caused to sound by the impulse of air. A common form is that of a box of thin fibrous wood, to which are attached a number of fine catgut strings, sometimes as many as fifteen, of equal length and tuned in unison, stretched on low bridges at each end. Its length is made to correspond with the size of the window or aperture in which it is intended to be placed. When the wind blows athwart the strings it produces the effect of an orchestra when heard at a distance, sweetly mingling all the harmonics, and swelling or diminishing the sounds according to the strength of the blast.

Æolian[2] (ē-ō'li-an), a. and n. [< L. Æolius, < Gr. Αἰόλιος, < Αἰολος, Æolus, the mythical founder of the Æolians, one of the sons of Hellen, reputed ancestor of all the Hellenes, > Gr. Αἰολεύς, an Æolian, pl. Αἰολεῖς, Αἰολῆς, > L. Æoles, the Æolians. See Æolian[1].] I. a. Pertaining to the branch of the Greek race named from Æolus, son of Hellen, or to Æolia or Æolis, a district of Asia Minor north of Ionia colonized by and named from them.

The Æolian colonies, attributed to Argive leaders, and established for the most part upon a narrow strip of land around the Eleatic Gulf, were also originally twelve in number. . . . To the Æolians Lesbos became by degrees a kind of metropolis; Mytilene is one of the principal seats of the older Greek civilization. It was precisely in these regions that the reminiscences of the Homeric epoch were preserved in the most vivid form; the Ionian Chios is the seat of the Homeridæ, who kept up the traditions of that time. L. von Ranke, Universal Hist., p. 130.

Æolian mode. (a) In Greek music, an octave-species or scale consisting of two Dorian tetrachords (taken downward), with an added step below, sounding much like a scale beginning on A on the keyboard and proceeding downward by the white keys only. Also and more accurately called hypodorian. (b) In Gregorian music, a scale (taken upward) in which the half-steps fall between the second and third and the fifth and sixth tones, being equivalent to an upward scale on the keyboard beginning with A and using white keys only. Also called the modus peregrinus. See mode, 7.

II. n. A member of one of the three great divisions of the ancient Greek race, the two other divisions being the Dorian and the Ionian. The inhabitants of Æolis, of part of Thessaly, of Bœotia and much of central Greece, of Arcadia, and other districts not Dorian or Ionian, were commonly accounted Æolians. The Acheans, when not spoken of as a distinct race of Greeks, were also included among the Æolians.

★ Also written Eolian and Aiolian.

Æolic (ē-ol'ik), a. and n. [< L. Æolicus, < Gr. Αἰολικός, of or pertaining to Æolis or the Æolians: see Æolian[2].] I. a. Pertaining to Æolis or Æolia, to the Æolians, or to Æolus, their mythical ancestor; Æolian: as, Æolic towns; the Æolic branch of the Greek race.

That Dicaiarchus was correct is proved by an examination of the peculiar position occupied by the traces of Aiolic influence in Homer. Amer. Jour. Philol., VII. 232.

Æolic dialect, one of the three great dialects or groups of subdialects of ancient Greek, the others being the Doric and Ionic. It was spoken in Æolis and many other Greek countries, and is important as the dialect used by the Lesbian poets Sappho, Alcæus, etc.

II. n. The language of the Æolians; the Æolian dialect of Greek.

Also written Eolic and Aiolic.

æolid, æolidid (ē'ō-lid, ē-ol'i-did), n. A member of the Æolidæ or Æolididæ.

Æolidæ (ē-ol'i-dē), n. pl. Same as Æolididæ.

Æolididæ (ē-ō-lid'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Æolis (-id-) + -idæ.] A family of nudibranchiate gastropodous mollusks, with diversiform gills placed on the sides of the back, and the tentacles retractile. They are active, and swim freely on their backs. In the genus Æolis (which see) the gills consist of an immense number of finger-like processes, forming tufts on each side of the body, some of which receive cæcal prolongations of the stomach and liver. Their papillæ possess the power of discharging, when the animal is irritated, a milky fluid, which, however, is harmless to the human skin. Also written Eolididæ, Æolidæ, Eolidæ.

Æolis coronata, dorsal view.

Æolidinæ (ē″ō-li-dī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Æolis (-id-) + -inæ.] A group of mollusks. See Æolididæ. Also written Eolidinæ.

★æolina (ē-ō-lī′nä), n. [< L. Æolus, < Gr. Αἰολος, the god of the winds: see Æolus.] A small free-reed musical instrument, the precursor of the accordion and concertina (which see), invented by Wheatstone about 1829.

★æolipile (ē′ō-li-pīl or ē-ol′i-pīl), n. [Æoli pilæ (pylæ, Gr. πύλαι, gates?), 'balls of Æolus.'] An instrument illustrating the expansive force of steam generated in a closed vessel, and escaping by a narrow aperture, said to have been invented by Hero of Alexandria in the second century B. C. It consisted of a hollow ball containing water and two arms bent in opposite directions, from the narrow apertures of which steam issued with such reduction of pressure that the unbalanced pressure opposite to the hole caused the ball to rotate. Several attempts have been made to apply the principle of the æolipile to rotating machinery. Ely's æolipile is used for rotating a toy. It consists of a boiler, with an arm through which the steam is permitted to escape, placed upon a central upright pivot, and connected by a band with the drum of the toy to be rotated. Also spelled eolipile and (by mistake) eolipyle.

Ely's Æolipile.

Æolis (ē′ō-lis), n. [NL. (like L. Æolis, Gr. Αἰολίς (-ιδ-), name of a country), < αἰόλος, quick-moving, nimble, rapid, changeable.] The typical genus of the family Æolididæ (which see). Also spelled Eolis, as originally by Cuvier, 1798.

Æolism (ē′ō-lizm), n. [< Gr. Αἰολισμός*, < Αἰολίζειν, imitate the Æolians: see Æolic and -ism.] A peculiarity of the Æolic dialect, or such peculiarities collectively. Sometimes written Aiolism.

First must be eliminated from the so-called Æolisms all phenomena which, so far from deserving the name of Æolisms, do not so much as occur in Æolic.
Amer. Jour. of Philol., V. 521.

Æolist (ē′ō-list), n. [< L. Æolus, the god of the winds, + -ist.] A pretender to inspiration: so called humorously by Swift ("Tale of a Tub," viii.), as deriving all things from wind (that is, the breath of inspiration).

æolotropic (ē″ō-lō-trop′ik), a. and n. [< æolotropy + -ic.] I. a. In phys., not having the same properties in all directions; non-isotropic; anisotropic: said of a body with reference to elasticity or the action upon it of light, heat, etc.

An individual body, or the substance of a homogeneous solid, may be isotropic in one quality or class of qualities, but æolotropic in others.
Thomson and Tait, Nat. Phil., I. § 677.

II. n. A non-isotropic substance, or one having different properties in different directions, as a biaxial crystal.

æolotropy (ē-ō-lot′rō-pi), n. [< Gr. αἰόλος, changeful, + -τροπία, < τρέπειν, turn.] In phys., the state or quality of being æolotropic; the opposite of isotropy (which see); anisotropy.

In the case of a sphere, the tendency to set in a uniform [magnetic] field is wholly dependent on the æolotropy of the sphere. Encyc. Brit., XV. 245.

Æolus (ē′ō-lus), n. [L., < Gr. Αἰολος, the god of the winds, lit. the rapid or the changeable, < αἰόλος, quick-moving, rapid, glancing, changing, changeable.] 1. In classical myth., the god and ruler of the winds, which at his will he set free or held prisoners in a hollow mountain.—2. [l. c.] An apparatus for renewing the air in rooms. —3. A genus of coleopterous insects. Eschscholtz, 1829.

æon, æonian, etc. See eon, eonian, etc.

Æpus (ē′pus), n. Same as Æpys.

Æpyornis (ē-pi-ôr′nis), n. [NL., < Gr. αἰπύς, high, + ὄρνις, a bird.] A genus of gigantic fossil birds found in Madagascar. One species is named Æpyornis maximus. It was 3-toed like Dinornis, of similar enormous stature, and is one of the largest known birds. The egg was some 12 or 14 inches long, and of the capacity of 6 ostrich-eggs or about 12 dozen hen-eggs. The remains are found in very recent deposits, and the bird was probably contemporary with the moa. Æpyornis is the type of a family Æpyornithidæ, related to the rheas, cassowaries, and emus. Sometimes spelled Epyornis, and even Epiornis; the latter is wholly inadmissible.

Æpyornithes (ē-pi-ôr′ni-thēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Æpyornis (-nith-).] A superfamily group, made an order by Newton, of gigantic extinct struthious birds, based upon the Æpyornithidæ (which see).

Æpyornithidæ (ē-pi-ôr-nith′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Æpyornis (-nith-) + -idæ.] A family of birds represented by the genus Æpyornis (which see).

Æpyprymnus (ē-pi-prim′nus), n. [NL., < Gr. αἰπύς, high, steep, + πρύμνα, stern.] A notable genus of kangaroo-rats of comparatively large size, and otherwise resembling the hare-kangaroos, Lagorchestes. The type is Æ. rufescens, the red potoroo of New South Wales. A. H. Garrod, 1875.

Æpys (ē′pis), n. [NL., < Gr. αἰπύς, also αἰπός, high, steep.] A genus of adephagous beetles, of the family Carabidæ, the larvæ of which have but one claw on each foot. Also written Æpus.

æqualiflorous, a. See equaliflorous.

æquisonance, æquisonant. See equisonance, equisonant.

Æquivalvia (ē-kwi-val′vi-ä), n. pl. [NL., < L. æquus, equal, + valva, door (valve).] 1. In Lamarck's classification, 1801, one of two divisions of his conchiferous Acephalæa, containing the equivalve bivalves: opposed to Inæquivalvia.—2. In Latreille's classification, 1825, one of two divisions of pedunculate Brachiopoda (the other being Inæquivalvia), represented by the genus Lingula. See cut under Lingulidæ.

Æquorea (ē-kwō′rē-ä), n. [NL., fem. of L. æquoreus, of the sea: see æquoreal.] A genus of medusæ, type of the family Æquoreidæ (which see). Æ. cyanea is an example.

æquoreal (ē-kwō′rē-al), a. [< L. æquoreus, of the sea, < æquor, level, even surface, esp. a calm, smooth sea, < æquus, even, equal: see equal.] Of or pertaining to the sea; marine; oceanic: specifically used in the name of a fish, the æquoreal pipe-fish, Nerophis æquoreus. Yarrell.

Æquoreidæ, Æquoridæ (ē-kwō-rē′i-dē, ē-kwôr′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Æquorea + -idæ.] A family of Hydromedusæ, represented by the genus Æquorea, with numerous radial vessels and marginal tentacles. The family is related to the campanularians and sertularians, and pertains to an order Calyptoblastea, or to a suborder Campanulariæ of Hydromedusæ. They attain a large size, being a foot or more in diameter. The family was founded by Eschscholtz in 1829.

aër (ā′ėr), n. [L., < Gr. ἀήρ, air: see air[1].] 1. (a) Ordinary air of the atmosphere. (b) Some kind of air, as a gas. [Formerly a common term in chemistry and physics, now rare or obsolete.]—2. In the Hellenic branch of the Eastern Church, the third or outermost of the veils placed over the sacrament. See air[1], n., 7.—Aër perflabilis (L., air blowing through), open air.

Open air, which they call aër perflabilis.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 331.

æra, n. See era.

æraria, n. Plural of ærarium.

ærarian (ē-rā′ri-an), a. and n. [< L. ærarius, monetary, fiscal, ærarius, n. (sc. civis), an ærarian, < æs (ær-), bronze, money: see æs.] I. a. In Rom. hist., of or pertaining to the ærarium or Roman treasury; fiscal: as, the ærarian prefects.

II. n. One of the lowest class of Roman citizens, who paid only a poll-tax and had no right to vote. To this class the censors could degrade citizens of any higher rank who had committed heinous crimes.

ærarium (ē-rā′ri-um), n.; pl. æraria (-ä). [L., neut. of ærarius, of or pertaining to money: see ærarian.] Among the Romans, a place where public money was deposited; the public treasury.

★aërate (ā′ė-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. aërated, ppr. aërating. [< L. aër, air (see air[1]), + -ate[2].] 1. To expose to the free action of the air.—2. To cause to mix with carbonic-acid or other gas.—3. In physiol., to change the circulating fluids of, as animals, by the agency of the air; arterialize.—Aërated bread, bread baked from dough into which carbonic-acid gas has been forced mechanically, instead of being set free within its substance by fermentation of yeast or decomposition of baking-powder.—Aërated waters, a term applied to a variety of acidulous and alkaline beverages, more or less impregnated with carbonic-acid gas, which renders them sparkling and effervescent. The most common, carbonic-acid water (usually called soda-water, because it was formerly an official preparation and contained sodium carbonate), is made on a large scale by pouring dilute sulphuric acid on carbonate of lime, marble, or chalk. Carbonic-acid gas is evolved, which is either forced into water at once by its own tension as it is evolved, or received in a reservoir and afterward forced into water by a pump. A small quantity of ginger or capsicum-extract and sugar, placed in bottles before filling with this water, converts the solution into gingerade or ginger ale, while essence of lemon, citric acid, and sugar mixed in the same way form lemonade. All water from natural springs is aërated; and the flat, mawkish taste of freshly boiled water is due to the absence of air and carbonic acid.—Aërating filter, a water-filter in which the water as it descends falls into a closed chamber, displacing the contained air, which, passing upward through the filtering material, aërates the water in its passage.

aëration (ā-ē-rā′shọn), n. [< aërate.] 1. The act of airing or of exposing to the action of the air: as, the aëration of soil by plowing, harrowing, etc.—2. The act or operation of mixing or saturating with a gas, as carbonic-acid gas or common air.—3. In physiol., the arterialization of the venous blood by respiration in the higher animals, and by corresponding processes in the lower animals.

The taking in of food by a polype is at intervals now short, now very long, as circumstances determine; . . . while such aëration as is effected is similarly without a trace of rhythm. H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 28.

aërator (ā′ė-rā-tọr), n. [< aërate, as if L. aërator*.] 1. A blower; a contrivance for fumigating wheat and other grain, to bleach it and destroy fungi and insects.—2. An apparatus for forcing air or carbonic-acid gas into water or other liquids. The most simple form is a mechanical device for pumping air into water, or a spray for bringing water into contact with air. More complicated forms employ chemicals to secure the formation of carbonic-acid gas in water or liquors, or elaborate machinery for forcing the gas into vessels containing the liquid, and for producing the proper mixture by agitating the latter in presence of the gas under pressure.

Cameron's Aërator.

a, gas-generator; b, b, and m, m, m, agitators; c, stuffing-box; e, acid-holder; f, conical plug; g, d, s, leaden pipes; h, stuffing-box; k, pin; l, bridle; n, nut; o, intermediate vessel; t, pressure-gage; v, impregnator.

aërial (ā-ē′ri-al), a. [Formerly also aëreal, < L. aërius (= Gr. ἀέριος), also aëreus, pertaining to the air, < aër, < Gr. ἀήρ: see air[1].] 1. Belonging or pertaining to the air or atmosphere; inhabiting or frequenting the air; existing or happening in the air; produced by or in the air: as, aërial regions; aërial perspective; aërial songsters; aërial ascents.

Even till we make the main, and the aërial blue,
An indistinct regard. Shak., Othello, ii. 1.

Aërial honey and ambrosial dews.
Dryden, Virgil's Georgics.

2. Consisting of air; partaking of the nature of air; airy; hence, unsubstantial; visionary: as, aërial beings; aërial fancies; an aërial castle.

Fays, fairies, genii, elves, and dæmons, hear:
Ye know the spheres and various tasks assign'd
By laws eternal to the aërial kind.
Pope, R. of the L., ii. 76.

The next who follows . . . has to build his own cloud-castle as if it were the first aërial edifice that a human soul had ever constructed. O. W. Holmes, Emerson, xvi.

3. Reaching far into the air; high; lofty; elevated: as, aërial spires; an aërial flight.

The aërial mountains which pour down
Indus and Oxus from their icy caves. Shelley, Alastor.

4. Possessed of a light and graceful beauty; ethereal.

Some music is above me; most music is beneath me. I like Beethoven and Mozart—or else some of the aërial compositions of the older Italians. Coleridge, Table-Talk.

The light aërial gallery, golden-rail'd,
Burnt like a fringe of fire.
Tennyson, Palace of Art.

5. In bot., growing in the air, and independently of the soil, as epiphytes, or the adventitious roots of some trees: as, aërial orchids or roots.

Aërial Roots of the Banian (Ficus Indica).

Aërial acid, an old name for carbonic-acid gas, from a belief that it entered into the composition of atmospheric air.—Aërial birds (Aves aëriæ), birds which habitually move chiefly by flight, as distinguished from walking, wading, and swimming birds.—Aërial car, a car used for traveling in the air; specifically, the basket of a balloon, or a car designed for an aërial railway.—Aërial figures, figures by which painters seek to represent the fabled inhabitants of the air, as demons, genii, gnomes, etc.—Aërial gills, the wings of insects. Oken.—Aërial image, an image caused by the convergence of rays of light reflected or refracted from objects through strata of air of different densities, the image appearing suspended in the air, as the different kinds of mirage; also, an image perceived by looking into or toward a concave mirror. See mirage.—Aërial mammals, the bats. W. H. Flower.—Aërial navigation. See navigation.—Aërial perspective. See perspective.—Aërial photography, photography by means of cameras supported at a considerable height above the ground by kites or balloons.—Aërial poison. Same as miasma.—Aërial railway. (a) A proposed system of wires for guiding balloons. (b) A name sometimes applied to systems of transportation by cars suspended from a rail or rope above them.—Aërial rocks. Same as æolian rocks. See Æolian[1], 2.—Aërial telegraphy, a method of telegraphing by means of kites.—Aërial tints, in painting, tints or modifications of color by which the expression of distance is attained.=Syn. Airy, Aërial. See airy[1].

aëriality (ā-ē-ri-al'i-ti), n. [< aërial + -ity.] Unsubstantiality; airiness.

> The mere aëriality of the entire speculation.
> De Quincey, Murder, Postscript.

aërially (ā-ē'ri-al-i), adv. In an aërial manner; so as to resemble air or the atmosphere; ethereally.

> Your eyes
> Touch'd with a somewhat darker hue,
> And less aërially blue. Tennyson, Margaret.

aërialness (ā-ē'ri-al-nes), n. The quality of being aërial or airy.

aërian[1] (ā-ē'ri-an), a. [< L. aërius: see aërial.] Aërial; of or belonging to the air; produced or existing in the atmosphere.

> In the flasks which are altered by these aërian spores, there rarely is perceived that nauseating cadaveric odor of intense putrefaction. Science, III. 520.

Aërian[2] (ā-ē'ri-an), n. [< LL. Aëriani, pl., < Aërius, a proper name.] A member of a reforming sect of the fourth century, so called from their leader Aërius, a presbyter of Sebastia in Pontus, who separated from the church about A. D. 360. They maintained that a presbyter or elder does not differ from a bishop in authority, repudiated prayers for the dead, and rejected church fasts.

Aërides (ā-er'i-dēz), n. [NL., < L. aër, air, + -ides.] A genus of epiphytal orchidaceous plants. These plants have distichous leaves, and large, bright-colored, sweet-scented flowers. They are natives of the warmer parts of Asia, and are extensively cultivated in hothouses.

aerie[1]†, a. See aery[1].

aerie[2], n. and v. See aery[2].

aërifaction (ā″ē-ri-fak'shon), n. [< aërify: see -faction.] The action of aërifying; aërification. N. E. D.

aëriferous (ā-ē-rif'ē-rus), a. [< L. aër, air, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Conveying air, as the tracheæ and bronchial tubes of air-breathing vertebrates or the tracheæ of insects.

aërification (ā″ē-ri-fi-kā'shon), n. [< aërify: see -fication.] 1. The act of combining anything with air; the state of being filled with air.—2. The act of becoming air, or of changing into an aëriform state, as substances which are converted from a liquid or solid form into gas or an elastic vapor; the state of being aëriform.

aëriform (ā'ē-ri-fôrm), a. [< L. aër, air, + -formis, < forma, form.] 1. Having the form or nature of air, or of an elastic invisible fluid; gaseous. The gases are aëriform fluids.—2. Figuratively, unsubstantial; unreal. Carlyle.

aërify (ā'ē-ri-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. aërified, ppr. aërifying. [< L. aër, air, + -ficare, < facere, make: see -fy.] 1. To infuse air into; fill with air, or combine air with.—2. To change into an aëriform state.

aëro-. [NL., etc., < Gr. ἀερο- (ἀερ-), combining form of ἀήρ, L. aër, air: see air[1].] The first element in many compound words of Greek origin, meaning air, the air, atmosphere.

aërobate (ā'ē-rō-bāt), v. i. [< Gr. ἀεροβατεῖν, < ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + βατεῖν, tread.] To walk (as if) on the air. [Rare.] N. E. D.

aërobe (ā'ē-rōb), n. One of the aërobia.

aërobia (ā-ē-rō'bi-ạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of ★aërobius, < Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + βιος, life.] A name given by Pasteur (in the French form, aérobies) to those bacteria which are able to live in contact with the air, and which absorb oxygen from it: opposed to anaërobia.

aërobian (ā-ē-rō'bi-ạn), a. Relating to or characteristic of aërobia (which see); dependent upon air for life. An equivalent form is aërobious.

★aërobic (ā-ē-rō'bik), a. Same as aërobian.

aërobiosis (ā″ē-rō-bī-ō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + βίωσις, way of life, < βιόειν, live, < βίος, life.] Life in and by means of an atmosphere containing oxygen.

aërobiotic (ā″ē-rō-bī-ot'ik), a. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + βιωτικός, pertaining to life, < βιόειν, live: see aërobiosis.] Of or pertaining to aërobiosis; living on atmospheric oxygen: as, aërobiotic forms in fermentation.

aërobious (ā-ē-rō'bi-us), a. [< NL. aërobius: see aërobia.] Same as aërobian. Pasteur, Fermentation (trans.), p. 210.

Aërobranchia (ā″ē-rō-brang'ki-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + βράγχια, gills.] A subclass or "grade" of Arachnida, composed of Scorpionina, Pedipalpi, and Araneida, or true scorpions, whip-scorpions, and spiders; one of three groups, the other two being Hematobranchia and Lipobranchia. E. R. Lankester, 1881.

aërobranchiate (ā″ē-rō-brang'ki-āt), a. Pertaining to the Aërobranchia.

aëroclinoscope (ā″ē-rō-klī'nō-skōp), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + κλίνειν, bend, incline, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An apparatus devised by Buys Ballot to indicate the probable location of a storm-center and the direction of the storm-wind. It consists of a vertical post supporting two horizontal bars, one of which shows the direction of the barometric gradient and the other the predicted direction of the wind.

aërocyst (ā'ē-rō-sist), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + κύστις, bladder: see cyst.] In bot., the air-vessel or bladder by means of which many algæ, as Fucus vesiculosus, are supported in the water, and oceanic species, as the gulfweed, float on the surface. See cut under air-cell.

aërodynamic (ā″ē-rō-dī-nam'ik), a. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + dynamic, q. v.] Relating or pertaining to the air or other gases in motion.

aërodynamics (ā″ē-rō-dī-nam'iks), n. [Pl. of aërodynamic: see dynamics.] The science which treats of the motion of the air and other gases, or of their properties and mechanical effects when in motion.

aërognosy (ā-ē-rog'nō-si), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + γνῶσις, knowledge.] Same as aërology. [Rare.]

aërographer (ā-ē-rog'ra-fėr), n. One who describes the atmosphere.

aërographic (ā″ē-rō-graf'ik), a. Pertaining to aërography.

aërographical (ā″ē-rō-graf'i-kal), a. Same as aërographic.

aërography (ā-ē-rog'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write, describe.] Description of the air or atmosphere.

aërohydrodynamic (ā″ē-rō-hī″drō-dī-nam'ik), a. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + hydrodynamic.] Acting by the power of air in water.—Aërohydrodynamic wheel, an apparatus for transmitting power to a distance, proposed by M. Calles, a Belgian engineer. The operation consists in conducting condensed air through a tube, and discharging it into the curved buckets of a cogged wheel submerged in water in such a manner as to turn the wheel by its ascensional force.

aërohydrous (ā″ē-rō-hī'drus), a. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + ὕδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + -ous.] Composed of or containing air and water: specifically applied to minerals which contain water in their cavities. Craig.

aërolite (ā'ē-rō-līt), n. [The more common form of aërolith: see -lite and -lith.] A body falling through the atmosphere to the earth from outer space; a meteorite; properly, a meteoric stone. See meteorite.

aërolith (ā'ē-rō-lith), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + λίθος, stone.] Same as aërolite.

aërolithology (ā″ē-rō-li-thol'ō-ji), n. [< aërolith + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That department of science which treats of aërolites.

aërolitic (ā″ē-rō-lit'ik), a. Relating to aërolites.

aërologic, aërological (ā″ē-rō-loj'ik, -i-kal), a. Pertaining to aërology.

aërologist (ā-ē-rol'ō-jist), n. One who is versed in aërology.

aërology (ā-ē-rol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That branch of physics which treats of the air, its properties and phenomena. Also called aërognosy.

aëromancer (ā'ē-rō-man″sėr), n. [< ME. ayeromauncer; < aëromancy + -er[1].] One who practises aëromancy.

aëromancy (ā'ē-rō-man″si), n. [< ME. aeromancye, aeromaunce, < OF. ★aeromancie, aeromantie (Cotgrave), mod. F. aéromancie, < LL. aëromantia, < LGr. ἀερομαντεία (Harper's Lat. Dict.), < Gr. ἀήρ, air, + μαντεία, divination, < μαντεύεσθαι, divine, prophesy, < μάντις, prophet.] Divination by means of the air and winds or atmospheric phenomena: now sometimes used to denote the practice of forecasting changes in the weather.

aëromantic (ā″ē-rō-man'tik), a. Pertaining to or of the nature of aëromancy.

aërometer (ā-ē-rom'e-tėr), n. [< NL. aërometrum, < Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + μέτρον, measure. Cf. Gr. ἀερομετρεῖν, measure the air.] An instrument for weighing air, or for ascertaining the density of air and other fluids.—Barometrical aërometer, an instrument consisting of a vertical U-tube with open ends and mounted upon a stand, used in measuring the relative specific gravities of liquids. Thus, if water is poured into one branch of the tube and oil into the other, and if it is found that 9 inches of water balance 10 inches of oil, it indicates that their relative specific gravities are as 10 to 9.

aërometric (ā″ē-rō-met'rik), a. Of or pertaining to aërometry.

aërometry (ā-ē-rom'e-tri), n. [= F. aérométrie, < NL. aërometria, < aërometrum: see aërometer.] The science of measuring mass, density, and other physical constants of air and other fluids, and of determining the relations of their pressure, volume, and temperature.

aëronaut (ā'ē-rō-nât), n. [< F. aéronaute, < Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + ναύτης (= L. nauta), sailor, < ναῦς = L. navis, ship: see nautical.] One who sails or floats in the air; an aërial navigator; a balloonist.

aëronautic, aëronautical (ā″ē-rō-nâ'tik, -ti-kal), a. Pertaining to aëronautics or aërial sailing.

aëronautics (ā″ē-rō-nâ'tiks), n. [Pl. of aëronautic: see -ics.] The science or art of aërial navigation, as by means of a balloon, gliding-machine, or aëroplane.

aëronautism (ā'ē-rō-nâ″tizm), n. [< aëronaut + -ism.] The practice of ascending and floating in the atmosphere, as in balloons.

aërophane (ā'ē-rō-fān), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + -φανής, appearing, < φαίνειν, show.] A light gauze or imitation of crape. E. H. Knight.

aërophobia (ā″ē-rō-fō'bi-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀερο-φόβος, afraid of air, < ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + -φόβος, fearing: see -phobia.] A dread of air, that is, of a current of air; a symptom common in hydrophobia, and occasionally observed in hysteria and other diseases.

aërophoby (ā'ē-rō-fō″bi), n. Aërophobia.

aërophone (ā'ē-rō-phōn), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), ★air, + φωνή, voice, sound.] An apparatus invented by Edison for increasing the intensity (amplitude) of sound-waves, as those from spoken words.

★aërophore (ā'ē-rō-fōr), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].] A respirator in the form of a tank, into which the air exhaled from the lungs passes, and which contains chemicals designed to revive it and fit it to be breathed again. It is carried on the back like a knapsack, and was contrived for the use of firemen in entering burning buildings, etc. See respirator.

aërophyte (ā'ē-rō-fīt), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + φυτόν, a plant, < φύειν, produce.] A plant which lives exclusively in air, absorbing all its nourishment from it alone, as some orchids and many Bromeliaceæ; an air-plant. See epiphyte.

★aëroplane[1] (ā'ē-rō-plān), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + plane, q. v.] A light framework, either plane or somewhat concave, covered on its under side with a fabric, used in flying-machines and aërostatical experiments. When the machine is driven through the air, the aeroplane, set at an angle of about 7° above the horizontal, tends to support it by the upward reaction of the still air. See the supplement.

★aëroplane[2] (ā'ē-rō-plān), n. [= F. aéroplane, < Gr. ἀερόπλανος, wandering in air, < ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + πλάνος, wandering: see planet.] A flying-machine invented by Victor Tatin and successfully tried at the French experiment-station of Chalais-Meudon in 1879. It consists of a cylindrical receiver for compressed air used to drive two air-propellers, two laterally extended wings, and a tail for steering. The velocity obtained was 8 meters per second.

aëroscepsy (ā'ē-rō-skep″si), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + σκέψις, a viewing, perception, < σκέπτεσθαι, look at, watch: see sceptic, skeptic.] In zoöl., ability to perceive the state of the atmosphere; such susceptibility to atmospheric conditions as various animals (insects and snails, for example) are supposed to possess; the sense of aëroscopy; the faculty of exercising aëroscopy instinctively. It is considered by some zoölogists to be a function of the antennæ, these being organs by means of which such animals may practise aëroscopy (which see). [Aëroscepsy and aëroscopy are often used as synonymous by zoölogists; but the distinction here indicated is convenient, and agreeable to their difference of formation.]

aëroscope (ā″ē-rō-skōp), n. [< Gr. ἀεροσκόπος*: see aëroscopy.] An apparatus for collecting microscopic objects from the air. It consists of an inspirator and a glass collecting-vessel smeared with glycerin. When air is drawn through it the fine dust sticks to the film of glycerin.

aëroscopic (ā″ē-rō-skop′ik), a. Pertaining to or exercising aëroscopy.

aëroscopy (ā-ē-ros′kō-pi), n. [< Gr. ἀεροσκοπία, divination by observing the heavens, < ἀεροσκόπος*, observing the heavens, < ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + σκοπεῖν, observe, look at.] 1†. Divination by means of the air; weather-prophecy. —2. Examination or observation of the atmosphere; the practice of meteorology. —3. In zoöl., perception or observation of atmospheric conditions, as by insects and snails; the instinctive exercise of aëroscopy; the operation or result of the faculty of aëroscopsy. See aëroscopsy.

aërose (ē′rōs), a. [< L. ærosus, full of copper, < æs (ær-), copper: see æs.] Having the nature of or resembling copper or brass; coppery. Also spelled erose.

aërosiderite (ā″ē-rō-sid′ē-rīt), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + σιδηρίτης, of iron: see siderite.] A meteorite consisting essentially of metallic iron. See meteorite.

aërosiderolite (ā″ē-rō-si-dē′rō-līt), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + σίδηρος, iron, + λίθος, stone.] A meteorite containing both stone and iron. See meteorite.

★aërosphere (ā′ē-rō-sfēr), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + σφαῖρα, sphere.] The body of air surrounding the earth; the aërial globe; the entire atmosphere.

★aërostat (ā′ē-rō-stat), n. [< F. aérostat, < Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + στατός, placed, standing, verbal adj. of ἱ-στά-ναι, place, cause to stand: see static.] 1. A machine or vessel sustaining weights in the air; a balloon; a flying-machine.

The aërostat was brought down in the very meadow whence it had set off. Science, IV. 330.

2. An aëronaut; a balloonist. [Rare and incorrect.]

aërostatic, aërostatical (ā″ē-rō-stat′ik, -i-kal), a. [= F. aérostatique, < Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + στατικός, causing to stand, < στατός, standing: see aërostat and static.] 1. Pertaining to aërostatics. —2. Pertaining to aërostation, or the art of aërial navigation.

A memorable event in the history of aërostatic science. The American, VIII. 317.

Aërostatic balance, an instrument, constructed on the same principle as the barometer, for ascertaining the weight of the air.

aërostatics (ā″ē-rō-stat′iks), n. [Pl. of aërostatic: see -ics.] The science which treats of the weight, pressure, and equilibrium of air and other elastic fluids, and of the equilibrium of bodies sustained in them.

aërostation (ā″ē-rō-stā′shon), n. [< F. aérostation, improp. < aérostat, aërostat, in imitation of words in -ation, like station, etc.] 1. The art or practice of aërial navigation; the science of raising, suspending, and guiding machines in the air, or of ascending in balloons. —2†. The science of aërostatics.

aërotherapeutics (ā″ē-rō-ther-a-pū′tiks), n. [< Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + θεραπευτικός.] A mode of treating disease by varying the pressure or modifying the composition of the air surrounding the patient.

aërothermal (ā″ē-rō-thėr′mal), a. Pertaining to or using hot air: as, Mouchot's aërothermal bakery, that is, a bakery in which the baking is effected by heated air. Ure, Dict., I. 487.

aërotonometer (ā″ē-rō-tō-nom′e-tėr), n. [< Gr. ἀερότονος, stretched or driven by air (< ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + τείνειν, stretch), + μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for determining the tension of gases in the blood.

★aërotropism (ā-ē-rot′rō-pizm), n. [< NL. aërotropismus, < Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, + -τροπος, < τρέπειν, turn, + -ism.] In bot., deviation from the normal direction of growth by the action of gases: applied chiefly to roots.

ærugineous† (ē-rō-jin′ē-us), a. Same as æruginous. Bailey.

æruginous (ē-rō′ji-nus), a. [< L. æruginosus, < ærugo (ærugin-), rust of copper: see ærugo.] 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of verdigris or the rust of copper.

A . . . kind of salt drawn out of ferreous and æruginous earths, partaking chiefly of iron and copper. Sir T. Browne.

2. Of the color of verdigris.

Also spelled eruginous.

ærugo (ē-rō′gō), n. [L., rust of copper, verdigris prepared from it, < æs (ær-), copper, bronze: see æs.] Verdigris (which see). —Ærugo nobilis (noble verdigris), or simply ærugo, a greenish crust found on antique bronzes; the patina. See patina.

aery[1] (ā′ri, ā′ėr-i), a. [Early mod. E. aerie; for airy, with forced spelling, in imitation of L. aëreus, aërius, airy, aërial: see airy[1], aërial.] Airy; breezy; exposed to the air; elevated; lofty; ethereal; visionary. [Rare and poetical.]

The shepherd's pipe came clear from aery steep. Keats.

Whence that aery bloom of thine,
Like a lily which the sun
Looks thro' in his sad decline?
Tennyson, Adeline.

aery[2], aerie[2] (ā′ri, ā′ri, ā′ė-ri, or ē′ri: see etym., at end), n.; pl. aeries (-riz). [Also written airy, eyry, eyrie, and in early mod. E. airie, aiery, ayry, ayery, eyery, eyerie, etc., a lengthened form (with added syllable -y or -ie after E. airy[1], a., or the ML. form aërea) of early mod. E. aire, ayre, < ME. aire*, eyre, oldest form air, an aery (rare, and found only in the phrase hauke of noble air (var. nobulle eyre), after OF. faucon de gentil or bon aire, i. e., a hawk of noble or good stock: see under debonair), < OF. "aire, m., an airie or nest of hawkes" (Cotgrave), OF. also f., mod. F. aire, f., = Pr. aire, < ML. area, aria, aerea, aeria, the nest of a bird of prey; of uncertain origin, but prob. only a special use of the common L. area, also written aria, an open space, floor, area, the spellings aerea, aeria, being due to a supposed connection with L. aëreus, aërius, aërial, airy, such nests being built in lofty places. Owing to its poetical associations, and to confused notions as to its origin, this word has suffered unusual changes of spelling and pronunciation. The reg. mod. form, repr. ME. aire*, air, eyre, would be air* (pron. ār), or, with the added syllable, airy (pron. ā′ri). The mod. spelling aery or aerie is in imitation of the ML. aërea, aëria; cf. aery[1], a., for airy[1], a., after L. aëreus, aërius. The spelling eyry, eyrie does not follow from the ME. form eyre (which would give air*, as said above), but is a 17th century archaistic simulation of ME. ey, egg. The word not being in current popular use, the pronunciation, prop. ā′ri in all spellings, has varied with the spelling; the form aery or aerie is also pron. ā′ri or ā′ė-ri, while many dictionaries, following Walker, give as the exclusive or as an alternative pronunciation ē′ri, a purely pedantic pronunciation, due to mistaking the ae- for the diphthong æ or œ. Similarly, the form eyry or eyrie, pron. usually like aery or aerie, is in present usage sometimes pron. ī′ri.] 1. The nest of a bird of prey, as an eagle or a hawk; hence, a lofty nest of any large bird.

There the eagle and the stork
On cliffs and cedar-tops their eyries build.
Milton, P. L., vii. 424.

2. The brood in the nest; the young of a bird of prey; figuratively, children.

Glo. Our aiery buildeth in the cedar's top. . . .
Q. Mar. Your aiery buildeth in our aiery's nest.
Shak., Rich. III., i. 3.

3. An elevated habitation or situation.

Wherever beauty dwell,
In gulf or aerie, mountain or deep dell.
Keats, Endymion, ii. 94.

These men had from their eyrie seen us go up the glacier. F. Jacomb, in P. P. and Gl., 2d ser., I. 328. (N. E. D.) aery[2], aerie[2] (ā′ri: see etym. of aery[2], n., at end), v. i. [< aery[2], n.] To build or have an aery.

She [Pilhannaw, a monstrous great bird] aeries in the woods upon the high hills of Ossapy.
Josselyn, New England's Rarities (1672), p. 41.

aery-light (ā′ri-līt), a. [< aery[1] + light[2].] Light as air. Milton.

æs (ēz), n. [L. æs (ær-), prop. ore, but applied chiefly to copper, or the alloy of copper and tin (and sometimes lead), bronze; hence, anything made of copper or bronze; in particular, coins, money; = Goth. ais = AS. ār, E. ore: see ore[1].] In Rom. antiq., copper or bronze; money or coins of copper or bronze; money in general; works of art or other objects made of bronze. See copper and bronze. —Æs Corinthium, Corinthian bronze: the various alloys and art-works in bronze produced at Corinth had a very high reputation in the ancient world, particularly among the Romans. —Æs Cyprium (literally, Cyprian ore or metal: see copper), copper. —Æs grave (see grave[3]), a general term applied to the large, heavy bronze coins of the libral system, first issued in Italy by the Romans and other communities toward the end of the fifth century B. C. The Roman as is the most familiar example. —Æs rude (see rude), the first Roman money, consisting of rude masses of copper, uncoined, of regular weights varying from two pounds to two ounces. —Æs signatum (stamped bronze), the first Roman expedient toward securing a regular coinage, legally sanctioned as early as 454 B. C. The pieces are approximately rectangular in shape, bearing on each side, in relief, a rude figure, as of a bull, a boar, or an elephant, and weigh about five pounds each. For smaller values the pieces were cut into fragments, and the æs rude also remained in use. The æs signatum continued to be employed for some time after a more advanced system of coinage had been adopted.

Æsalidæ (ē-sal′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Æsalus + -idæ.] A family of lamellicorn coleopterous insects, based by Macleay (1819) upon the genus Æsalus. See Lucanidæ.

æsalon (ē′sa-lon), n. [NL., < Gr. αἰσάλων, a small kind of hawk, prob. the merlin.] 1. An old name of the merlin, Falco æsalon or Æsalon regulus. See merlin. —2. [cap.] A genus of falcons (Brisson, 1760): formerly used in a broad sense, later restricted to the small species related to the merlin. Æ. columbarius is the common pigeon-hawk of North America. See pigeon-hawk.

Æsalus (ē′sa-lus), n. [NL. Cf. æsalon.] The typical genus of Æsalidæ, based by Fabricius (1801) upon Æ. scarabæoides, a European lamellicorn beetle with subquadrate body, unarmed head, 3-jointed antennæ, and short tarsi, now referred to Lucanidæ.

Æschna (esk′nä), n. [NL. (first Æshna, Fabricius, 1776), prob. an error for æschra* (fem.; cf. Æschrus, m., a genus of neuropters), < Gr. αἰσχρός, ugly, ill-favored.] A genus of insects, of aquatic larval habits, belonging to the order Odonata, referred to the family Libellulidæ or made the type of a separate family Æschnidæ. There are several species, all known as dragon-flies. Sometimes wrongly written Æshna.

Æschnidæ (esk′ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Æschna + -idæ.] A family of neuropterous insects, founded on the genus Æschna, having the wings unequal, the triangles of all the wings alike, male genitals with connate anterior hamule and conjoined penis and vesicle, and female genitals exposed.

Æschylean (es-ki-lē′an), a. [< L. Æschylus, < Gr. Αἰσχύλος, orig. a nickname, 'Little Ugly,' dim. of αἰσχρός, ugly, ill-favored; in a moral sense, base, shameful; < αἶσχος, ugliness, shame, disgrace.] Written by or pertaining to Æschylus, an illustrious Athenian poet and dramatist, born 525 B. C.; resembling his writings or characteristic of them.

Æschynanthus (es-ki-nan′thus), n. [NL., < Gr. αἰσχύνη, shame (< αἰσχύνεσθαι, be ashamed), + ἄνθος, a flower. The name has reference to the crimson or scarlet ('blushing') flowers. The species have been called blushworts.] A genus of beautiful epiphytal plants, natives of tropical Asia, of the family Gesneriaceæ, with pendent stems and scarlet or orange flowers. They are among the most splendid hothouse flowers.

æschynite (es′ki-nīt), n. [< Gr. αἰσχύνη, shame, + -ite[2].] A mineral occurring at Miack in the Ilmen Mountains, Norway, etc., in black prismatic crystals, containing niobium, titanium, thorium, the cerium metals, and other uncommon elements. So called by Berzelius as being the "disgrace" of chemistry, which at the time of its discovery was unable to separate two of its constituents, titanic acid and zirconia. Also spelled eschynite.

Æschynomene (es-ki-nom′e-nē), n. [L., a sensitive plant, < Gr. αἰσχυνομένη, a sensitive plant, prop. fem. ppr. of αἰσχύνεσθαι, be ashamed, pass. of αἰσχύνειν, make ugly, disfigure, dishonor; cf. αἶσχος, ugliness, shame, dishonor.] A genus of leguminous plants, with jointed pods, pinnate leaves which are sometimes sensitive, and usually yellow flowers. There are 50 species, herbaceous or somewhat shrubby, of which 3 or 4 are widely distributed through the tropics, the rest being natives of America, from Patagonia to Virginia. The stem of the East Indian Æ. aspera, remarkable for its lightness, is cut into thin strips for the manufacture of hats. It is also made into swimming-jackets, floats for nets, etc., and is often worked into models of temples, flowers, etc.

æschynomenous† (es-ki-nom′e-nus), a. [< Gr. αἰσχυνόμενος, ppr. of αἰσχύνεσθαι, be ashamed: see Æschynomene.] Sensitive: applied to plants.

Æsculapian (es-kū-lā′pi-an), a. and n. [< L. Æsculapius, accom. of Gr. Ἀσκληπιός, Dor. Ἀσκλαπιός, the god of medicine: see Asclepias.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Æsculapius, god of medicine; medical; pertaining to the healing art.

II. n. A medical man; a physician: generally in a humorous sense.

Also spelled Esculapian.

æsculin, æsculine. See esculin, esculine.

Æsculus (es′kū-lus), n. [L., the Italian oak: see esculin, etc.] A genus of trees and shrubs, of the family Æsculaceæ, chiefly North American, with broad digitate leaves and showy flowers in large panicles. The seeds are large, of the shape and color of chestnuts, but too bitter to be eaten. The timber is of little value. The horse-chestnut, Æ. Hippocastanum, supposed to be originally from northern India, is very extensively cultivated as an ornamental shade-tree, and the fruits are used in southern Europe for feeding sheep and horses. The American species, growing in the western and southern United States, have the popular name buckeye (which see).

Æsculus Hippocastanum.
a, flower; b, seed; c, seed cut longitudinally.

Æshna (esh′nä), n. See Æschna.

Æsir (ā′sėr, Icel. pron. ā′sir, mod. ī′sir), n. pl. [Icel., nom. pl. of áss, a god: see As[3].] The collective name for the gods of Scandinavian mythology. There were twelve gods and twenty-six goddesses, dwellers in Asgard. See Asgard.

æsnecy, n. See esnecy.

Æsopian (ē-sō′pi-an), a. [< L. Æsopius, < Æsopus, Gr. Αἴσωπος, Æsop.] Pertaining to Æsop, an ancient Greek writer of fables, of whom little or nothing is certainly known; composed by him or in his manner: as, a fable in the Æsopian style. Also spelled Esopian.

æstates (es-tā′tēz), n. pl. [L., freckles, pl. of æsta(t-)s, summer, summer heat: see estival.] In med., heat-spots; freckles; sunburnt patches.

æsthematology, n. See esthematology.

æsthesia (es-thē′si-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. αἰσθησις, perception by the senses, < αἰσθάνεσθαι, perceive by the senses.] Perception; feeling; sensation; sensibility: the opposite of anæsthesia (which see). Also written esthesia, æsthesis, esthesis.

æsthesiogen, æsthesiogenic, etc. See esthesiogen, etc.

æsthesiology, æsthesiometer, etc. See esthesiology, etc.

æsthesis (es-thē′sis), n. Same as æsthesia. Also spelled esthesis.

æsthesodic, æsthete, etc. See esthesodic, etc.

æstiferous, æstival, etc. See estiferous, etc.

Æstrelata, n. See Œstrelata.

Affenthaler (äf′en-tä-lėr), n. [G. (sc. wein, wine): so called from the village Affenthal, in Baden.] A red wine made in Baden. It is one of the most esteemed of the Markgräfler wines.

afferent (af′ė-rent), a. [< L. afferen(t-)s, ppr. of afferre, adferre, carry to, < ad, to, + ferre, carry, bear.] Bringing; carrying to or toward; conveying inward. Used in physiol. as the opposite of efferent, and said (a) of veins which convey blood from the periphery to the physiological center of the blood-circulation; (b) of those lymphatic vessels which enter a lymphatic gland, as opposed to those which leave it; and chiefly (c) of those nerves which have a sensory or esthesodic function, conveying an impulse from the periphery to a ganglionic center of the nervous system. In the case of nerves, afferent is nearly synonymous with sensory, as opposed to motor. The term is also applied to the function of these nerves, and to that which they convey: as, an afferent impulse.

Having arrived at this notion of an impulse travelling along a nerve, we readily pass to the conception of a sensory nerve as a nerve which, when active, brings an impulse to a central organ, or is afferent; and of a motor nerve, as a nerve which carries away an impulse from the organ, or is efferent. It is very convenient to use these terms to denote the two great classes of nerves; for . . . there are afferent nerves which are not sensory, while there may be in man, and certainly are in animals, efferent nerves which are not motor, in the sense of inducing muscular contraction. Huxley, Physiol., p. 289.

affermet, v. t. Obsolete form of affirm, Chaucer.

affettuoso (äf-fet-tō-ō′sō), a. [It., affectionate, kind, tender, < L. affectuosus: see affectuous.] Tender; affecting: in music, designating a movement which is to be sung or played softly and affectingly.

affiance (a-fī′ans), n. [< ME. affiance, afiance, affyance, -aunce, < OF. afiance, < afier, affier, trust in, > ME. afien, affien: see affy and -ance.] 1. Trust; confidence; reliance.

The Christian looks to God with implicit affiance. Hammond.

Lancelot, my Lancelot, thou in whom I have Most love and most affiance.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

2. The pledging of faith, as in contracting marriage; a solemn engagement; a marriage contract.

Accord of friendes, consent of Parents sought,
Affyaunce made, my happinesse begonne.
Spenser, F. Q., II. iv. 21.

3. Affinity; intimate relation; connection.

In defiance of his church and not in affiance with it.
H. James, Subs. and Shad., p. 198.

affiance (a-fī′ans), v. t.; pret. and pp. affianced, ppr. affiancing. [< OF. afiancer; from the noun.] 1. To betroth; bind by promise of marriage: as, to affiance a daughter; to affiance one's self.

In me behold the Prince,
Your countryman, affianced years ago
To the Lady Ida. Tennyson, Princess, ii.

2. To assure by pledge or promise. [Rare.]

affiche (a-fēsh′), n. [F., < afficher, OF. aficher, afichier, fasten to, > ME. affiche: see affitch and affix.] A paper of any kind pasted or affixed to a wall, post, etc., to be read by passers-by; a poster.

affidation†, affidature† (af-i-dā′shon, af′i-dā-tūr), n. [< ML. affidare, pledge: see affy and affiance.] A mutual contract of fidelity.

affidavit (af-i-dā′vit), n. [ML., he has made oath, 3d pers. sing. perf. ind. of affidare, make oath: see affy and affiance.] A written declaration upon oath; a statement of facts in writing signed by the affiant, and sworn to or confirmed by a declaration before a notary public, a magistrate, or other authorized officer. Affidavits are usually required when evidence is to be laid before a judge or court on a motion or summary application, as distinguished from a trial of the merits of the cause. The word is sometimes loosely used of an oral declaration under oath.

affiet, v. See affy.

affilet, v. t. [< ME. affilen, afilen, affylen, < OF. afiler, later affiler, to sharpen, also to deck, mod. F. affiler, < ML. affilare* (in deriv.), bring to an edge, < L. ad, to, + filum, thread, ML. also edge: see *file*3.] To polish; sharpen.

He moste preche and well affyle his tunge.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 714.

affiliable (a-fil′i-a-bl), a. [< ML. as if affiliabilis*, < affiliare: see affiliate.] Capable of being affiliated; chargeable as result or effect: with on or upon.

The distribution of sediment and other geological processes which these marine currents effect, are affiliable upon the force which the sun radiates.
H. Spencer, First Principles, § 69.

affiliate (a-fil′i-āt), v.; pret. and pp. affiliated, ppr. affiliating. [< ML. affiliatus, pp. of affiliare, adfiliare (> F. affilier), adopt as a son, < L. ad, to, + filius, son, filia, daughter.] I. trans. 1. To adopt; receive into a family as a son or daughter; hence, to bring into intimate association or close connection.

Is the soul affiliated to God, or is it estranged and in rebellion? I. Taylor.

2. In law, to fix the paternity of, as a bastard child: with upon: as, the mother affiliated her child upon John Doe. Hence—3. To connect in the way of descent or derivation: with upon.

Ethical requirements may here be to such extent affiliated upon physical necessities, as to give them a partially scientific authority. H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 108.

4. To associate; receive or establish on terms of fellowship.

Men who have a voice in public affairs are at once affiliated with one or other of the great parties between which society is divided. Lowell, Democracy.

He [Lassalle] hoped the party of progress would affiliate itself with him. G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 63.

Austria and . . . the affiliated Governments of the Peninsula. E. Dicey, Victor Emmanuel, p. 137.

Affiliated societies, local societies connected with a central society or with one another.

II. intrans. To associate; consort; be intimately united in action or interest.

The political organization with which the blacks now naturally affiliate is restrained, by fear of Caucasian sentiment, from giving this element the prominence it numerically deserves. N. A. Rev., CXXXIX. 426.

affiliation (a-fil-i-ā′shon), n. [< F. affiliation, < ML. affiliatio(n-), adfiliatio(n-), < affiliare: see affiliate.] 1. Adoption; association in the same family or society; hence, consanguinity or kinship of feeling or character.

There are a number of affiliations which were of at least equal antiquity with Adoption, and which, I suspect, served its object even more completely in very ancient times. Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 98.

So intense is our sense of affiliation with their nature, that we speak of them universally as our fathers.
Whipple, Ess. and Rev., I. 221.

2. Association in general; relation; connection; friendship; alliance.

The merry gallants of a French colonial military service which had grown gross by affiliation with Spanish-American frontier life. G. W. Cable, Old Creole Days, p. 4.

The population [of the disputed territory on the western boundary of Afghanistan] is sparse, with few affiliations with the Afghans. Science, V. 359.

3. In law, the act of imputing or of determining the paternity of a child, and the fixing upon the father the obligation to provide for its maintenance. Hence—4. The fathering of a thing upon any one; the assignment of anything to its origin; connection by way of derivation or descent: with upon.

The relationship of the sense of smell to the fundamental organic actions is traceable, not only through its affiliation upon the sense of taste, but is traceable directly.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol.

affinal (a-fī′nal), a. [< L. affinis (see *affine*1) + -al.] Related by affinity; derived from the same source: as, affinal tribes or products. [Rare.]

affine1 (a-fin′), a. and n. [< OF. affin, afin, "a kinsman or allie, one with whom affinity is had or contracted" (Cotgrave), < L. affinis, neighboring, related by marriage, < ad, to, + finis, border, end: see *fine*1, and cf. affinity.] I. a. Related; akin; affined.

II. n. A relative by marriage; one akin.

affine2† (a-fīn′), v. t. [< F. affiner, OF. afiner = Pr. Sp. afinar = It. affinare, < ML. affinare, refine, < L. ad, to, + ML. finus (> OF. fin, etc.), fine: see *fine*2.] To refine. Holland.

affined (a-find′), a. [< *affine*1 + *-ed*2.] 1. Joined by affinity or any close tie; akin; allied; confederated.

For then, the bold and coward,
The wise and fool, the artist and unread,
The hard and soft, seem all affin'd and kin.
Shak., T. and C., i. 3.

If partially affin'd, or leagu'd in office,
Thou dost deliver more or less than truth,
Thou art no soldier. Shak., Othello, ii. 3.

2†. Bound or obligated by affinity or some intimate relation.

Now, sir, be judge yourself,
Whether I in any just term am affin'd
To love the Moor. Shak., Othello, i. 1.

3. In zoöl., joined in natural affinity; having affinity; allied homologically and morphologically; related in structural character.

Birds are homologically related, or naturally allied or affined, according to the sum of like structural characters.
Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 68.

affinitative (a-fin′i-tā-tiv), a. [< L. affinita(t-)s, affinity, + -ive.] Of the nature of affinity: as, an affinitative resemblance. N. E. D.

affinitatively (a-fin′i-tā-tiv-li), adv. By means of affinity; as regards affinity.

affinition (af-i-nish′on), n. [< *affine*1 + -ition. Cf. define, definition.] The state or quality of being affined; mental affinity or attraction. [Rare.]

affinitive (a-fin′i-tiv), a. [< affinity + -ive. Cf. definitive.] Characterized by affinity; closely related. N. E. D.

affinity (a-fin′i-ti), n.; pl. affinities (-tiz). [< ME. afinite, affinite, < OF. afinite, F. affinité, < L. affinita(t-)s, < affinis, neighboring, related by marriage: see *affine*1, affined.] 1. An artificial relationship between persons of different blood, regarded as analogous to consanguinity; the relation between families or individuals created by intermarriage (excluding that between the married persons), by legal adoption, or by sponsorship; more especially, the relation between a husband or wife and the kindred of the other spouse. In the Jewish, Roman, and canon laws, affinity by marriage or adoption is a bar to marriage within certain degrees, equally with consanguinity; and on this ground rests the prohibition of marriage with a deceased wife's sister in Great Britain. The canon law treats unlawful sexual intercourse as creating the same affinity with marriage. The relationship of godparents and godchildren, called spiritual affinity, is still considered a bar to marriage, as it was before the Council of Trent, which merely diminished the number of such affinities.

Solomon made affinity with Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and took Pharaoh's daughter. 1 Ki. iii. 1.

2†. Intercourse; acquaintance; companionship.

About forty years past, I began a happy affinity with William Cranmer. Burton.

Hence—3. A natural liking for, or attraction to, a person or thing; a natural drawing or inclination; an inherent mutual liking or attraction.

Some transcendent, unborn affinity, by which we are linked to things above the range of mere nature.
Bushnell, Nat. and the Supernat., p. 68.

4. Inherent likeness or agreement as between things; essential or specific conformity; intimate resemblance or connection.

The perception of real affinities between events (that is to say, of ideal affinities, for those only are real) enables the poet thus to make free with the most imposing forms and phenomena of the world, and to assert the predominance of the soul. Emerson, Nature.

5. In chem., the force by which the elements are retained in combination in a compound substance; or, in terms of the atomic theory, the force by which the atoms in a molecule are united; also, the cause which determines the occurrence of a chemical change. It is now recognized that the true measure of affinity in the latter sense is not the heat evolved by the chemical change, but the maximum quantity of work which the change is capable of producing.

6. In biol., morphological and implied genetic relationship, resulting in a resemblance in general plan or structure, or in the essential structural parts, existing between two organisms or groups of organisms; true and near structural relationship, predicable of two or more organisms morphologically related, however diverse physiologically.

At first we find marsupials, and Carnivora with marsupial affinities. J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 24.

7. In Sir W. Hamilton's psychology, that in ideas which, along with simultaneity, renders them capable of being associated in the mind, as their similarity or contiguity. The law of the affinity of ideas is the logical law of continuity of forms. See continuity.

8. In geom., the relationship between two figures in the same plane which correspond to each other, point to point and straight line to straight line, any point of the one lying in a fixed direction from the corresponding point of the other, and at a distance from it proportional to its distance from a fixed line, called the axis of affinity, the direction of which is that of lines joining corresponding points.

affirm (a-fėrm'), v. [Formerly afferm, but now spelled so as to approach the L.; < ME. affermen, afermen, < OF. afermer, affermer, later affirmer, affirm, avouch, mod. F. affermer = Pr. affermar = Sp. afirmar = Pg. affirmar = It. affirmare, < L. affirmare, adfirmare, present as fixed, aver, affirm, < ad, to, + firmare, make firm, < firmus, firm: see firm, a.] I. trans. 1. To state or assert positively; tell with confidence; aver; declare to be a fact; maintain as true: opposed to deny.

One Jesus, which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive. Acts xxv. 19.

The gentleman came up, and asked pardon for having disturbed us, affirming that he was ignorant of our being so near. Goldsmith, Vicar, viii.

2. To make firm; establish, confirm, or ratify: as, the appellate court affirmed the judgment.

=Syn. 1. Assert, Affirm, Declare, etc. See assert.

II. intrans. 1. To declare or assert positively or solemnly.

Not that I so affirm, though so it seem
To thee, who hast thy dwelling here on earth.
Milton, P. L., viii. 117.

All books that get fairly into the vital air of the world were written by the . . . affirming and advancing class, who utter what tens of thousands feel though they cannot say. Emerson, Books.

2. To declare solemnly before a court or magistrate, but without oath (a practice allowed where the affirmant has scruples against taking an oath); make a legal affirmation. See affirmation.

affirmable (a-fėr'ma-bl), a. [< affirm + -able.] Capable of being affirmed, asserted, or declared: followed by of: as, an attribute affirmable of every just man.

affirmably (a-fėr'ma-bli), adv. In a way capable of affirmation.

★affirmance (a-fėr'mans), n. [< OF. affermance, afermance, < affermer, afermer, affirm: see affirm.] 1. The act of affirming; asseveration; assertion.

E'en when sober truth prevails throughout,
They swear it, till affirmance breeds a doubt.
Cowper, Conversation, l. 66.

2. Confirmation; ratification.

All sentences are liable to the king's affirmance or reversal. Brougham.

3. In law: (a) The confirmation by an appellate court of the adjudication of a lower court or officer. (b) Confirmation of a voidable act.

affirmant (a-fėr'mant), n. [< L. affirman(t-)s, ppr. of affirmare: see affirm.] 1. One who affirms or asserts.—2. In law, one who makes affirmation instead of taking an oath.

affirmation (af-ėr-mā'shon), n. [< L. affirmatio(n-), < affirmare, affirm: see affirm.] 1. The assertion that something is, or is true; the assignment of a certain character to an object: opposed to denial or negation. In ordinary formal logic, the distinction relates merely to the form of expression, but usually affirmation is taken to mean the assertion of something positive and definite, as opposed to a merely negative assertion.

2. That which is affirmed; a proposition that is declared to be true; averment; assertion.

That he shall receive no benefit from Christ, is the affirmation whereon his despair is founded. Hammond, Fundamentals.

3. Confirmation; ratification; establishment of something of prior origin.

Our statutes sometimes are only the affirmation or ratification of that which by common law was held before. Hooker.

4. In law, the solemn declaration made by Quakers, Moravians, or others conscientiously opposed to taking oaths, in cases where an oath is generally required. False affirmations made by such persons are punishable in the same way as perjury.

affirmative (a-fėr'ma-tiv), a. and n. [< ME. affirmatyff, n., < OF. affirmatif, F. affirmatif, -ive, a., affirmative, n., < L. affirmativus, < affirmatus, pp. of affirmare: see affirm.] I. a. 1. Characterized by affirmation or assertion; assertive; positive in form; not negative: as, an affirmative proposition; affirmative principles. In formal logic, the distinction of affirmative and negative propositions relates not to the nature of what is asserted, but only to the form of the proposition, which is called affirmative if it contains no negative particle.

Hence—2. Positive in manner; confident; dogmatic.

Be not confident and affirmative in an uncertain matter. Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, p. 102.

3. Giving affirmation or assent; confirmatory; ratifying; concurring; agreeing: as, an affirmative decree or judgment by an appellate court; an affirmative answer to a request.

II. n. 1. That which affirms or asserts; a positive proposition or averment: as, two negatives make an affirmative.

Your four negatives make your two affirmatives.
Shak., T. N., v. 1.

2. That which gives affirmation or assent; the agreeing or concurring part or side: with the definite article: as, to support the affirmative; to vote in the affirmative (that is, in favor of the affirmative side), as in a legislative body.

A government is perfect of which the affirmative can be truly stated in answering these questions. Brougham.

3. In judicial proceedings, the side which, whether in itself an affirmation or a negation, requires first to be supported by proof, presumption in the absence of proof being against it; the side which has the burden of proof.—4. Naut., the signal-flag or pendant by which assent is expressed.

affirmatively (a-fėr'ma-tiv-li), adv. 1. In an affirmative manner; by express declaration; positively; expressly.—2. In the affirmative mode; by asserting that a disputed or doubtful thing is: opposed to negatively.

I believe in God. First, in God affirmatively, I believe he is; against atheism. Secondly, in God exclusively, not in gods; as against polytheism and idolatry. Bp. Pearson, Expos. of Creed, i.

affirmatory (a-fėr'ma-tō-ri), a. [< LL. as if affirmatorius*, < affirmator, an affirmer, < L. affirmare: see affirm.] 1. Affirmative; assertive.

An oath may as well sometimes be affirmatory as promissory. Hobbes, Gov. and Society, ii. § 20.

2. Dependent upon an affirmative principle: as, an affirmatory syllogism. De Morgan.

affirmer (a-fėr'mėr), n. One who affirms.

The burthen of the proof in law resteth upon the affirmer. Bp. Bramhall, Schism Guarded, p. 285.

affitch†, v. t. [< ME. affitche, afficche, affiche, < OF. aficher, afichier, mod. F. afficher = Pr. aficar, afiquar = Sp. afijar = It. afficcare, < ML. as if affigicare*, a freq. form equiv. to affixare, freq. of L. affigere, adfigere, fasten to, affix: see affix, and cf. fitch[3], fix.] To fasten to; affix.

The platis of gold, the whiche he hadde affitchide. Wyclif, 2 Ki. xviii. 16. (N. E. D.) affix (a-fiks'), v. t.; pret. and pp. affixed (formerly often and still occasionally affixt), ppr. affixing. [< ML. affixare, freq. of L. affigere, adfigere, pp. affixus, adfixus, fasten to, < ad, to, + figere, fasten, fix. The older form in E. was affitch, q. v.] To fix; fasten, join, or attach; conjoin, add, or append; make an adjunct or part of: followed by to.

Archbishop Whitgift was the first to affix his name to the death warrant. Bancroft, Hist. U. S., I. 226.

As plants became more highly developed and affixed to the ground, they would be compelled to be anemophilous in order to intercross. Darwin, Cross and Self Fertilization, p. 409.

We hesitate at doing Spenser so great an honor as to think that he intended by his allegory the sense we affix to it. Emerson, Art.

=Syn. Add, Affix, Annex, etc. (see add), suffix, superadd, tack on, fasten on, join.

★affix (af'iks), n. [< F. affixe, a. and n., < L. affixus, adfixus, pp.: see affix, v.] 1. That which is joined, attached, or added; an addition or attachment.—2. In philol., a syllable or letter, prefix or suffix, attached to a word or a verbal root or stem, as in good-ness, veri-fy, civil-ize, un-able, un-con-form-able.—3. In decorative art, any small feature, as a figure, a flower, or the like, added for ornament to a vessel or other utensil, to an architectural feature, etc.: used especially with reference to ceramics and bronzes. Decoration of this kind is characteristic of the famous Palissy ware, which is adorned with affixes in the shape of serpents, lizards, fishes, and the like; and Affixes.

Italo-Greek Vase in the Campana Collection, Louvre Museum. (From "L'Art pour Tous.")

modern ceramic ware of both fine and ordinary quality is often ornamented with flowers, figures, etc., in relief. The most beautiful examples of the artistic use of affixes are, however, to be sought among Japanese bronzes.

affixal (af'iks-al), a. [< affix, n., + -al.] Pertaining to an affix; having the character of an affix. [Rare.]

affixation (af-iks-ā'shon), n. [< ML. as if affixatio(n-)*, < affixare: see affix, v.] The act of affixing, attaching, or appending; affixion. [Rare.]

affixion (a-fik'shon), n. [< L. affixio(n-), adfixio(n-), < affigere, adfigere: see affix, v.] The act of affixing, or the state of being affixed. [Rare.]

In his scourging, in his affixion, in his transfixion. Bp. Hall, Sermon, Gal. ii. 20.

affixture (a-fiks'tūr), n. [< affix + -ture, after fixture.] 1. The act of affixing; attachment.—2. That which is affixed. [Rare.]

afflate† (a-flāt'), v. t. [< L. afflatus, pp. of afflare, adflare, blow on, < ad, to, + flare, blow: see blow[1].] To breathe on; inspire.

afflation (a-flā'shon), n. [< L. as if afflatio(n-)*, < afflare, adflare: see afflatus.] A blowing or breathing on; inspiration.

afflatus (a-flā'tus), n. [< L. afflatus, adflatus, < afflare, adflare, blow on: see afflate.] 1. A blowing or breathing on, as of wind; a breath or blast of wind. [Rare or unused.]—2. An impelling mental force acting from within; supernal impulse or power, as of prophecy or expression; religious, poetic, or oratorical inspiration. Often spoken of as the divine afflatus, a translation of the Latin afflatus divinus, inspiration.

The poet writing against his genius will be like a prophet without his afflatus. J. Spence, The Odyssey.

affleuré (a-flė-rā'), a. [F., pp. of affleurer (Pr. afflourar), make level or flush, < à fleur = Pr. a flour = Pg. a flor = It. a fior, on a level, even, flush: appar. < L. ad florem: ad, to, at; florem, acc. of flos, flower, in the later sense of 'upper surface' (see flower), in this sense perhaps associated with, if not derived from, G. flur = E. floor, q. v.] In decorative art, sunk to a level with the surface; not projecting: said of a medallion, a disk, or other ornamental adjunct, inlaid as part of a design.

afflict (a-flikt'), v. t. [In earlier form aflight, q. v.; < L. afflictare, adflictare, trouble, agitate, vex greatly, intensive of affligere, adfligere, pp. afflictus, adflictus, beat down, dash to the ground, < ad, to, + fligere, beat, strike, prob. akin to E. blow[3], a stroke, hit.] 1†. To strike down; prostrate; overthrow; rout.

And, reassembling our afflicted powers,
Consult how we may henceforth most offend
Our enemy. Milton, P. L., i. 186.

2. To distress with mental or bodily pain; trouble greatly or grievously; harass or torment: as, to be afflicted with the gout, or by persecution.

Ye shall not afflict any widow or fatherless child. Ex. xxii. 22.

There is no community free from a multitude of croakers and alarmists, . . . who afflict the patience and conscience of all good Christians within the reach of their influence. Whipple, Ess. and Rev., II. 118.

The afflicted voice of the country, in its hour of danger, has charmed down with a sweet persuasion the angry passions of the day. Everett, Orations, I. 379.

=Syn. Afflict, Distress, Trouble, Harass, Torment; try, pain, hurt, plague, persecute. Of these words, afflict implies the most spiritual effect, the greatest depth and continuance of sorrow. To distress is a more outward act, bringing one into straitness of circumstances or feeling, so that there is more anxiety for the future, while perhaps the afflicted person knows the full measure of his loss and is wholly occupied with the past. To trouble is a lighter act, involving perhaps confusion or uncertainty of mind, and especially embarrassment. Harass, as applied to mind or body, suggests the infliction of the weariness that comes from the continuance or repetition of trying experiences, so that there is not time for rest. Torment implies the infliction of acute pain, physical or mental, and is frequently used in the sense of harassing by frequent return. The use of afflicted otherwise than of persons severally or collectively is highly figurative or poetic: as, my afflicted fortunes; the other words have freer figurative use. See affliction.

O ye afflicted ones who lie
Steeped to the lips in misery.
Longfellow, Goblet of Life.

I come to visit the afflicted spirits
Here in the prison. Shak., M. for M., ii. 3.

Myself distress'd, an exile, and unknown,
Debarr'd from Europe, and from Asia thrown,
In Libyan deserts wander thus alone.
Dryden, Æneid, i. 531.

For my own part I should be very much troubled were I endowed with this divining quality.
Addison, Spectator, No. 7.

Nature, oppress'd and harass'd out with care,
Sinks down to rest. Addison, Cato, v. 1.

The sight of any of the house of York
Is as a fury to torment my soul.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., i. 3.

afflict† (a-flikt'), p. a. [In earlier form aflight, q. v.; < L. afflictus, adflictus, pp.: see the verb.] Afflicted; distressed.

afflict†, n. [< afflict, v.] Conflict; struggle.

The life of man upon earth is nothing else than a "warfare" and continual aflict with her ghostly enemies.
Becon, Fasting (ed. 1844), p. 542. (N. E. D.) afflictedness (a-flik'ted-nes), n. The state of being afflicted; affliction.

Thou art deceived if thou thinkest that God delights in the afflictedness of his creatures.
Bp. Hall, Balm of Gilead, ii. § 6.

afflicter (a-flik'tėr), n. One who afflicts or causes pain of body or of mind.

afflictingly (a-flik'ting-li), adv. In an afflicting manner.

affliction (a-flik'shon), n. [< ME. affliccioun, -tyon, < OF. afliction, < L. afflictio(n-), adflictio(n-), < affligere, adfligere: see afflict.] 1. The state of being afflicted; a state of pain, distress, or grief.

To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction.
Jas. i. 27.

He kindly tooke us all by the hand, and made signes that he should see us no more, which made us take our leave of him with extreame reluctancy and affliction for the accident. Evelyn, Diary, March 23, 1646.

2. A cause of continued pain of body or mind, as sickness, loss, calamity, adversity, persecution, etc.

Many are the afflictions of the righteous. Ps. xxxiv. 19.

=Syn. 1. Affliction, Grief, Sorrow, Sadness, Distress, Misery, Wretchedness, pain. Affliction is acute, continued suffering caused by loss or its consequences. That is an affliction which is a severe deprivation or loss, as of health, limbs, faculties, friends, or the property necessary to one's support; not temporary ailments, nor losses easily borne or repaired. Grief is mental suffering too violent to be long continued, and therefore subsiding into sorrow or sadness; it is always in view of something recently past. Affliction is a personal matter; grief may be over another's woe. Sorrow, though more quiet, may be long continued or permanent (as, a lifelong sorrow), and may be in view of the past, present, or future; it may be active penitence for wrong-doing, as sorrow for sin, or it may be wholly sympathetic. Sadness is a feeling of dejection or inability to be cheerful, the cause being not always a matter of consciousness; it is primarily personal, and is of various degrees of depth and permanence. Distress is extreme adversity, and, subjectively, the corresponding state of mind; it is the agitation appropriate to circumstances well-nigh desperate. It may be wholly sympathetic, as the distress caused by calamity to another, and it may imply a struggle. The first five words may be freely used for either cause or effect; misery and wretchedness denote generally only the effect, that is, the state of feeling. Misery is great and unremitting pain of body or mind, unhappiness that crushes the spirit. Wretchedness is sometimes almost identical with misery, and sometimes goes beyond it, even to abjectness. See calamity.

The furnace of affliction refines us from earthly drossiness, and softens us for the impression of God's own stamp. Boyle.

Indeed the violence and impression of an excessive grief must of necessity astonish the soul, and wholly deprive her of her ordinary functions.
Cotton, tr. of Montaigne (3d ed.), ii.

A feeling of sadness and longing,
That is not akin to pain,
And resembles sorrow only
As the mist resembles the rain.
Longfellow, The Day is Done.

Great distress has never hitherto taught, and while the world lasts it never will teach, wise lessons to any part of mankind. Burke, Letter to Memb. of Nat. Assembly.

The state of one who really wishes for death is firmly linked in our thoughts with the extreme of misery and wretchedness and disease. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 229.

2. Trouble, misfortune, disaster, visitation, blow, trial, woe, tribulation. See list under grief.

afflictive (a-flik'tiv), a. [= F. afflictif, < ML. afflictivus, < L. afflictus, pp. of affligere: see afflict, v.] Characterized by or causing mental or physical pain; painful; distressing; of the nature of an affliction: as, an afflictive dispensation of Providence.

We consider with the most afflictive anguish the pain which we have given and now cannot alleviate.
Johnson, Rambler, No. 54.

Many that want food and clothing have cheerier lives and brighter prospects than she had; many harassed by poverty, are in a strait less afflictive.
Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xiii.

=Syn. Afflicting, grievous, calamitous, disastrous, oppressive, severe, unhappy, trying.

afflictively (a-flik'tiv-li), adv. In an afflictive manner; in a manner that is painful and trying.

affluence (af'lö-ens), n. [= F. affluence, < L. affluentia, adfluentia, abundance, < affluen(t-)s, adfluen(t-)s, ppr., abundant: see affluent.] 1. A flowing to; a concourse; afflux.

There had been great affluence of company.
Carlyle, Frederick the Great, III. viii. 37.

2. Figuratively, an abundant supply, as of thoughts, words, etc.; a profusion, as of riches; hence, abundance of material goods; wealth.

Few scholars have manifested so much independence and affluence of thought, in connection with so rich and varied an amount of knowledge.
Whipple, Ess. and Rev., I. 17.

Many old and honourable families disappeared, . . . and many new men rose rapidly to affluence.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., i.

=Syn. 2. Wealth, Riches, etc. (see opulence); exuberance, profusion, overflow; fortune, prosperity, ample means. See list under abundance.

affluency (af'lö-en-si), n. An abundant flow or supply; affluence. [Rare.]

There may be certain channels running from the head to this little instrument of loquacity [a woman's tongue], and conveying into it a perpetual affluency of animal spirits. Addison, Spectator, No. 247.

affluent (af'lö-ent), a. and n. [< ME. affluent, < OF. affluent, mod. F. affluent, < L. affluen(t-)s, adfluen(t-)s, abundant, rich, ppr. of affluere, adfluere, flow to, abound in, < ad, to, + fluere, flow: see fluent.] I. a. 1†. Flowing to: as, "affluent blood," Harvey, Consumption.—2. Abundant; copious; abounding in anything, as attributes, attainments, or possessions; hence, specifically, abounding in means; rich: as, a man of affluent intellect; an affluent man or community; affluent circumstances.

His imagination is most affluent when it is pervaded by a calm, yet intense and lofty spirit of meditation.
Whipple, Ess. and Rev., I. 249.

II. n. A tributary stream; a stream or river flowing into another, or into a lake, bay, etc.

He cast anchor in a very great bay, with many affluents.
Bancroft, Hist. U. S., I. 108.

As the Thames rolls along, it receives a number of these feeders, or affluents, which empty themselves into the river. Huxley, Physiog., p. 4.

affluently (af'lö-ent-li), adv. In an affluent manner; in abundance; abundantly.

affluentness (af'lö-ent-nes), n. The state of being affluent; great plenty.

afflux (af'luks), n. [= F. afflux, < L. as if afluxus*, n. (cf. flux, < fluxus, n.), < affluere, pp. affluxus, flow to: see affluent.] The act of flowing to; a flow or flowing to; an accession: as, an afflux of blood to the head.

Not unfrequently it happens that to a spot where two or more filaments have met, there is an afflux of the protoplasmic substance. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 395.

affluxion (a-fluk'shon), n. [< L. as if affluxio(n-)* (cf. fluxion), < affluere, flow to: see affluent.] A flowing to or toward; an afflux or accession. Sir T. Browne.

affodill† (af'ō-dil), n. Obsolete form of daffodil.

afforage (af'or-āj), n. [< OF. afforage, affeurage, < afforer, afferer, affeurer, afeurer, assess, value, affeer: see affeer.] Formerly, in France, a duty paid to the lord of a district for permission to sell wine or liquors within his seigniory.

afforce† (a-fōrs'), v. t. [< ME. aforcen, aforsen, < OF. aforcer, < ML. affortiare, afforciare*, strengthen, fortify (cf. afforcement); mixed with OF. efforcer, esforcer, < ML. exfortiare, force, compel; < L. ad, to, or ex, out, + ML. fortiare, strengthen: see force[1].] 1. To force; compel; violate.—2. To strengthen or reinforce by the addition of other or of specially skilled members, as juries and deliberative bodies.

The remedy for insufficient "governance" was sought . . . in admitting the houses of Parliament to a greater share of influence in executive matters, in the aforcing or amending of the council, and in the passing of reforming statutes. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 695.

3. Reflexively, to exert one's self; endeavor; attempt.

afforcement† (a-fōrs'ment), n. [< OF. afforcement, < aforcer, aforcer, strengthen: see afforce and -ment.] 1. A reinforcement; a strengthening, especially of a jury or deliberative body. See extract.

As it became difficult to find juries personally informed as to the points at issue, the jurors . . . summoned were allowed first to add to their number persons who possessed the requisite knowledge, under the title of aforcement. After this proceeding had been some time in use, the afforcing jurors were separated from the uninformed jurors, and relieved them altogether from their character of witnesses. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 164.

2. A fortress; a fortification. Bailey.

afford (a-fōrd'), v. t. [Spelled aff- as if of L. origin, but prop. with one f; early mod. E. afford, affoard, affoord, afoord, < ME. aforthen, iforthen, iworthen, earlier iforthien, geforthian, < AS. geforthian, further, advance, promote, accomplish, perform, < ge- + forthian, further, advance, promote, perform, < forth, forth, forward: see a-[6], ge-, and forth; cf. further, v.] 1†. To promote; further; forward; carry out; accomplish; achieve; manage.

And here and there as that my litille wit
Aforthe may, eek think I translate hit.
Occleve, (Halliwell.)

2. To give, yield, produce, or confer upon; yield, furnish, supply, as an effect or a result, as of growth, effort, or operation: as, the earth affords grain; trade affords profit; religion affords consolation to the afflicted; the transaction afforded him a good profit; to afford one an agreeable sensation.

What could be less than to afford him praise?
Milton, P. L., iv. 46.

Standing out in strong relief from the contrast afforded by the sable background was a waxen image.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 145.

The delight which a work of art affords seems to arise from our recognizing in it the mind that formed Nature, again in active operation. Emerson, Art.

3. To manage, be able, or have the means (with an infinitive clause); be able to give or bear, spare, or meet the expense of (with an object-noun): always, from the implication of ability, with may or can: as, we can afford to sell cheap; he might afford to gratify us; you can well afford the expense.

Only this commendation I can afford her.
Shak., Much Ado, i. 1.

Thou shalt lie close hid with nature, and canst not be afforded to the Capitol or the Exchange.
Emerson, The Poet.

A man is rich in proportion to the number of things which he can afford to let alone. Thoreau, Walden, p. 89.

=Syn. 2. To supply, furnish, bestow, communicate, give, impart.

affordable (a-fōr'da-bl), a. [< afford + -able.] Capable of being afforded, spared, yielded, or borne.

Since your affrightment could not make her open [her purse] unto you, you thought to make her innocency smart for it. R. Brome, Northern Lass.

2. The state of being frightened; fright.

With as much affrightment as if an enemy were near.
Jer. Taylor, Sermons, II. iii.

With much terror and affrightment they turned the ship about, expecting every moment to be dashed in pieces against the rocks.
E. Johnson, Wonderworking Providence (1654).

affront (a-frunt'), v. t. [< ME. afronten, afrounten, < OF. afronter, afrunter, later and mod. F. affronter = Pr. Sp. afrontar = Pg. affrontar = It. affrontare, confront, oppose face to face, attack, < ML. affrontare, adfrontare, border on, as land, confront, attack, < L. ad frontem, to the face, in front: ad, to; frontem, acc. of frons, forehead, front; cf. L. ā fronte, before, in front: ā for ab, from; fronte, abl. of frons, forehead, front. Cf. afront, prep. phr. as adv.] 1. To meet or encounter face to face; confront; front; face.

That he, as 't were by accident, may here
Affront Ophelia. Shak., Hamlet, iii. 1.

Earnestly for her he raised
His voice in council, and affronted death
In battle-field. Bryant, Knight's Epitaph.

2. To offend by an open manifestation of disrespect; put a slight upon; offend by effrontery or insolence: as, to affront one by doubting his word; an affronting speech.

Only our foe,
Tempting, affronts us with his foul esteem
Of our integrity. Milton, P. L., ix. 328.

Let me tell you, Mr. Dangle, 'tis damn'd affronting in you to suppose that I am hurt, when I tell you I am not.
Sheridan, The Critic, i. 1.

3. To put out of countenance; make ashamed or confused; give a shock to.

Without affronting their modesty.
Cave, Prim. Christianity, ii. 33. (N. E. D.) affront (a-frunt'), n. [= F. affront = It. affronto; from the verb.] 1†. The act of opposing face to face; open defiance; encounter.

This day thou shalt have ingots; and, to-morrow, give lords th' affront. B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 2.

I walk'd about, admired of all, and dreaded
On hostile ground, none daring my affront.
Milton, S. A., l. 531.

2. A personally offensive act or word; an intentional or supercilious slight; an open manifestation of disrespect or contumely; an insult to the face.

Oft have they violated
The temple, oft the law, with foul affronts.
Milton, P. R., iii. 161.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, Pref.

An affront to our understanding.
Addison, Spectator, No. 512.

3†. Shame; disgrace; anything producing a feeling of shame or disgrace.

Antonius . . . was defeated, upon the sense of which affront he died of grief. Arbuthnot, Anc. Coins.

=Syn. 2. Affront, Insult, Indignity, Outrage, provocation, impertinence, offense, rudeness. These words express disrespect shown in a way that is, or is meant to be, galling. An affront is generally open and to the face. An insult is stronger, perhaps accompanied by more insolence of manner; it is a deeper disgrace and a greater injury to the feelings of its object. An indignity is, specifically, treatment that is unworthy—an affront, insult, injury, or outrage from which one's condition or character should have saved one: as, Zenobia was subjected to the indignity of being led in chains at Aurelian's triumph. An outrage, primarily involving the idea of violence to the person, is a wanton transgression of law or propriety in any way, the perpetration of that which is shamefully contrary to the dictates of humanity or even decency; toward a person it is a combination of insult with indignity; hence it often stands for extreme abusiveness of language. It has freedom of use sufficient to make proper such expressions as, an outrage to his feelings, an outrage to all decency.

To call God to witness truth, or a lie perhaps; or to appeal to him on every trivial occasion, in common discourse, . . . is one of the highest indignities and affronts that can be offered him. Ray.

I will avenge this insult, noble Queen,
Done in your maiden's person to yourself.
Tennyson, Geraint.

The enmity and discord, which of late Sprung from the rancorous outrage of your duke
To merchants. Shak., C. of E., i. 1.

affronté (a-frôn-tā'), a. [F., pp. of affronter: see affront, v.] 1. In art, facing each other; front to front: said of two figures. This was a frequent mode of representing animal and other figures in Oriental and early Greek art, as, for example, in Assyrian and Hittite sculptures, the so-called lions of Mycenæ, and the sphinxes of the temple epistyle of Assos.

Two Lions Rampant, Affronté.

2. Specifically, in her., applied to animals represented (a) front to front, or aspectant: opposed to adorsed; (b) facing the spectator directly, as the lion in the royal crest of Scotland, not with merely the head turned outward. See gardant and cut under crest.

Equivalent forms are affrontée (feminine) and confronté.

Têtes affrontées, or affronté heads, in decorative art, profile heads in relief shown facing each other, as often in cameos, etc., but rarely on coins.

affrontedly (a-frun'ted-li), adv. In a manner to affront; with effrontery. Bacon.

affrontee (a-frun-tē'), n. [< affront + -ee[1].] One who receives an affront. N. E. D.

affrontingly (a-frun'ting-li), adv. In an affronting manner.

affrontive (a-frun'tiv), a. [< affront + -ive.] Giving offense; tending to offend; abusive.

How much more affrontive it is to despise mercy.
South, Sermon on the Restoration.

Will not this measure be regarded as affrontive to the pride . . . of portions of the people of America?
R. Choate, Addresses, p. 348.

affuse (a-fūz'), v. t. [< L. affusus, pp. of affundere, adfundere, pour upon, < ad, to, + fundere, pour: see fuse[1].] To pour. [Rare.]

I first affused water upon the compressed beans.
Boyle, Works, IV. 568.

affusion (a-fū'zhon), n. [< ML. affusio(n-), < L. affundere, pour upon: see affuse.] 1. The act of pouring upon; the act of pouring water or other liquid, as upon a child in baptism.

When the Jews baptized their children, in order to circumcision, it seems to have been indifferent whether it was done by immersion or affusion.
Wheatly, Ill. of Book of Com. Prayer, p. 362.

2. In med., the act of pouring water on the body as a curative means, as from a vessel, by a shower-bath, etc.

When I travell'd in Italy, and the Southern parts, I did sometimes frequent the publiq bathes, . . . but seldome without peril of my life 'till I us'd this frigid affusion, or rather profusion of cold water before I put on my garments. Evelyn, To Doctor Beale.

Some of these [remedies] are affusion, half-baths, . . . fomentations, injections, wrapping up in the wet sheet.
Encyc. Brit., III. 439.

affy† (a-fī'), v. [< ME. affyen, affien, afyen, < OF. afier, later and mod. F. affier, < ML. affidare, trust, pledge, make oath, < L. ad, to, + ML. fidare, trust, < L. fidus, faithful, < fides, faith: see faith, fidelity. Deriv. affiance and affidavit, q. v.] I. trans. 1. To trust, confide (a thing to a person); reflexively, to confide one's self.—2. To confide in; trust.—3. To affirm on one's faith; make affidavit.—4. To assure by promise; pledge; betroth; affiance.

Wedded be thou to the hags of hell,
For daring to affy a mighty lord
Unto the daughter of a worthless king.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iv. 1.

5. To engage; bind; join.

Personal respects rather seem to affy me unto that synod.
Bp. Mountagu, Appeal to Cæsar, p. 69.

II. intrans. To trust; confide.

I do affy
In thy uprightness and integrity.
Shak., Tit. And., i. 1.

Afghan (af'gan), n. and a. [A native name, derived by Afghan chroniclers from Afghāna, a mythical grandson of Saul, king of Israel.] I. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Afghanistan, a mountainous country lying northwest of British India, south of Asiatic Russia, and east of Persia; distinctively, a member of the principal or dominant race of Afghanistan, speaking the Afghan language, the other inhabitants generally speaking Persian.—2. The language of the Afghans, called by themselves Pushtu or Pukhtu, of Aryan affinity, though formerly supposed by some to be Semitic.—3. [l. c.] A kind of blanket made of knitted or crocheted wool, used as a sofa-cover or as a carriage-robe.

II. a. Pertaining or relating to Afghanistan or its people.

a fortiori (ā fôr-shi-ō'rī). [L.; lit., from a stronger (sc. cause): a for ab, from; fortiori, abl. of fortior, fortius, compar. of fortis, strong: see fort.] For a still stronger reason; all the more. A phrase used in, and sometimes employed as the designation of, a kind of argument, which concludes either (a) that something does not take place, because the causes which alone could bring it to pass operate still more strongly in another case without producing that effect; or (b) that something does take place, because causes much weaker than those which operate to bring it about are effective in another case. An argument of the latter kind is the following: "If God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?" Mat. vi. 30.

As he [Shakspere] has avoided obscurities in his sonnets, he would do so a fortiori in his plays, both for the purpose of immediate effect on the stage and of future appreciation. Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 165.

afoul (ą-foul'), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3] + foul.] In a state of collision or entanglement: with of: as, a ship with its shrouds afoul; the brig ran afoul of the steamer.—To fall afoul of, to assail violently; attack vigorously in any way: as, he fell afoul of him tooth and nail, or with an envenomed pen.

Be of good cheer: it is I; be not afraid. Mat. xiv. 27.
Whistling, to keep myself from being afraid.
Dryden, Amphitryon, iii. 1.
A man who's not afraid to say his say,
Though a whole town's against him.
Longfellow, John Endicott, ii. 2.

= Syn. Afraid, Frightened, Terrified, timid, shy, apprehensive, troubled, suspicious, distrustful. Afraid expresses a less degree of fear than frightened or terrified, which describe outward states. In colloquial language, I am afraid is often nearly equivalent to I suspect, I am inclined to think, or the like, and is regularly used as a kind of polite introduction to a correction, objection, etc., or to make a statement sound less positive: as, I am afraid you are wrong; I am afraid that argument won't hold.

And there is ev'n a happiness
That makes the heart afraid.
Hood, Melancholy.

Antony, on the other hand, was desirous to have him there, fancying that he would . . . be frightened into a compliance. C. Middleton, Life of Cicero, III. ix.

Airy ghosts,
That work no mischief, terrify us more Than men in steel with bloody purposes.
T. B. Aldrich, Set of Turquoise.

agal-agal (ä'gal-ä'gal), n. Same as agar-agar.

agalaxy (ag'ą-lak-si), n. Less correct form of agalactia.

Agalena (ag-a-lē'nă), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + γαλήνη, repose, calmness, tranquillity: in allusion to the spider's restlessness.] A genus of true spiders, founded by Walckenaer, giving name to the family Agalenidæ. A. labyrinthica is a pretty British species which spins its web upon herbage. Usually written, incorrectly, Agelena.

agalenid (ag-a-lē'nid), n. A spider of the family Agalenidæ.

Agalenidæ (ag-a-lē'ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Agalena + -idæ.] A family of tubitelarian spiders, typified by the genus Agalena, of the order Araneæ. They have an oblong cephalothorax, with the large cephalic region distinct, and the upper mammillæ larger than the lower. The species are numerous, and 13 genera have been admitted for those of Europe. Among them are some of the most familiar spiders which spin tubular webs.

agalloch (a-gal'ok), n. Same as agallochum.

agallochum (a-gal'ō-kum), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀγάλλοχον (Dioscorides), not, as stated in Liddell and Scott's Lexicon, the bitter aloe, but the fragrant wood also called in later times ξυλαλόη, in NL. transposed Aloëxylon (another genus), translated lignum aloës, E. lign-aloes, q. v.; of eastern origin: cf. Heb. akhālīm, masc. pl., from a sing. akhāl, Hind. aghil, Skt. aguru, agalloch, aloes-wood. See aloe.] A fragrant wood, the aloes or lign-aloes of the Scriptures. It is much used by the Orientals, and especially by the Chinese, as incense in their religious ceremonies. It is the produce of Aquilaria Agallocha, a large tree which grows in the mountains of Cochin-China, Assam, and adjoining regions, and which belongs to the family Thymelæaceæ. Portions of the trunk and branches become saturated with a dark aromatic resin, and these alone are used in the preparation of incense. The resin is sometimes extracted by distillation or infusion. The wood is also called calambac, aloes-wood, and agila-, agal-, or eaglewood. See eaglewood.

agalma (a-gal'mą), n.; pl. agalmata (-ma-tą). [NL., < Gr. ἄγαλμα, a delight, honor, a pleasing gift, esp. to the gods, a statue, any image or work of art, < ἀγάλλεσθαι, take delight in, ἀγάλλειν, honor, glorify.] 1. In law, the impression or image of anything upon a seal.—2. In Gr. antiq., a votive offering to a deity, especially a statue, but also a painting or any other art-object. See etymology of anathema.—3. [cap.] In zoöl., a genus of physophorous oceanic hydroids, the type of the family Agalmidæ. Eschscholtz, 1829.

agalmatolite (ag-al-mat'ō-līt), n. [< Gr. ἀγάλμα(τ-), image, + λίθος, stone.] A soft stone, of a grayish or greenish color, found in China and elsewhere. It can be cut with a knife and polished, and in China is thus formed into works of art, as grotesque figures, pagodas, etc. It belongs in part to the mineral pinite, and in part to pyrophyllite and steatite. Also called figure-stone, lardstone, bildstein, and pagodite.

Agalmidæ (a-gal'mi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Agalma + -idæ.] A family of physophorous siphonophorous hydrozoans, having a greatly elongated and spirally twisted stem, the swimming-column with two or more rows of nectocalyces, and hydrophyllia and tentacles present.

Agalmopsis (a-gal-mop'sis), n. [NL., < Agalma + ὄψις, appearance.] A genus of Agalmidæ resembling Agalma, having deciduous hydrophyllia replaced by nectocalyces, a saccule and an involucre, a terminal filament and no vesicle. Sars, 1846.

agalwood (ag'al-wůd), n. [See eaglewood.] Same as agallochum.

Agama[1] (ag'ą-mą), n. [NL., from Dutch Guiana agamá.] 1. A genus of small saurian reptiles, typical of the family Agamidæ.—2. [l. c.] A member or species of the genus Agama, or of closely related genera: with a plural, agamas (-mąz).

Agama[2] (ag'ą-mą), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of agamus: see agamous.] The agamous division of mollusks. Latreille, 1825. See agamous, 2.

Agamæ (ag'ą-mē), n. pl. [NL. (sc. plantæ), fem. pl. of agamus: see agamous.] A name given by some authors to the large division of cryptogamic plants, which were formerly supposed to be without distinctions of sex.

agami (ag'ą-mi), n. [F. agamy (1741), now agami, from Galibi (Guiana) agamy.] A grallatorial bird, Psophia crepitans, a native of South America, often called the golden-breasted trumpeter. It is in body of the size of a pheasant; it runs with great speed, but flies poorly, is easily tamed, and becomes as docile and attached to man as a dog. See Psophiidæ.

Agami, or Trumpeter (Psophia crepitans).

agamian[1] (a-gā'mi-ąn), a. and n. [= F. agamien, < NL. Agama[1].] I. a. Pertaining or belonging to the Agamidæ.

II. n. A member of the family Agamidæ (which see).

agamian[2] (a-gā'mi-ąn), a. [As agamic + -i-an.] Same as agamic.

agamic (a-gam'ik), a. [< Gr. ἄγαμος, unmarried (see agamous), + -ic.] 1. Asexual: in zoöl., applied to reproduction without the congress of individuals of opposite sexes, as by fission, budding, or parthenogenesis; used also of ova capable of germination without impregnation. The word is of general application to asexual reproduction, but has some special applicability to the phenomena of alternate generation or discontinuous development which may intervene in ordinary sexual reproduction. Opposed to gamic. See agamogenesis.

The agamic reproduction of insects and other animals.
W. B. Carpenter, in Corr. of Forces, p. 425.

The agamic ova may certainly be produced, and give rise to embryos, without impregnation.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 250.

2. In bot., of or pertaining to the Agamæ or cryptogams.

agamically (a-gam'i-kąl-i), adv. In an agamic or asexual manner; asexually.

agamid (ag'ą-mid), n. A lizard of the family Agamidæ.

Agamidæ (a-gam'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Agama[1] + -idæ.] A family of saurian reptiles, order Lacertilia, superfamily Agamoidea. They are characterized by having a short, thick tongue, entire (that is, uncleft) or nearly so, and not extensible; small rhombic overlapping ventral scales; a long tail; round pupil, and eyes provided with lids. The family is very closely related to the Iguanidæ, but the dentition is acrodont, not pleurodont. It is named from the leading genus, Agama (or Amphibolurus), but contains several others, among them Draco. D. volans is the so-called flying lizard. The family is divided into Agaminæ and Draconinæ.

Agaminæ (ag-ą-mī'nē), n. pl. [< Agama[1] + -inæ.] A subfamily of agamoid lizards with no wing-like lateral expansions, a mouth of moderate size, and small conical incisors. It embraces about 70 species, inhabiting Asia, Africa, and Australasia.

agamine (ag'ą-min), n. A lizard of the subfamily Agaminæ.

agamist (ag'ą-mist), n. [< Gr. ἄγαμος, unmarried (see agamous), + -ist.] One who does not marry; one who refuses to marry; one who opposes the institution of marriage.

Agamists and wilful rejecters of matrimony.
Foxe, Book of Martyrs.

agamogenesis (ag″ą-mō-jen'e-sis), n. [< Gr. ἄγαμος, unmarried (see agamous), + γένεσις, production.] Non-sexual reproduction. (a) In zoöl., the production of young without the congress of the sexes, one of the phenomena of alternate generation; parthenogenesis: opposed to gamogenesis.

Agamogenesis is of frequent occurrence among insects, and occurs under two extreme forms; in the one, the parent is a perfect female, while the germs have all the morphological characters of eggs, and to this the term parthenogenesis ought to be restricted. In the other, the parent has incomplete female genitalia, and the germs have not the ordinary characters of insect eggs.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 383.

(b) In bot., natural reproduction by buds, offshoots, cell-division, etc.

agamogenetic (ag″ą-mō-jē-net'ik), a. [< agamogenesis, after genetic, q. v.] Of or pertaining to agamogenesis; produced without the congress of the sexes.

All known agamogenetic processes . . . end in a complete return to the primitive stock.
Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 312.

agamogenetically (ag″ą-mō-jē-net'i-kąl-i), adv. In an agamogenetic manner; by or with asexual generation.

In most Discophora, the embryo becomes a fixed actinula, . . . multiplies agamogenetically by budding, and gives rise to permanent colonies of Hydriform polyps.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 133.

agamoid (ag'a-moid), a. and n. [< Agama[1] + -oid, q. v.] I. a. In zoöl., pertaining to or resembling the Agamidæ or Agamoidea.

II. n. A lizard of the family Agamidæ or superfamily Agamoidea.

Agamoidea (ag-a-moi′dē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Agama[1] + -oidea.] A superfamily of eriglossate lacertilians, having concavo-convex vertebræ, clavicles not dilated proximally, and no postorbital or postfrontal squamosal arches. The group comprises the families Agamidæ, Iguanidæ, Xenosauridæ, Zonuridæ, and Anguidæ. See cuts under Agamidæ and Iguana.

agamous (ag′a-mus), a. [< NL. agamus, < Gr. ἀγαμος, without marriage, unmarried, < ἀ- priv. + γάμος, marriage.] 1. In bot., same as agamic. —2. In zoöl., having no distinguishable sexual organs. See agamic, 1. [Rare.]

The molluscan race are divided into two branches, the phanerogamous and the agamous or cryptogamic.
Johnston, Introd. to Conchol.

agamy (ag′a-mi), n. [< Gr. ἀγαμία, < ἀγαμος: see agamous.] Non-marriage; abstention from marriage, or rejection or non-recognition of the requirement of marriage in the relation of the sexes.

aganglionic (a-gang-gli-on′ik), a. [< Gr. ἀ priv. (a-[18]) + ganglionic.] Characterized by the absence of ganglia.

agapæ, n. Plural of agape[2].

Agapanthus (ag-a-pan′thus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀγάπη, love (see agape[2]), + ἄνθος, flower.] A name applied by florists to plants of the liliaceous genus Tulbaghia. The species are perennial herbs from southern Africa, with strap-shaped radical leaves and large umbels of bright-blue flowers. They have been long in cultivation.

agape[1] (a-gāp′ or a-gāp′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3] + gape.] With the mouth wide open; in an attitude of wonder, expectation, or eager attention.

Dazzles the crowd, and sets them all agape.
Milton, P. L., v. 357.

A fledgeling priest,
Beginning life . . . with callow beak
Agape for luck. Browning, Ring and Book, I. 61.

agape[2] (ag′a-pē), n.; pl. agapæ (-pē). [L., < Gr. ἀγάπη, love, charity in the abstract sense; ἀγαπᾶν, to love, treat with affection.] 1. A meal

Agape, or Love-feast. (From Roller's "Catacombes de Rome.")

partaken of in common by the primitive Christians, originally in connection with the Lord's supper. It was made the occasion of offerings for the poor, and closed with devotional exercises, including the kiss of love. According to late usage, agapæ were also associated with weddings, funerals, anniversaries of martyrdoms, and the dedication of churches. The loss of their original character and the growth of abuses led to the prohibition of them in church buildings, and in the fourth century to their separation from the Lord's supper and their gradual discontinuance. Vestiges of the practice, however, remained as late as the Council of Basle in the fifteenth century, and customs historically derived from it are still observed by some denominations. See love-feast.

May God speed the universal pentecost and agape of his one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church.
Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 20.

2. [cap.] [NL.] In zoöl., a genus of lepidopterous insects.

Agapemone (ag-a-pem′ō-nē), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ἀγάπη, love (see agape[2]), + μονή, a staying, a stopping-place, dwelling, < μένειν, stay, remain: see remain.] Literally, the abode of love; specifically, the name of an association of men and women established at Charlynch, Somersetshire, England, in 1846, under the direction of the Rev. Henry James Prince, the members of which lived on a common fund.

Agapemonian, Agapemonite (ag″a-pe-mō′ni-an, ag-a-pem′ō-nīt), n. An inmate of the Agapemone (which see).

agapetæ (ag-a-pē′tē), n. pl. [LL., < Gr. ἀγαπηταί, fem. pl. of ἀγαπητός, beloved, verbal adj. of ἀγαπᾶν, to love.] A title given in the early ages of the church to virgins who dwelt, in a state of so-called spiritual love, with monks and others professing celibacy. This intercourse occasioned scandal, and was condemned by the Lateran Council in 1139.

Agaphelinæ (a-gaf-e-lī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Agaphelus + -inæ.] A subfamily of finner whales, family Balænopteridæ, having the skin of the throat not plicated and no dorsal fin.

Agaphelus (a-gaf′e-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀγαν, very, much, + ἀφελής, smooth. These whales lack the usual folds or plaits of the throat.] The typical genus of the subfamily Agaphelinæ. A. gibbosus is the scrag-whale. E. D. Cope, 1868.

agaphite (ag′a-fīt), n. [So named by Fischer in 1816; < Agaphi, a naturalist who visited the regions in Persia where the turquoise is found, + -ite[2].] A name sometimes given to the turquoise, more especially to the fine blue variety.

Agapornis (ag-a-pôr′nis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀγάπη, love (see agape[2]), + ὄρνις, a bird.] A genus of small African parrots, including the love-birds, sometimes made the type of a subfamily Agapornithinæ. P. J. Selby, 1836. See love-bird.

Love-birds (Agapornis cana).

agart†, n. Same as acker[2], eager[2]. Sir T. Browne.

agar-agar (ä′gär-ä′gär), n. [Malay āgar-āgar.] ★An Eastern name of Ceylon moss or Bengal isinglass, consisting of dried seaweed of several species, such as Gracilaria lichenoides, Eucheuma spinosum, etc. It is used for soups and solidifying culture media. See gelose.

agaric (ag′a-rik or a-gar′ik), n. and a. [< L. agaricum, < Gr. ἀγαρικόν, a sort of tree-fungus used as tinder, named, according to Dioscorides, from the country of the Agari, in Sarmatia, where this fungus abounded.] I. n. A fungus of the genus Agaricus. Among the old herbalists the name had a wider range, including the corky fungi growing on trunks of trees, like the "female agaric," Polyporus officinalis, to which the word was originally applied, and which is still known as agaric in the materia medica. See Agaricus, Boletus, and Polyporus.—Agaric-gnat, a dipterous insect of the family Mycetophilidæ (which see).

II. a. Of or pertaining to agarics; fungoid.—Agaric mineral, a very soft and light variety of calcite or calcium carbonate. It is generally pure white, found chiefly in the clefts of rocks and at the bottom of some lakes in a loose or semi-indurated form resembling a fungus. The name is also applied to a stone of loose consistence found in Tuscany, of which bricks may be made so light as to float in water, and of which the ancients are supposed to have made their floating bricks. It is a hydrated silicate of magnesium, mixed with lime, alumina, and a small quantity of iron. Also called mountain-milk and mountain-meal.

Agaricia (ag-a-risʻi-ä), n. [NL., < Agaricus, q. v.] A genus of aporose sclerodermatous stonecorals, of the family Fungidæ, or mushroom-corals. Lamarck, 1801.

agariciform (a-gar′i-si-fôrm), a. [< NL. Agaricus, agaric, + L. -formis, < forma, form.] Mushroom-shaped.

agaricin (a-gar′i-sin), n. [< agaric + -in[2].] A white crystalline substance obtained from the white agaric, Polyporus officinalis.

Agaricini (a-gar-i-sī′nī), n. pl. [NL., < Agaricus.] An order of fungi having the fruit-bearing surface arranged in radiating gills, as in the mushrooms and toadstools.

agaricoid (a-gar′i-koid), a. Of the nature of an agaric; mushroom-like.

Agaricus (a-gar′i-kus), n. [NL., masc., < L. agaricum, prop. neut. adj.: see agaric.] A large Common Mushroom (Agaricus campestris).

and important genus of fungi, characterized by having a fleshy cap or pileus, and a number of radiating plates or gills on which are produced the naked spores. The name is now applied by Saccardo to a group of species closely related to the common edible mushroom, A. campestris. The spores are brown and the gills free from the stem, which is furnished with an annulus or ring. About eighty species are described. They grow upon the ground, some preferring open fields, others woodland, and are distributed throughout the world. Most of the species are edible. See mushroom.

Agarista (ag-a-ris′tä), n. [NL.] The typical genus of the family Agaristidæ. Leach.

Agaristidæ (ag-a-ris′ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Agarista + -idæ.] A family of heterocerous lepidopterous insects, or moths, typified by the genus Agarista.

agastt, v. t. [< ME. agasten, pp. agast: see aghast, gast, ghost.] 1. To frighten; terrify: usually in past participle agast, now written aghast (which see).

Or other grisly thing that him aghast.
Spenser, F. Q., I. ix. 21.

2. Reflexively, to be terrified.

The rynges on the temple dore that honge,
And eek the dores, clatereden ful faste,
Of which Arcita somwhat hym agaste.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 2424.

Agastreæ (a-gas′trē-ē), n. pl. [NL.: see Agastria.] A term proposed in 1874 by Huxley as a provisional designation of one of two divisions of metazoic animals (the other being Gastreæ), by which the orders Cestoidea and Acanthocephala, which have no alimentary canal or proper digestive cavity, are contrasted with all other Metazoa. Jour. Linn. Soc., XII. 226.

Some alterations in this scheme have since been made; . . . the Agastreæ are relegated, the Cestoidea to Trematoda and Acanthocephala to the Nematoidea.
Pascoe, Zoöl. Class., p. 4.

Agastria (a-gas′tri-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + γαστήρ, stomach.] A term of no exact signification in modern biology, but formerly employed to designate certain low organisms which have no proper digestive cavity. Also called Agastrica.

agastric (a-gas′trik), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + γαστήρ, stomach: see gastric.] Without a stomach or proper intestinal canal, as the tapeworm.

Agastrica (a-gas′tri-kä), n. pl. Same as Agastria.

agate[1] (a-gāt′), prep. phr. as adv. [< ME. on gate: on, E. a[3], on; gate, E. gate[2], way: see gate[2] and gait.] On the way; going; agoing; in motion: as, "set him agate again," Lingua, iii. 6; "set the bells agate," Cotgrave. [Old and prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

agate[2] (ag′āt), n. [Early mod. E. aggat, aggot, aggott, agat, agot, agath (= D. agaat = Sw. Dan. agat), < OF. agate, later "agathe, an agate" (Cotgrave), mod. F. agate = Pr. agathes, achates = Sp. Pg. It. agata = MHG. G. achat, < L. achates, < Gr. ἀχάτης, an agate: so called, according to Pliny, because first found near the river Ἀχάτης, in Sicily.]

Agate, polished, showing banded structure.

1. A variety of quartz which is peculiar in consisting of bands or layers of various colors blended together. It is essentially a variegated chalcedony, but some of the bands may consist of other varieties of quartz, for the most part cryptocrystalline. The varied manner in which these materials are arranged causes the agate when polished to assume characteristic differences of appearance, and thus certain varieties are distinguished, as ribbon-agate, fortification-agate, zone-agate, star-agate, moss-agate, clouded agate, etc. See also cut under concentric. Agate is found chiefly in trap-rocks and serpentine, often in the form of nodules, called geodes. It is esteemed the least valuable of the precious stones. Agates are cut and polished in large quantities at Oberstein in Oldenburg, Germany, where also artificial means are used to produce striking varieties of color in these stones. In Scotland also they are cut and polished, under the name of Scotch pebbles. They are used for rings, seals, cups, beads, boxes, handles of small utensils, burnishers, pestles and mortars, and, in delicate mechanism, as bearing-surfaces, pivots, and the knife-edges of weighing apparatus. In Shakspere agate is a symbol of littleness or smallness, from the little figures cut in these stones when set in rings.

I was never manned with an agate till now.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., i. 2.

2. A draw-plate used by gold-wire drawers, named from the piece of agate through which the eye is drilled.—3. In printing, type of a size between pearl and nonpareil, giving about 160 lines to the foot. It is used chiefly in newspapers. In Great Britain it is known as ruby.

This line is printed in agate.

4. An instrument used by bookbinders for polishing; a burnisher. McElrath, Com. Dict.— 5. A child's playing-marble made of agate, or of glass in imitation of agate.

agate-glass (ag'āt-glȧs), n. A variegated glass made by melting together waste pieces of colored glass.

agate-shell (ag'āt-shel), n. A popular name of certain large shells of the genus Achatina (which see).

agate-snail (ag'āt-snāl), n. A species of the genus Achatina (which see).

agate-ware (ag'āt-wâr), n. 1. Pottery mottled and veined in imitation of agate.— 2. A variety of enameled iron or steel household ware.

Agathis (ag'a-this), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀγαθίς, a ball of thread.] 1. In bot., the name given by Salisbury in 1807 to the genus Dammara, named by Rumphius (pub. 1741).— 2. In zoöl., a genus of ichneumon-flies, of the family Braconidæ. Latreille, 1804.

agathism (ag'ą-thizm), n. [< Gr. ἀγαθός, good, + -ism.] The doctrine that all things tend toward ultimate good.

agathist (ag'ą-thist), n. [< Gr. ἀγαθός, good, + -ist.] One who holds the doctrine of agathism.

agathocacological (ag″ą-thō-kak″ō-loj'i-kal), a. [< Gr. ἀγαθός, good, + κακός, bad, + -λογία (-λογικός), < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] Composed of good and evil; pertaining to both good and evil. Southey, Doctor, I. 120.

★agathodæmon (ag″ą-thō-dē'mon), n. [< Gr. ἀγαθοδαίμων, prop. written separately ἀγαθὸς δαίμων: ἀγαθός, good; δαίμων, spirit, demon: see demon.] A good genius or spirit; a male divinity corresponding to the female Agathe Tyche, or Good Fortune. At Athens, and elsewhere in ancient Greece, it was customary at the end of a meal to pour out in his honor a libation of pure wine.

agathodæmonic (ag″ą-thō-dē-mon'ik), a. [< Gr. ἀγαθοδαίμων: see agathodæmon and demonic.] Relating to or of the nature of an agathodæmon; pertaining to an agathodæmon.

agathopoietic (ag″ą-thō-poi-et'ik), a. [Prop. agathopœetic or -poetic, < Gr. ἀγαθοποιεῖν, do good, < ἀγαθός, good, + ποιεῖν, do: see poetic.] Intended to do good; benevolent. Bentham. [Rare.]

Agathosma (ag-ą-thoz'mȧ), n. [NL. (Willdenow, 1809), < Gr. ἀγαθός, good, + ὀσμή, smell.] An untenable name for Hartogia, a genus of South African heath-like shrubs of the family Rutaceæ. It is closely related to the genus Parapetalifera, from which the heavy-scented drug buchu is obtained. See Barosma and Hartogia (in supplement).

agatiferous (ag-ą-tif'e-rus), a. [< agate[2] + -i-ferous, < L. ferre = E. bear[1].] Containing or producing agates. Craig.

agatiform (ag'ą-ti-fôrm), a. [< agate[2] + -i-form, < L. forma, form.] Having the form of an agate; resembling an agate in appearance.

agatine (ag'ą-tin), a. [< agate[2] + -ine[1].] Pertaining to or resembling agate.

agatize (ag'ą-tīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. agatized, ppr. agatizing. [< agate[2] + -ize.] To change into agate. Also spelled agatise.— Agatized wood, silicified wood in the form of agate.

agaty (ag'ą-ti), a. [< agate[2] + -y.] Of the nature of or resembling agate: as, "an agaty ★flint," Woodward.

Agave (a-gā'vē), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀγανή, noble, used also as a proper name, Ἀγανή, L. Agaue, Agave; fem. of ἀγανός, noble, illustrious, akin to γαίειν, be proud, rejoice, and to L. gaudium, joy.] A genus of North American amaryllidaceous plants, with about 150 species, chiefly Mexican. They are acaulescent or nearly so, of slow growth, often large, consisting of a dense cluster of rigid fleshy leaves, which are spine-tipped and usually spinosely toothed. The best-known species is the century-plant, or American aloe, A. Americana, first introduced from Mexico into Europe in 1561, and now frequently cultivated for ornament, as are also various other species. It lives many years, 10 to 50 or more, before flowering, whence the name century-plant. At maturity it throws up rapidly from its center a tall scape bearing a large compound inflorescence, and dies after perfecting its fruit. It is extensively cultivated in Mexico under the name of maguey, and is put to many uses. The sap, obtained in abundance from the plant when the flowering stem is just ready to burst forth, produces when fermented a beverage resembling cider, called by the Mexicans pulque. An extract of the leaves is used as a substitute for soap, and the flower-stem, when withered, is cut up into slices to form razor-strops. The leaves of nearly all the species yield a more or less valuable fiber, which is made into thread and ropes and has been used in the manufacture of paper. Sisal hemp, or henequin, is the product of A. rigida, and is exported in large quantities from Yucatan. A West Indian species, A. Keratto, closely resembling A. Americana, yields the keratto fiber. A. Virginica, of the southern United States, known as false aloe, belongs to a group of species with less rigid leaves and with the solitary flowers in a simple spike.

Century-Plant (Agave Americana).

agaze (ą-gāz'), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< ME. a gase: a, E. a[3]; gase, E. gaze.] On the gaze; in a gazing attitude.

agazed† (ą-gāzd'), p. a. [< ME. agased; prob. same as agast, modified toward gaze: see agast, aghast, and gaze. The examples cited below are the only ones found.] Aghast; astonished.

The [they] were so sore agased.
Chester Plays, ii. 85.

Whereatt this dreadful conquerour Thereatt was sore agazed.
Percy's Folio MSS. (ed. Hales and Furnivall), iii. 154

As ankered faste my spirites doe all resorte
To stand agazed, and sink in more and more.
Surrey, Songes and Sonnettes (1557).

Of understanding rob'd, I stand agaz'd. (1600.)
In E. Farr's Select Poetry (1845), II. 438. (N. E. D.)

The French exclaim'd, The devil was in armes;
All the whole army stood agaz'd on him.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., i. 1.

★age (āj), n. [< ME. age, later sometimes, in OF. spelling, aege, eage, aage, < OF. aage, eage, eage, earlier edage, F. âge = Pr. atge, < ML. ætaticum*, < L. æta (ī-)s, age (> OF. ae), a contr. of earlier ævita (ī-)s, which reappears in ML. in the sense of eternity (cf. æternus, eternal: see eternal and eternity), < ævum, OL. aevom = Gr. αἰών (αἰϝών*), a period of existence, an age, a lifetime, a long space of time, eternity (see æon, eon), = Goth. aiws, an age, eternity (acc. aiw, used adverbially, ever, with neg., ni aiw, never), = AS. ā = Icel. ei, E. aye, ever, = AS. ēw, ē, life, custom, law, marriage: see ay[1], aye[1].] 1. The length of time during which a being or thing has existed; length of life or existence to the time spoken of; period or stage of life in the history of an individual existence, animate or inanimate: as, his age is twenty years; he died at the age of eighty; at your age you should know better; a tree or a building of unknown age; to live to a great age; old age.

Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age.
Luke iii. 23.

2. Duration of existence, specifically or generally; the lifetime of an individual, or of the individuals of a class or species on an average: as, the age of the horse is from twenty-five to thirty years.

What fame is left for human deeds
In endless age? Tennyson, In Mem., lxxiii.

The ages of the patriarchs before the flood have been a subject of critical dispute. Am. Cyc., I. 181.

3. A period of human life usually marked by a certain stage of physical or mental development; especially, a degree of development, approximately or presumptively measured by years from birth, which involves responsibility to law and capacity to act with legal effect: as, the age of discretion or of maturity (the former technically occurring some years prior to the latter, about the age of fourteen). More specifically, of age, full age, or lawful age designates the attainment of majority, or that period when the general disabilities of infancy cease. It is fixed by the law of England and of most of the United States at 21 (in some States at 18 for females), but in Germany and some other European states at 24 or 25. At common law one is of full age the first instant of the beginning of the day before the 21st anniversary of one's birth. Other periods are fixed for special purposes: thus, the age of consent for marriage was fixed by the common law at 14 for males and 12 for females, not as being a marriageable age in the ordinary sense of being a suitable age for marriage, but as being the age after which one contracting marriage could not justly repudiate its obligations on the mere ground of youth. For the purposes of consent which will preclude charges of abduction and the like, the age of consent has been fixed in some jurisdictions at 16. Up to the age of 7 a child is conclusively presumed to be incapable of criminal intent; from 7 to 14 (in some jurisdictions 12) it is presumed to be incapable of such intent, but the contrary may be proved; over that age it is presumed to be capable of such intent. At 12 the capacity to take the oath of allegiance begins. The age of discretion, in the sense in which the term is used in the law of infancy, is 14, after which the child's wishes as to the choice of a guardian are consulted (sometimes called the age of election); and the entire period before the age of 14 is called the age of nurture. The age at which testamentary capacity begins in most of the United States is 21, with exceptions, many allowing a younger age for wills of personal property, and also for females or for married women.

He is of age, ask him. John ix. 21.

4. The particular period of life at which one becomes naturally or conventionally qualified or disqualified for anything: as, at 46 a man is over age and cannot be enlisted; under age for the presidency; canonical age (which see, below).

Sara . . . was delivered of a child when she was past age. Heb. xi. 11.

5. Specifically, old age (see 1); the latter part of life or of long-continued existence; the lapse of time, especially as affecting a person's physical or mental powers; the state of being old; oldness.

The eyes of Israel were dim for age. Gen. xlviii. 10.

Age cannot wither her, nor custom stale
Her infinite variety. Shak., A. and C., ii. 2.

6. An aged person, or old people collectively.

And age in love loves not to have years told.
Shak., Sonnets, cxxxviii.

7. One of the periods or stages of development into which human life may be divided; time of life: as, life is divided into four ages, infancy, youth, manhood or womanhood, and old age.

All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players:
They have their exits, and their entrances;
And one man in his time plays many parts,
His acts being seven ages.
Shak., As you Like it, ii. 7.

Just at the age 'twixt boy and youth,
When thought is speech and speech is truth.
Scott, Marmion, Int. to ii.

8. A particular period of history, as distinguished from others; a historical epoch: as, the golden age; the age of heroes; the age of Pericles; the dramatists of the Elizabethan age. See ages in mythology and history, below.

Intent on her, who, rapt in glorious dreams,
The second-sight of some Astræan age,
Sat compass'd with professors.
Tennyson, Princess, ii.

Our nineteenth century is the age of tools.
Emerson, Works and Days.

9. In geol., a great period of the history of the earth, characterized by the development of some particular phase of organic life or of physical condition: as, the age of reptiles; the age of ice. In Dana's scheme of classification, the Silurian is the age of invertebrates, the Devonian the age of fishes, the Mesozoic the age of reptiles, the Tertiary the age of mammals, and the Quaternary the age of man.

10. The people who live at a particular period; hence, a generation or a succession of generations: as, ages yet unborn.— 11. [Cf. L. sæculum, an age, a century: see secular.] A century; the period of one hundred years, as in the phrases dark ages, middle ages, etc.

Henry . . . justly and candidly apologizes for these five ages. Hallam.

12. A great length of time; a protracted period: as, I have not seen you for an age.

13. In the game of poker, the eldest hand, or the first player to the left of the dealer who is obliged to put up a blind, and, as compensation, is given the privilege of having the last say as to whether or not he will bet.— Age of acrogens. See acrogen.— Age of the moon, the time elapsed since her last conjunction with the sun.— Ages in mythology and history, particular periods in the life of mankind distinguished by bearing specific names. The most important of these periods are: (a) The poetic division of human existence into the golden, silver, heroic (generally omitted), brazen, and iron ages, accredited to Hesiod (about the eighth century B. C.), who regarded the people of the different ages as constituting distinct races successively replacing each other. See extract. The terms are still in use, especially golden age, which is applied to the culminating or most brilliant epoch of any portion of history or department of activity: as, the seventeenth century was the golden age of the drama; the nineteenth century is the golden age of invention; the golden age of a country's power or prosperity.

The golden age [of Hesiod], synchronous with the reign of Saturn, was a period of patriarchal simplicity, when the earth yielded its fruits spontaneously and spring was eternal; the silver age, governed by Jupiter, was a lawless time, in which the seasons were first divided, agriculture took its rise, and men began to hold property in land; the brazen age, or reign of Neptune, was an epoch of war and violence; in the heroic age (omitted by Ovid) the world began to aspire toward better things; and in the iron or Plutonian age, in which Hesiod believed himself to be living, justice and piety had disappeared from the earth. Am. Cyc., I. 185.

(b) The dark ages, a period of European history, beginning with or shortly before the fall of the Roman Empire of the West (A. D. 476), marked by a general decline of learning and civilization. It was introduced by the great influx of barbarians into western Europe in the fourth and fifth centuries known as the wandering of the nations, and is reckoned by Hallam as extending to the eleventh century, when a general revival of wealth, manners, taste, and learning began, and by others to the time of Dante in the thirteenth century, or later. (c) The middle ages, a period of about a thousand years, between the close of what is technically considered ancient history and the first definite movements in Europe of the distinctively modern spirit of freedom and enterprise. Its beginning is synchronous with that of the dark ages, and it is variously reckoned as extending to the fall of Constantinople (1453), the invention of printing, the Renaissance, or the discovery of America, in the fifteenth century, or to the Reformation, in the early part of the sixteenth. (d) The feudal ages, a portion of the middle ages, marked by the prevalence of feudal institutions and of the spirit of chivalry, extending from their nearly universal establishment in the tenth century to their decline in the sixteenth.—Archæological ages or periods, the stone age, the bronze age, and the iron age, these names being given in accordance with the materials employed for weapons, implements, etc., during the particular period. Properly speaking, these three terms are applicable to the archæology of the old world only. They are, however, often used in a more general sense, without reference to this limitation. In such cases the word age has no reference to chronology, but simply denotes the stage at which a people has arrived in its progress toward civilization. Thus there are tribes yet in their stone age. Neither do the more primitive implements necessarily disappear wholly on the appearance of those of a more advanced stage. The stone age has been subdivided into two divisions, the paleolithic and the neolithic (see these words). The former applies to the times previous to the present geological period.—Canonical age. (a) In the Rom. Cath. Ch., that age fixed by the church at which her subjects incur, or become capable of assuming, special obligations, states of life, etc., or of enjoying special privileges and dignities. Thus, the obligation of fasting begins at twenty-one; profession by religious vows is made only after the age of sixteen; and to become a bishop one should have completed his thirtieth year. The age of reason is that at which a child becomes morally responsible, supposed, in the majority of cases, to be about seven. (b) In Anglican churches, the age at which a man may be ordained to any one of the three grades of the ministry.—Dark ages. See above.—Fabulous age. See fabulous.—Geological ages. See above, 9.—Middle ages. See above.—The age of a horse, in racing and trotting rules, is reckoned from January 1st of the year of foaling. Other dates, as May-day, were formerly used.=Syn. Era, Period, etc. (see epoch), date; years, eon, cycle.

Implements of the Stone Age.

1, saw-edged flint knife; 2, crescent-shaped flint knife; 3, stone ax; 4, flint flake-knife; 5, harpoon-head of flint; 6, flint knife.

★age (āj), v.; pret. and pp. aged, ppr. aging. [< ME. agen, agyn, < age, n.] I. intrans. To grow old; assume the appearance of old age: as, he ages rapidly.

I am aging; that is, I have a whitish, or rather a light-coloured hair here and there. Landor.

II. trans. To make old; cause to grow or to seem old; produce the effect of age upon; bring to maturity or to a state fit for use; give the character of age or ripeness to: as, to age wine, clay, etc.

-age. [< ME. -age, < OF. -age, mod. F. -age = Pr. -atge = Sp. -age = It. -aggio and -atico, < L. -āticum, a noun suffix, orig. neut. of -āticus, adj. suffix. For examples see savage, voyage, etc.] A noun suffix of French, ultimately of Latin origin. Frequent in words taken from the French, as language, savage, voyage, pottage, baggage, etc., it has come to be a common English formative, forming, (a) from names of things, collective nouns, as fruitage, leafage, baggage, etc.; (b) from personal terms, nouns denoting condition, office, rank, service, fee, etc., as bondage, parsonage, porterage, etc.; (c) from verbs, nouns expressing various relations, as breakage, cleavage, postage, steerage, etc.

★aged (ā′jed, sometimes ājd), p. a. [ME. aged, agyd; < age, v., + -ed[2].] 1. Old; having lived or existed long; having reached an advanced period of life: as, an aged man; an aged oak.

Shall aged men, like aged trees,
Strike deeper their vile root, and closer cling,
Still more enamour'd of their wretched soil?
Young, Night Thoughts, iv. 111.

[In running races, a horse is said to be aged (pron. ājd) when he is more than seven years old.]

2. Of the age of: as, a man aged forty years.—3. Pertaining to or characteristic of old age.

These bitter tears, which now you see Filling the aged wrinkles in my cheeks.
Shak., Tit. And., iii. 1.

=Syn. 1. Aged, Elderly, Old, Ancient. Old is the general word for being near to the natural end, or having nearly reached the usual period, of life: as, a cat is old at twelve years. Elderly is rather old, beginning to be old. Aged is very old. Ancient is so old as to seem to belong to a past age. (See other comparisons under ancient.)

The aged man that coffers up his gold
Is plagu'd with cramps and gouts and painful fits.
Shak., Lucrece, l. 855.

It is a great misfortune to us of the more elderly sort, that we were bred to the constant use of words in English children's books, which were without meaning for us and only mystified us. O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 172.

You are old;
Nature in you stands on the very verge
Of her confine. Shak., Lear, ii. 4.

Change "The Ancient Mariner" to "The Old Sailor," and you throw the mind into a mood utterly inharmonious with the tone of Coleridge's wonderful poem.
A. S. Hill, Rhetoric.

agedly (ā′jed-li), adv. Like an aged person.

agedness (ā′jed-nes), n. The state or condition of being old; oldness.

Custom without truth is but agedness of error.
Milton, Reform. of Church Discipline, i. 26.

agee (a-jē′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. Same as ajee.

ageing, n. See aging.

Agelæinæ (aj″e-lē-ī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Agelæus + -inæ.] A subfamily of American oscine Marsh-Blackbird (Agelæus tricolor).

passerine birds of the family Icteridæ. It is related to the conirostral Fringillidæ, or finches, less nearly to the crows, Corvidæ, and to some extent it replaces and represents in America the old-world Sturnidæ, or starlings. The subfamily includes the marsh-blackbirds of the genus Agelæus, as the common red-winged blackbird of the United States, A. phœniceus; the yellow-headed blackbird, Xanthocephalus icterocephalus; the cow-bird, Molothrus ater; the bobolink, Dolichonyx oryzivorus; and numerous related species, chiefly of the warmer parts of America. Less correctly written Agelainæ.

Agelæus (aj-e-lē′us), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀγελαῖος, belonging to a herd, gregarious, < ἀγέλη, a herd (L. grex), < ἀγειν, drive.] The typical genus of blackbirds of the subfamily Agelæinæ; the marsh-blackbirds. There are several species, such as A. phœniceus, the common red-winged marsh-blackbird of the United States, and A. tricolor of California. Also spelled Agelaius, as originally by Vieillot, 1816.

agelast (aj′e-last), n. [< Gr. ἀγέλαστος, not laughing, < ἀ- priv. + γελαστός, verbal adj. of γελᾶν, laugh.] One who never laughs. [Rare.]

agen (a-gen′), adv., prep., and conj. An old spelling of again, still occasionally used.

Borne far asunder by the tides of men,
Like adamant and steel they meet agen.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., i.

★agency (ā′jen-si), n.; pl. agencies (-siz). [= F. agence, < ML. agentia, < L. agen(t-)s, ppr. of agere, act: see agent.] 1. The state of being in action or of exerting power; action; operation; instrumentality.

The agency of providence in the natural world.
Woodward, Pref. to Ess. toward Nat. Hist. of Earth.

For the first three or four centuries we know next to nothing of the course by which Christianity moved, and the events through which its agency was developed.
De Quincey, Essenes, i.

2. A mode of exerting power; a means of producing effects.

But although the introduction of a fluid as an Agent explains nothing, the fluid as an Agency—i. e., its hydrodynamic laws—explains much.
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, I. i. § 92.

Opinion is the agency through which character adapts external arrangements to itself.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 517.

3. The office of agent or factor; the business of an agent intrusted with the concerns of another: as, the principal pays the charges of agency.—4. The place of business of an agent. In the United States, frequently used in the sense of an Indian agency, an office or settlement in or near the reservation of an Indian tribe, at which resides an Indian agent of the government, charged with the interests of the tribe and the care of the relations of the government to it: as, the Pawnee agency.—Free agency. See free.

agend† (ā′jend), n. Same as agendum (c).

agendum (a-jen′dum), n.; pl. agenda (-dä). [L., something to be done, neut. of agendus, gerundive of agere, do: see agent, act.] A thing to be done: usually in the plural, things to be done; duties. Specifically—(a) Items of business to be brought before a committee, council, board, etc., as things to be done. (b) Matters of practice, as opposed to credenda, or matters of belief.

The moral and religious credenda and agenda of any good man. Coleridge.

Especially—(c†) Matters of ecclesiastical practice; ritual or liturgy. (d) As a collective singular, a memorandum-book. [Rare in all uses.]

agenesia (aj-e-nē′si-ä), n. [NL.] Same as agenesis.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 902.

Agent intellect. See intellect.

II. n. [< F. agent, < ML. agen(t-)s, a deputy, attorney, factor, etc., substantive use of L. agen(t-)s, ppr. of agere: see above.] 1. An active cause; an efficient cause; one who or that which acts or has the power to act: as, a moral agent; many insects are agents of fertilization. In phys., heat, light, and electricity are called agents, in order to avoid hypothesis with regard to their nature. In chem. and med., whatever produces a chemical or medical effect is called an agent.

Heaven made us agents free to good or ill,
And forc'd it not, though he foresaw the will.
Dryden, Cock and Fox, l. 538.

To say that man is a free agent is no more than to say that, in some instances, he is truly an agent and a cause, and is not merely acted upon as a passive instrument. On the contrary, to say that he acts from necessity is to say that he does not act at all, that he is no agent, and that, for anything we know, there is only one agent in the universe, who does everything that is done, whether it be good or ill. Reid.

Thro' many agents making strong,
Matures the individual form.
Tennyson, Love thou thy Land.

2. A person acting on behalf of another, called his principal; a representative; a deputy, factor, substitute, or attorney. Often abbreviated to agt. In law, agent implies a kind of service in which the one serving has some discretion as to the manner of accomplishing the object.

The house in Leadenhall street is nothing more than a change for their agents, factors, and deputies to meet in, to take care of their affairs, and to support their interests. Burke.

In the evening arrived . . . one of the three agents of the Ohio company, sent to complete the negotiations for Western lands. Bancroft, Hist. Const., II. 110.

3. An official: as, an agent of police.—Agent and patient, in law, a person who is both the doer of a thing and the party to whom it is done; thus, when a person who owes money to another dies and makes the creditor his executor, the latter may retain out of the estate as much as satisfies his claim, and is thus said to be agent and patient. [Rare.]—Agent of truancy, the name given to a class of officers or employees serving under the local school authorities in several cities of New York State, to enforce the provisions of the Compulsory Education Act, requiring the attendance of children at school.—Catalytic agent. See catalytic.—Crown agent. See crown.—First agent, an agent not incited by another.—General agent, an agent whose authority, though it may be limited to a particular trade or business, and a particular place, is general in respect to extending to all acts of a kind ordinarily involved in the matters in question.—Morbific agent, in med., a cause of disease.—Therapeutic agent, in med., a substance, as for example morphine, or a form of motion, as heat or electricity, used in treating disease.—Voluntary or free agent, one who may do or not do any action, and has the conscious perception that his actions result from the exercise of his own will. See free.

agential (ā-jen'shal), a. [< ML. agentia, agency, < L. agen(t-)s: see agent.] Pertaining to an agent or to an agency.

agentship† (ā'jent-ship), n. The office of an agent; agency. Beau. and Fl.

age-prayer (āj'prār), n. [< age + prayer, after Law L. ætatis precatio, a plea of age, or ætatem precari, plead age, AF. age prier: see age and pray.] In early Eng. law, a suggestion of nonage, made in a real action to which an infant was a party, with a request that the proceedings be stayed until the infant should come of age. Also called plea of parol demurrer. Stimson.

ager (ā'jėr), n. [L., = E. acre, q. v.] In civil law, a field; generally, a portion of land inclosed by definite boundaries.

agerasia (aj-ē-rā'si-ą), n. [NL., Englished agerasy, < Gr. ἀγηρασία, eternal youth, < ἀγήρατος, ἀγήραος, ἀγήρως, not growing old: see Ageratum.] A green old age; freshness and vigor of mind and body late in life. [Rare.]

agerasy (aj'ē-rā-si), n. Same as agerasia.

Ageratum (a-jer'a-tum), n. [NL.; also, as L., ageraton, < Gr. ἀγήρατον, an aromatic plant, perhaps yarrow or milfoil, Achillea ageratum; prop. neut. of ἀγήρατος, ἀγήραος, ἀγήρως, not growing old, undecaying, < ἀ- priv. + γῆρας, old age.] A genus of herbaceous composite plants, all American and chiefly tropical, nearly allied to Eupatorium. A. conyzoides (A. Mexicanum) is a well-known flower-border annual, with dense lavender-blue heads, which keep their color long.

Ageronia (aj-ē-rō'ni-ą), n. [NL.] A genus of American butterflies of the family Nymphalidæ. A. (Amphichlora) fornax occurs in the southwestern part of the United States.

ageusia, ageusis (a-gū'si-ą, -sis), n. [NL.] Same as ageustia.

ageustia (a-gūs'ti-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀγευστία, a fasting, < ἀγευστος, fasting, not tasting, < ἀ- priv., not, + γευστός, verbal adj. of γεύεσθαι, taste, akin to L. gustus, taste: see *gust*².] In med., a defect or loss of taste, occurring in colds and fevers, or arising from nervous disease.

aggat†, n. Obsolete spelling of *agate*².

aggelation† (aj-e-lā'shọn), n. [< ML. aggelatio(n-), < L. ad, to, + gelare, freeze: see congeal.] Congelation; freezing. Sir T. Browne.

aggeneration† (a-jen-ę-rā'shọn), n. [< L. aggenerare, adgenerare, beget additionally, < ad, to, + generare, beget: see generate.] The act of generating or producing in addition. N. E. D.

agger (aj'ėr), n. [L., a pile, heap, mound, dike, mole, pier, etc., < aggerere, adgerere, bring together, < ad, to, + gerere, carry.] 1. In Rom. antiq., an earthwork or any artificial mound or rampart, as, in Rome, the agger of Servius Tullius.—2. A Roman road or military way, so called because these roads were raised in the middle to turn water to the sides.

aggerate† (aj'ę-rāt), v. t. [< L. aggeratus, pp. of aggerāre, adgerāre, form an agger or heap, heap up, < agger: see agger. Cf. exaggerate.] To heap up. Bailey.

aggeration† (aj-ę-rā'shọn), n. [< L. aggeratio(n-), < aggerāre: see aggerate.] A heaping; accumulation: as, "aggerations of sand," Ray, Diss. of World, v. § 1.

aggerose (aj'ę-rōs), a. [< L. as if aggerosus*, < agger: see agger.] In heaps; formed in heaps. Dana.

aggest† (a-jest'), v. t. [< L. aggestus, pp. of aggerere, adgerere, bring together: see agger.] To heap up.

aggett, aggett†, n. Obsolete spellings of *agate*².

agglomerate (a-glom'ę-rāt), v.; pret. and pp. agglomerated, ppr. agglomerating. [< L. agglomeratus, pp. of agglomerare, adglomerare, wind into a ball, < ad, to, + glomerare, wind into a ball, < glomus (glomer-), a ball, akin to globus, a ball: see globe. Cf. conglomerate.] I. trans. To collect or gather into a mass.

In one agglomerated cluster hung. Young, Night Thoughts, ix. 1911.

There is to an American something richly artificial and scenic, as it were, in the way these colossal dwellings are packed together in their steep streets, in the depths of their little enclosed, agglomerated city. H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 261.

II. intrans. To gather, grow, or collect into a ball or mass: as, "hard, agglomerating salts," Thomson, Seasons, Autumn, l. 766.

agglomerate (a-glom'ę-rāt), a. and n. [< L. agglomeratus, pp.: see the verb.] I. a. Gathered into a ball or mass; piled together; specifically, in bot., crowded into a dense cluster, but not cohering.

II. n. 1. A fortuitous mass or assemblage of things; an agglomeration.—2. In geol., an accumulation of materials made up chiefly of large blocks "muddled together in a pell-mell way, without regard to size, shape, or weight." A. H. Green. The word is used almost exclusively for very coarse volcanic breccias which remain in craters and volcanic necks as the last product of explosive volcanism. See breccia and conglomerate.

agglomeratic (a-glom-ę-rat'ik), a. Pertaining to or having the nature of an agglomerate.

agglomeration (a-glom-ę-rā'shọn), n. [< L. agglomeratio(n-), < agglomerare: see agglomerate, v.] 1. The act of agglomerating or the state of being agglomerated; the state of gathering or being gathered into a mass.

By an undiscerning agglomeration of facts he [Berkeley] convinced numbers in his own day, and he has had believers in Ireland almost to our day, that tar-water could cure all manner of diseases. McCosh, Berkeley, p. 83.

2. That which is agglomerated; a collection; a heap; any mass, assemblage, or cluster formed by mere juxtaposition.

The charming côteau which . . . faces the town,—a soft agglomeration of gardens, vineyards, scattered villas, gables and turrets of slate-roofed châteaux, terraces with gray balustrades, moss-grown walls draped in scarlet Virginia creeper. H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 9.

★agglomerative (a-glom'ę-rā-tiv), a. Having a tendency to agglomerate or gather together.

Taylor [is] eminently discursive, accumulative, and (to use one of his own words) agglomerative. Coleridge, Poems, etc. (1817), p. 139.

★agglutinant (a-glö'ti-nant), a. and n. [< L. agglutinan(t-)s, ppr. of agglutinare: see agglutinate, v.] I. a. Uniting as glue; tending to cause adhesion.

Something strengthening and agglutinant. Gray, Works (1825), II. 192.

II. n. Any viscous substance which agglutinates or unites other substances by causing adhesion; any application which causes bodies to adhere together.

★agglutinate (a-glö'ti-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. agglutinated, ppr. agglutinating. [< L. agglutinatus, pp. of agglutinare, adglutinare, paste to, < ad, to, + glutinare, paste, < gluten, paste, glue: see gluten and glue.] To unite or cause to adhere, as with glue or other viscous substance; unite by causing an adhesion.

agglutinate (a-glö'ti-nāt), a. [< L. agglutinatus, pp.: see the verb.] United as by glue; characterized by adherence or incorporation of distinct parts or elements: as, an agglutinate language. (See below.) In bot., grown together: equivalent to accrete: applied also to fungi that are firmly attached to the matrix. Sometimes written adglutinate.—Agglutinate languages, languages exhibiting an inferior degree of integration in the elements of their words, or of unification of words, the suffixes and prefixes retaining a certain independence of one another and of the root or stem to which they are added: opposed to inflective or inflectional languages, in which the separate identity of stem and ending is more often fully lost, and the original agglutination even comes to be replaced by an internal change in the root or stem. But the distinction is of little scientific value. Turkish is a favorite example of an agglutinate tongue.

★agglutinating (a-glö'ti-nā-ting), p. a. In philol., characterized by agglutination; agglutinate (which see).

The natives [of the southern islands of the Fuegian Archipelago] . . . speak an agglutinating language, current from the middle of Beagle passage to the southernmost islands about Cape Horn. Science, III. 168.

★agglutination (a-glö-ti-nā'shọn), n. [= F. agglutination; < agglutinate, v.] 1. The act of uniting by glue or other tenacious substance; the state of being thus united; adhesion of parts; that which is united; a mass or group cemented together.—2. In philol., the condition of being agglutinate; the process or result of agglutinate combination. See agglutinate, a.

In the Aryan languages the modifications of words, comprised under declension and conjugation, were likewise originally expressed by agglutination. But the component parts began soon to coalesce, so as to form one integral word, liable in its turn to phonetic corruption to such an extent that it became impossible after a time to decide which was the root and which the modificatory element. Max Müller.

Immediate agglutination, in surg., union of the parts of a wound by the first intention (see intention), as distinguished from mediate agglutination, which is secured through the interposition of some substance, as lint, between the lips of the wound.

agglutinationist (a-glö-ti-nā'shọn-ist), n. In philol., an adherent to the theory of agglutination. See agglutinate, a. Encyc. Brit., XXI. 272.

★agglutinative (a-glö'ti-nā-tiv), a. 1. Tending or having power to agglutinate or unite; having power to cause adhesion: as, an agglutinative substance.—2. In philol., exhibiting or characterized by the formative process known as agglutination; agglutinate (which see): as, an agglutinative language.

Their fundamental common characteristic is that they [the Scythian languages] follow what is styled an agglutinative type of structure. That is to say, the elements out of which their words are formed are loosely put together, instead of being closely compacted, or fused into one. Whitney, Lang. and Study of Lang., p. 316.

aggrace† (a-grās'), v. t. [< ag- + grace, v.; suggested by OF. agracher, agrachier = It. aggraziare, formerly aggratiare, < ML. aggratiare, show grace to, < L. ad, to, + gratia, grace.] 1. To show grace or favor to. Spenser.—2. To add grace to, or make graceful.

And, that which all faire workes doth most aggrace,
The art, which all that wrought, appeared in no place.
Spenser, F. Q., II. xii. 58.

aggrace† (a-grās'), n. Kindness; favor.

aggrade (a-grād'), v. t. [< L. ad, to, + gradus, ★step. Cf. degrade.] In geol., to grade up; fill up: the opposite of degrade or wear away.

aggrandizable (ag'ran-dī-za-bl), a. [< aggrandize + -able.] Capable of being aggrandized. Also spelled aggrandisable.

aggrandization (a-gran-di-zā'shọn), n. The act of aggrandizing, or the condition or state of being aggrandized. Also spelled aggrandisation.

No part of the body will consume by the aggrandization of the other, but all motions will be orderly, and a just distribution be to all parts. Waterhouse, Fortescue, p. 197.

aggrandize (ag'ran-dīz), v.; pret. and pp. aggrandized, ppr. aggrandizing. [< F. aggrandiss-, extended stem of "aggrandir, to greaten, augment, enlarge," etc. (Cotgrave), now agrandir = It. aggrandire, enlarge, < L. ad, to, + grandire, increase, < grandis, large, great: see grand.] I. trans. 1. To make great or greater in power, wealth, rank, or honor; exalt: as, to aggrandize a family.

The Stoics identified man with God, for the purpose of glorifying man—the Neoplatonists for the purpose of aggrandising God. Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 345.

2†. To magnify or exaggerate.

If we trust to fame and reports, these may proceed . . . from small matters aggrandized. Wollaston, Religion of Nature, § 5.

3. To widen in scope; increase in size or intensity; enlarge; extend; elevate.

These furnish us with glorious springs and mediums to raise and aggrandize our conceptions. Watts, Improvement of Mind.

Covetous death bereaved us all,
To aggrandize one funeral.
Emerson, Threnody.

=Syn. 1. To honor, dignify, advance, elevate, give luster to.

II. intrans. To grow or become greater. [Rare.]

Follies, continued till old age, do aggrandize and become horrid. John Hall, Pref. to Poems.

Also spelled aggrandise.

aggrandizement (ag'ran-dīz-ment or a-gran'dīz-ment), n. [< F. "aggrandissement, a granting, enlarging, encrease, also preferment, advancement" (Cotgrave), now agrandissement: see aggrandize and -ment.] The act of aggrandizing; the state of being exalted in power, rank, or honor; exaltation; enlargement: as, the emperor seeks only the aggrandizement of his own family. Also spelled aggrandisement.

Survival of the fittest will determine whether such specially favourable conditions result in the aggrandisement of the individual or in the multiplication of the race.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 359.

=Syn. Augmentation, advancement, elevation; preferment, promotion, exaltation.

aggrandizer (ag'ran-dī-zėr), n. One who aggrandizes or exalts in power, rank, or honor. Also spelled aggrandiser.

The Island King . . .
Aggrates the Knights, who thus his right defended.
P. Fletcher, Purple Island, ii. 9. (N. E. D.)

aggravablet (ag'ra-vā-bl), a. [< L. aggrava-re (see aggravate) + E. -ble.] Tending to aggravate; aggravating.

This idolatry is the more discernible and aggravable in the invocation of saints and idols.
Dr. H. More, Antidote against Idolatry, ii.

aggravate (ag'ra-vāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. aggravated, ppr. aggravating. [< L. aggravatus, pp. of aggravare, adgravare, add to the weight of, make worse, oppress, annoy, < ad, to, + gravare, make heavy, < gravis, heavy: see grave[3]. Cf. aggrieve and aggredge.] 1†. Literally, to add weight to or upon; increase the amount, quantity, or force of; make heavier by added quantity or burden.

Then, soul, live thou upon thy servant's loss,
And let that pine to aggravate thy store.
Shak., Sonnets, cxlvi.

In order to lighten the crown still further, they aggravated responsibility on ministers of state.
Burke, Rev. in France, p. 39. (N. E. D.)

2. To make more grave or heavy; increase the weight or pressure of; intensify, as anything evil, disorderly, or troublesome: as, to aggravate guilt or crime, the evils or annoyances of life, etc.

Maim'd in the strife, the falling man sustains
Th' insulting shout, that aggravates his pains.
Crabbe, Tales of the Hall.

The [French] government found its necessities aggravated by that of procuring immense quantities of firewood.
Jefferson, Autobiog., p. 72.

In every department of nature there occur instances of the instability of specific form, which the increase of materials aggravates rather than diminishes.
A. R. Wallace, Nat. Selec., p. 165.

3. To exaggerate; give coloring to in description; give an exaggerated representation of: as, to aggravate circumstances. [Rare.]

II. n. That which aggravates or tends to aggravate or make worse.

aggravator (ag'ra-vā-tor), n. One who or that which aggravates.

aggredget, v. t. [< ME. agredgen, aggregen, agreggen, agregen, < OF. agreger, agregier = Pr. agreujar, < ML. aggreviare* for aggraviare*, equiv. to L. aggravare, to add to the weight of, make worse, oppress, annoy, aggravate: see aggravate and aggrieve, and cf. abridge, abbreviate, allege[2], alleviate.] To make heavy; aggravate; exaggerate.

aggregant (ag'rē-gant), n. [< L. aggregan(t-)s, ppr. of aggregare: see aggregate, v.] One of the particulars which go to make up an aggregate; specifically, one of a number of logical terms which are added together to make a logical sum.

Aggregata (ag-rē-gā'tă), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. aggregatus: see aggregate, v.] In Cuvier's system of classification, the second family of his Acephala nuda, or shell-less acephals; the compound or social ascidians: opposed to Segregata.

aggregate (ag'rē-gāt), v.; pret. and pp. aggregated, ppr. aggregating. [< L. aggregatus, pp. of aggregare, adgregare, lead to a flock, add to, < ad, to, + gregare, collect into a flock, < grex (greg-), a flock: see gregarious. Cf. congregate, segregate.] I. trans. 1. To bring together; collect into a sum, mass, or body: as, "the aggregated soil," Milton, P. L., x. 293.

The protoplasmic fluid within a cell does not become aggregated unless it be in a living state, and only imperfectly if the cell has been injured.
Darwin, Insectiv. Plants, p. 62.

Ideas which were only feebly connected become aggregated into a close and compact whole.
W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 93.

2. To amount to (the number of); make (the sum or total of): an elliptical use.

The guns captured . . . will aggregate in all probability five or six hundred. Morning Star, April 17, 1865. (N. E. D.)

3. To add or unite to as a constituent member; make a part of the aggregate of: as, to aggregate a person to a company or society. [Rare.]

II. intrans. To come together into a sum or mass; combine and form a collection or mass.

The taste of honey aggregates with sweet tastes in general, of which it is one — not with such tastes as those of quinine, or of castor oil.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 114.

★aggregate (ag'rē-gāt), a. and n. [< L. aggregatus, pp.: see the verb.] I. a. Formed by the conjunction or collection of particulars into a whole mass or sum; total; combined: as, the aggregate amount of indebtedness.

Societies formed by conquest may be . . . composed of two societies, which are in a large measure . . . alien; and in them there cannot arise a political force from the aggregate will.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 469.

Specifically — (a) In geol., composed of several different mineral constituents capable of being separated by mechanical means: as, granite is an aggregate rock. (b) In anat., clustered: as, aggregate glands (Peyer's glands). (c) In bot., forming a dense cluster. (d) In zoöl., compound; associated. (e) In law, composed of many individuals united into one association.—Aggregate animals, animals in which many individual organisms are united in a common "household" or œcium, as various polyps, acalephs, etc. See cuts under anthozooid and Coralligena.—Aggregate combination, in mech., a combination which causes compound motions in secondary pieces. The effects of aggregate combinations are classified as aggregate paths and aggregate velocities (which see, below).—Aggregate flower, one formed of several florets closely gathered upon a common receptacle, but not coherent, as in Compositæ.—Aggregate fruit, a fruit formed when a cluster of distinct carpels belonging to a single flower are crowded upon the common receptacle, becoming baccate or drupaceous, and sometimes more or less coherent, as in the blackberry and the fruit of the magnolia. Also sometimes used as synonymous with multiple or compound fruit (which see, under fruit). See cut under Rubus.—Aggregate glands. See gland.—Aggregate path, in mech., that path through which a part of a machine is moved, which is the resultant of the aggregate combination of the other parts which operate it. Thus, in so-called parallel motion, a movement of one part in a right line is effected by the combined and counteracting movements of other parts moving in circular arcs.—Aggregate velocity, the resultant velocity imparted by forces moving with different or with varying velocities, as the velocities imparted by systems of pulleys through trains of gearing, or by so-called differential motions.—Corporation aggregate, in law. See corporation.

II. n. 1. A sum, mass, or assemblage of particulars; a total or gross amount; any combined whole considered with reference to its constituent parts. An aggregate is essentially a sum, as, for example, a heap of sand, whose parts are loosely or accidentally associated. When the relation between the parts is more intimate — either chemical, as in a molecule or a crystal, or organic, as in a living body, or for the realization of a design, as in a house — the sum ceases to be a mere aggregate and becomes a compound, a combination, an organism, etc. But in a general way anything consisting of distinguishable elements may be called an aggregate of those elements: as, man is an aggregate of structures and organs; a mineral or volcanic aggregate (that is, a compound rock).

Looking to the aggregate of all the interests of the commonwealth.
D. Webster, Speech, Boston, June 5, 1828.

Aggregates of brilliant passages rather than harmonious wholes.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 414.

The difference between an aggregate and a product is that in the first case the component parts are simply grouped together, added; in the second, the constituent elements are blended, multiplied into each other.
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. ii. § 93.

2. Any hard material added to lime to make concrete. N. E. D.—3. Milit., the total commissioned and enlisted force of any post, department, division, corps, or other command.—In the aggregate, taken together; considered as a whole; collectively.

Our judgment of a man's character is derived from observing a number of successive acts, forming in the aggregate his general course of conduct.
Sir G. C. Lewis, Authority in Matters of Opinion, ii.

aggregated (ag'rē-gā-ted), p. a. Same as aggregate, a.

aggregately (ag'rē-gāt-li), adv. Collectively; taken together or in the aggregate.

Many little things, though separately they seem too insignificant to mention, yet aggregately are too material for me to omit.
Chesterfield, Letters, II. 347.

★aggregation (ag-rē-gā'shon), n. [< ML. aggregatio(n-), < L. aggregare: see aggregate, v.] 1. The act of collecting or the state of being collected into an unorganized whole.

By "material aggregation" being meant the way in which, by nature or by art, the molecules of matter are arranged together.
Tyndall.

Wanting any great and acknowledged centre of national life and thought, our expansion has hitherto been rather aggregation than growth.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 83.

2. In logic, the union of species to form a genus, or of terms to form a term true of anything of which any of its parts are true, and only false when all its parts are false.—3. The adding of any one to an association as a member thereof; affiliation. [Rare.]

The second [book] recounts his aggregation to the society of free-masons.
Monthly Rev., XX. 537. (N. E. D.)

4. A combined whole; an aggregate.

In the United States of America a century hence we shall therefore doubtless have a political aggregation immeasurably surpassing in power and in dimensions any empire that has as yet existed.
J. Fiske, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 139.

Creatures of inferior type are little more than aggregations of numerous like parts.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 493.

5. In bot., applied by Darwin specifically to the peculiar change induced in the cells of the tentacles of Drosera by mechanical or chemical stimulation.—Theorem of aggregation, in the theory of invariants, a theorem concerning the number of linearly independent invariants of a given type.

★aggregative (ag'rē-gā-tiv), a. [< aggregate + -ive; =F. agrégatif.] 1. Pertaining to aggregation; taken together; collective.

Other things equal, the largest mass will, because of its superior aggregative force, become hotter than the others, and radiate more intensely.
H. Spencer, Universal Progress, p. 293.

2. Tending to aggregate; gregarious; social. [Rare.]

His [Mirabeau's] sociality, his aggregative nature . . . will now be the quality of qualities for him.
Carlyle, French Rev., I. iv. 4.

aggregator (ag'rē-gā-tor), n. One who collects into a whole or mass. Burton.

aggress (a-gres'), v. [< L. aggressus, pp. of aggredi, adgredi, attack, assail, approach, go to, < ad, to, + gradi, walk, go, > gradus, step: see grade.] I. intrans. 1. To make an attack; commit the first act of hostility or offense; begin a quarrel or controversy; hence, to act on the offensive.—2. To encroach; intrude; be or become intrusive.

While the individualities of citizens are less aggressed upon by public agency, they are more protected by public agency against aggression.
H. Spencer, Pop. Sci. Mo., XX. 12.

II. trans. To attack. Quarterly Rev. [Rare.]

aggresst (a-gres'), n. [< OF. aggresse, < L. aggressus, adgressus, an attack, < aggredi, adgredi: see aggress, v.] Aggression; attack.

Military aggresses upon others.
Sir M. Hale, Pleas of the Crown, xv.

aggressin (a-gres'in), n. [< L. aggressus, an attack, + E. -in[2].] A substance produced in the blood-serum or tissue-fluids, possibly a bacterial endotoxin, which exerts a benumbing or paralyzing action on the leucocytes, thereby preventing phagocytosis.

aggression (a-gresh'on), n. [< F. aggression, attack, now agression, < L. aggressio(n-), < aggredi, adgredi: see aggress, v.] 1. The act of proceeding to hostilities or invasion; a breach of the peace or right of another or others; an assault, inroad, or encroachment;

hence, any offensive action or procedure: as, an aggression upon a country, or upon vested rights or liberties.

We have undertaken to resent a supreme insult, and have had to bear new insults and aggressions, even to the direct menace of our national capital.
O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 103.

2. The practice of making assaults or attacks; offensive action in general.

Only this policy of unceasing and untiring aggression, this wearing out and crushing out, this war upon all the resources and all the armies of the rebellion, could now succeed. Badeau, Mil. Hist. of Grant, II. 10.

= Syn. Attack, invasion, assault, encroachment, injury, offense.

aggressionist (a-gresh'ọn-ist), n. [< aggression + -ist.] One who commits or favors aggression.

Aggressionists would much more truly describe the anti-freetraders than the euphemistic title "protectionists"; since, that one producer may gain, ten consumers are fleeced. H. Spencer, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXV. 156.

★aggressive (a-gres'iv), a. [< aggress + -ive; = F. agressif.] Characterized by aggression; tending to aggress; prone to begin a quarrel; making the first attack; offensive, as opposed to defensive: as, the minister pursued an aggressive foreign policy.

That which would be violent if aggressive, might be justified if defensive. Phillimore's Reports, II. 135.

I do not think there is ever shown, among Italians, either the aggressive pride or the abject meanness which marks the intercourse of people and nobles elsewhere in Europe. Howells, Venetian Life, xxi.

= Syn. Aggressive, Offensive. Offensive is the direct opposite to defensive. Offensive warfare is that in which one is quick to give battle, as opportunity offers or can be made, and presses upon the enemy. Aggressive warfare is only secondarily of this sort; primarily it is a warfare prompted by the spirit of encroachment, the desire of conquest, plunder, etc. A war that is thus aggressive is naturally offensive at first, but may lose that character by the vigor of the resistance made; it then ceases to be thought of as aggressive. Hence aggressive has come to be often synonymous with offensive.

The steady pushing back of the boundary of rebellion, in spite of resistance at many points, or even of such aggressive inroads as that which our armies are now meeting with their long lines of bayonets.
O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 101.

The peremptory conversion of Lee's clever offensive into a purely defensive attitude, . . . in marked contrast with the tactics of his rival.
Badeau, Mil. Hist. of Grant, II. 130.

aggressively (a-gres'iv-li), adv. In an aggressive or offensive manner.

aggressiveness (a-gres'iv-nes), n. The quality of being aggressive; the disposition to encroach upon or attack others.

aggressor (a-gres'ọr), n. [L., also adgressor, < aggressus, pp. of aggredi, adgredi: see aggress, v.] The person who first attacks; one who begins hostilities or makes encroachment; an assailant or invader.

There is nothing more easy than to break a treaty ratified in all the usual forms, and yet neither party be the aggressor. Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xvii.

aggrievance† (a-grē'vans), n. [< ME. aggrevaunce, -auns, < OF. agrevance, < agrever: see aggrieve and -ance.] Oppression; hardship; injury; grievance.

Deliver those aggrievances, which lately
Your importunity possest our council
Were fit for audience.
Fletcher (and another), Fair Maid of the Inn, iii. 1.

aggrieve (a-grēv'), v.; pret. and pp. aggrieved, ppr. aggrieving. [< ME. agreven, < OF. agrever, agriever, later restored agraver, aggraver, to aggravate, exasperate, = Sp. agravar = Pg. aggravar = It. aggravare, < L. aggravare, make heavy, make worse, aggravate: see aggravate. Cf. aggredge and grieve.] I. trans. 1†. To give pain or sorrow to; afflict; grieve.

Which yet aggrieves my heart. Spenser.

2. To bear hard upon; oppress or injure in one's rights; vex or harass, as by injustice: used chiefly or only in the passive.

The two races, so long hostile, soon found that they had common interests and common enemies. Both were alike aggrieved by the tyranny of a bad king. Macaulay.

So the bargain stood:
They broke it, and he felt himself aggrieved.
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 27.

II.† intrans. To mourn; lament.

My heart aggriev'd that such a wretch should reign.
Mir. for Mags., p. 442.

aggroup† (a-grōp'), v. t. [< F. agrouper (= Sp. Pg. agrupar = It. aggruppare and aggroppare), < a, to, + grouper, group: see group, v.] To bring together; group; make a group of.

Bodies of divers natures which are aggrouped (or combined) together are agreeable and pleasant to the sight.
Dryden, tr. of Dufresnoy, p. 197.

aggroupment (a-grōp'ment), n. Arrangement in a group, as in statuary or in a picture; grouping. Also spelled agroupment.

aggry-beads (ag'ri-bēdz), n. pl. [< aggry, prob. of African origin, + beads.] Glass beads, supposed to be of ancient Egyptian manufacture, occasionally found in the Ashantee and Fanti countries. They are of exquisite colors and designs, and are much valued by the natives. Also spelled aggri-beads.

agha, n. See aga.

aghanee (à-gun'ē), n. [Anglo-Ind., also written aughunee, repr. Hind. aghanī, the produce of the month Aghan, the eighth in the Hindu year, answering to the last half of November and the first half of December.] The name given to the chief rice-crop in Hindustan. It is the second of the three crops, being sown along with the bhadoee crop in April and May, and reaped in November and December. Called amun in lower Bengal.

aghast (a-gast'), p. or a. [The spelling with h is unnecessary and wrong; < ME. agast, rarely in the fuller form agasted, pp. of the common verb agasten, rarely agesten, pret. agaste, terrify, < a- (< AS. ā-) + gasten (pret. gaste, pp. gast), < AS. gǣstan, terrify: see a-[1], gast, ghast, and ghastly, and cf. agazed.] Struck with amazement; filled with sudden fright or horror. See agast, v. t.

Aghast he waked, and starting from his bed,
Cold sweat in clammy drops his limbs o'erspread.
Dryden, Æneid.

Stupefied and aghast, I had myself no power to move from the upright position I had assumed upon first hearing the shriek. Poe, Tales, I. 372.

= Syn. Horrified, dismayed, confounded, astounded, dumfounded, thunderstruck.

agible† (aj'i-bl), a. [< ML. agibilis, that can be done, < L. agere, do: see agent, act.] Capable of being done; practicable.

When they were fit for agible things.
Sir A. Shirley, Travels, Persia, i.

agila-wood (ag'i-lä-wụd), n. [See eaglewood.] Same as agallochum.

agile (aj'il), a. [Early mod. E. agil, agill, < F. agile, < L. agilis, < agere, do, move: see agent, act.] Nimble; having the faculty of quick motion; apt or ready to move; brisk; active: said of the mind as well as of the body.

Shirley was sure-footed and agile; she could spring like a deer when she chose. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xix.

The subtle, agile Greek, unprincipled, full of change and levity. De Quincey, Secret Societies, ii.

= Syn. Nimble, Agile (see nimble), quick, lively, alert, supple, spry.

agilely (aj'il-i), adv. In an agile or nimble manner; with agility.

agileness (aj'il-nes), n. The state or quality of being agile; nimbleness; activity; agility.

Agilia (a-jil'i-ạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. agilis, agile: see agile.] In Illiger's classification of mammals, a family of rodents notable for their agility. It contains the squirrels and dormice. [Not in use.]

agility (ạ-jil'i-ti), n. [< F. agilité, < L. agilita(t-)s, < agilis, agile: see agile.] 1. The state or quality of being agile; the power of moving quickly; nimbleness; briskness; activity, either of body or of mind.

A limb overstrained by lifting a weight above its power, may never recover its former agility and vigour. Watts.

The Common Dormouse . . . handles its hazel- or beechnuts with all the air of a squirrel, and displays no less agility in skipping about the shrubbery and tangle it inhabits and forages in. Stand. Nat. Hist., V. 115.

2†. Powerful action; active force.

No wonder there be found men and women of strange and monstrous shapes considering the agility of the sun's fiery heat. Holland.

★= Syn. 1. See agile.

aging (ā'jing), n. [Verbal n. of age, v.] 1. Any process for imparting the characteristics and properties of age: as, the aging of wines and liquors by heat and agitation.—2. In calico-printing and dyeing, the process of fixing a mordant or color by exposing the cloth saturated or printed with the mordanting principle and dye-stuff in well-ventilated chambers to air which is kept warm and moist, for a time sufficient to allow the mordant or dye to penetrate the fibers and become firmly attached to them. Any superfluous portions, or those which remain soluble, are removed by dunging.—3. In ceram., the storage of prepared clay, to allow it time to ferment and ripen before using. E. H. Knight. The clay is kept wet, and is often mixed and tempered; and the process sometimes lasts for many years.

agio (aj'i-ō or ā'ji-ō), n. [< Fr. agio, < It. agio, usually in this sense spelled aggio, exchange, premium, the same word as agio, ease: see adagio and ease.] A commercial term in use, principally on the continent of Europe, to denote—(a) The rate of exchange between the currencies of two countries, as between those of Italy and the United States. (b) The percentage of difference in the value of (1) two metallic currencies, or (2) a metallic and a paper currency of the same denomination, in the same country; hence, premium on the appreciated currency, and disagio, or discount, on the depreciated one.

Six years ago this kinsatsu [Japanese paper currency] stood at par and was even preferred by the natives to the gold and silver currency; now, from 40% to 45% agio is paid. Rein, Japan, p. 382.

(c) An allowance made in some places for the wear and tear of coins, as in Amsterdam, Hamburg, etc.

a giorno (ä jōr'nō). [It., = F. à jour.] In decorative art, same as à jour.

agiotage (aj'i- or ā'ji-ō-tāj), n. [F., < agioter, job or dabble in stocks, < agio, price, rate of exchange, discount: see agio.] The business of exchange; speculation in stocks, etc.; stock-jobbing.

Vanity and agiotage are, to a Parisian, the oxygen and hydrogen of life. Landor, Imaginary Conversations, xlvii.

agist (a-jist'), v. t. [< OF. agister (> ML. agistare, adgistare), < a- (L. ad, to) + gister, assign a lodging, < giste, a bed, place to lie on: see gist, gise[2], gite[1].] 1. To feed or pasture, as the cattle or horses of others, for a compensation: used originally of the feeding of cattle in the king's forests.—2. To rate or charge; impose as a burden, as on land for some specific purpose.

agistage (a-jis'tāj), n. [< agist + -age.] In law: (a) The taking and feeding of other men's cattle in the king's forests, or on one's own land. (b) The contract to do so for hire. (c) The price paid for such feeding. (d) Generally, any burden, charge, or tax. Also called gait and agistment.

agistator†, n. [ML., < agistare, pp. agistatus: see agist.] Same as agistor.

agistment (a-jist'mẹnt), n. [< OF. agistement (> ML. agistamentum): see agist and -ment.] Same as agistage.

Glandage: m. Mast; also, Mastage; the season of turning hogs into the woods; the feeding of hogs, by Mast, in woods; th' Agistment, or laying of swine into Mastic woods. Cotgrave, Dictionary.

Henry de Lacy, earl of Lincoln, who . . . had the agistments and summer and winter herbage of Pendle.
Baines, Hist. Lancashire, II. 25.

No sooner had that [the Irish] Parliament, by its resolutions concerning the tithe of agistment, touched the interests of his order, than he [Swift] did everything in his power to discredit it. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., vii.

agistor, agister (a-jis'tọr, -tėr), n. [< ME. agister, < AF. agistour, < OF. agister, v.: see agist.] An officer of the royal forests of England, having the care of cattle agisted, and of collecting the money for the same; one who receives and pastures cattle, etc., for hire.

agitable† (aj'i-tạ-bl), a. [< F. agitable, < L. agitabilis, < agitare: see agitate.] 1. Capable of being agitated or shaken.—2. That may be debated or discussed.

agitate (aj'i-tāt), v.; pret. and pp. agitated, ppr. agitating. [< L. agitatus, pp. of agitare, drive, move, arouse, excite, agitate, freq. of agere, drive, move, do: see agent and act.] I. trans. 1†. To move or actuate; maintain the action of.

Where dwells this sov'reign arbitrary soul,
Which does the human animal controul,
Inform each part, and agitate the whole!
Sir R. Blackmore.

2. To move to and fro; impart regular motion to.

The ladies sigh, and agitate their fans with diamond-sparkling hands. J. E. Cooke, Virginia Comedians, I. xlviii.

3. To move or force into violent irregular action; shake or move briskly; excite physically: as, the wind agitates the sea; to agitate water in a vessel.

Tall precipitating flasks in which the materials were first agitated with the respective liquids and were then allowed to stand at rest under various conditions as to light, temperature, etc.
Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXIX. 2.

4. To disturb, or excite into tumult; perturb.

The mind of man is agitated by various passions.
Johnson.

5. To discuss; debate; call attention to by speech or writing: as, to agitate the question of free trade.

Though this controversy be revived and hotly agitated among the moderns. Boyle, Colours.

6. To consider on all sides; revolve in the mind, or view in all its aspects; plan.

When politicians most agitate desperate designs.
Eikon Basilike.

=Syn. 3 and 4. To rouse, stir up, ruffle, discompose.—5 and 6. To canvass, deliberate upon.

II. intrans. To engage in agitation; arouse or attempt to arouse public interest, as in some political or social question: as, he set out to agitate in the country.

The Tories agitated in the early Hanoverian period for short parliaments and for the restriction of the corrupt influence of the Crown. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., i.

agitated (aj′i-tā-ted), p. a. Disturbed; excited; expressing agitation: as, in an agitated manner; "an agitated countenance," Thackeray.

She burst out at last in an agitated, almost violent, tone.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, iii. 2.

agitatedly (aj′i-tā-ted-li), adv. In an agitated manner.

agitating (aj′i-tā-ting), p. a. Disturbing; exciting; moving.

agitation (aj-i-tā′shọn), n. [< L. agitatio(n-), < agitare: see agitate.] The act of agitating, or the state of being agitated. (a) The state of being shaken or moved with violence, or with irregular action; commotion: as, the sea after a storm is in agitation.

The molecules of all bodies are in a state of continual agitation. J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 114.

(b) Disturbance of the mind; perturbation; excitement of passion.

Agitations of the public mind so deep and so long continued as those which we have witnessed do not end in nothing. Macaulay, Parl. Reform.

Away walked Catherine in great agitation, as fast as the crowd would permit her.
Jane Austen, Northanger Abbey, xiii.

(c) Examination of a subject in controversy; deliberation; discussion; debate.

We owe it to the timid and the doubting to keep the great questions of the time in unceasing and untiring agitation. O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 80.

(d) The act of arousing public attention to a political or social question by speeches, etc.=Syn. (b) Agitation, Trepidation, Tremor, Emotion, excitement, flutter. Tremor is, in its literal use, wholly physical; it may be in a part of the body or the whole; it is generally less violent than trepidation. Trepidation and agitation are more often used of the mind than of the body. But all three words may express states either of the body or the mind, or of both at once through reflex influence. Trepidation is generally the result of fear; it is the excited anticipation of speedy disaster, penalty, etc. Agitation may be retrospective and occasioned by that which is pleasant; it includes the meaning of trepidation and a part of that of emotion. Emotion is used only of the mind; it is the broadest and highest of these words, covering all movements of feeling, whether of pleasure or pain, from agitation to the pleasure that the mind may take in abstract truth.

What lengths of far-famed ages, billowed high
With human agitation, roll along
In unsubstantial images of air!
Young, Night Thoughts.

I can recall vividly the trepidation which I carried to that meeting. D. G. Mitchell, Bound Together, i.

I had a worrying ache and inward tremor underlying all the outward play of the senses and mind.
O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life.

Mellow, melancholy, yet not mournful, the tone seemed to gush up out of the deep well of Hepzibah's heart, all steeped in its profoundest emotion.
Hawthorne, Seven Gables, vi.

agitational (aj-i-tā′shọn-ạl), a. Relating or pertaining to agitation.

agitative (aj′i-tā-tiv), a. [< agitate + -ive.] Having a tendency to agitate.

agitato (ä-jē-tä′tō), a. [It., pp. of agitare, < L. agitare: see agitate.] Agitated; restless: a word used in music, generally in combination with allegro or presto, to describe the character of a movement as broken, hurried, or restless in style.

agitator (aj′i-tā-tọr), n. [L., < agitare: see agitate.] 1. One who or that which agitates. Specifically—(a) One who engages in some kind of political agitation; one who stirs up or excites others, with the view of strengthening his own cause or party.

[Robin of Redesdale] collected forces and began to traverse the country as an agitator in the summer of 1469; possibly at the suggestion, certainly with the connivance, of Warwick. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 681.

(b) A machine for agitating and mixing; specifically, a machine for stirring pulverized ore in water.

2. A name given to certain officers appointed by the army of the English Commonwealth in 1647–9 to manage their concerns. There were two from each regiment.

They proceeded from those elective tribunes called agitators, who had been established in every regiment to superintend the interests of the army.
Hallam, Const. Hist., II. 210.

[It has been supposed that in this sense the proper spelling of the word is adjutator, meaning not one who agitates, but one who assists. But Dr. J. A. H. Murray says: "Careful investigation satisfies me that Agitator was the actual title, and Adjutator originally only a bad spelling of soldiers familiar with Adjutants and the Adjutors of 1642."] agitatorial (aj″i-tā-tō′ri-ạl), a. Of or pertaining to an agitator.

Aglaophenia (ag″lā-ō-fē′ni-ạ), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1812), appar. an error for aglaophema*, < Gr. Ἀγλαοφήμη, one of the sirens, fem. of ἀγλαόφημος, of splendid fame, < ἀγλαός, splendid, brilliant, + φήμη = L. fama, fame.] A notable genus of calyptoblastic hydroids, of the family Plumularidæ. A. struthionides is an elegant species of the Pacific coast of North America, known, from its figure and general appearance, as the ostrich-plume. Others occur on the Atlantic coast.

aglare (ạ-glãr′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3] + glare[1].] In a glare; glaring.

The toss of unshorn hair,
And wringing of hands, and eyes aglare.
Whittier, The Preacher.

Aglaura (ag-lâ′rạ), n. [NL., < Gr. Ἄγλαυρος, a mythol. name.] 1. A genus of craspedote hydroids, or Trachymedusæ, of the family Trachynemidæ. Péron and Lesueur, 1809.—2. A genus of worms.—3. A genus of lepidopterous insects. Boisduval, 1851.

Aglaurinæ (ag-lâ-rī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Aglaura, 1, + -inæ.] A group of Trachymedusæ, typified by the genus Aglaura, having 8 radial canals and a pedicle to the stomach.

ag-leaf (ag′lēf), n. [Prob. a corruption of hagleaf, as witches were believed to use the plant in their incantations: see hag[1].] A name of the common mullen, Verbascum Thapsus.

agleam (ạ-glēm′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3] + gleam.] Gleaming; in a gleaming state.

Faces . . . agleam with pale intellectual light.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 380.

aglee, agley (ạ-glē′), prep. phr. as adv. [< a-[3] + Sc. gley, gleg, squint, oblique look: see gley.] Off the right line; obliquely; wrong. [Scotch.]

The best laid schemes o' mice an' men Gang aft a-gley. Burns, To a Mouse.

aglet, aiglet (ag′let, āg′let), n. [Early mod. E. also agglet, < ME. aglet, aglette, < OF. aguillette, aiguillette, F. aiguillette, a point, dim. of aiguille, < ML. acucula, dim. of L. acus, a needle: see acus.] 1. A tag or metal sheathing of the end of a lace, or of the points (see point) or ribbons generally used in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries to fasten or tie dresses. They were originally intended simply to facilitate the passing of the ends through the eyelet-holes, as in modern shoelaces and stay-laces, but were afterward frequently formed of the precious metals, carved into small figures, and suspended from the ribbon, etc., as ornaments (whence Shakspere's phrase "an aglet-baby," which see); and they are still so used in the form of tagged points or braid hanging from the shoulder in some military uniforms, now officially styled aiguillettes. Also written aigulet.

And on his head an hood with aglets sprad.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. ii. 5.

His gown, addressed with aglets, esteemed worth 25*l.*
Sir J. Hayward, Life of Edw. VI.

2†. In bot., a pendent anther; also, a loose pendent catkin, as of the birch.

aglet-baby† (ag′let-bā″bi), n. A small image on the end of a lace. See aglet.

Marry him to a puppet, or an aglet-baby.
Shak., T. of the S., i. 2.

agley, prep. phr. as adv. See aglee.

aglimmer (ạ-glim′ėr), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3] + glimmer.] In or into a glimmering state; glimmering.

aglist† (ạ-glist′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3] + glist, q. v.] Glistening: as, aglist with dew.

aglobulia (ag-lo-bū′li-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. a- priv. + L. globulus, globule.] Same as oligocythemia.

aglobulism (a-glob′ū-lizm), n. [< Gr. a- priv. + globule + -ism.] In pathol.: (a) Diminution of the amount of hemoglobin in the blood. (b) ★Oligocythemia.

Aglossa (a-glos′ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀγλωσσος, tongueless, < a- priv. + γλῶσσα, tongue.] 1. A series of anurous or salient batrachians which have no tongue. (a†) In some systems comprehending the genera Pipa, Dactylethra, and Myobatrachus, and divided into Aglossa haplosiphonia for the first two of these genera, and Aglossa diplosiphonia for the third genus: in this sense the term is contrasted with Phaneroglossa. (b) Restricted to Pipa and Xenopus (or Dactylethra), and divided into the families Pipidæ and Xenopodidæ, which agree in having opisthocœlian vertebræ, expansive sacral processes, discrete epicoracoids, and, in the larval state, one pair of spiracles.

Surinam Toad (Pipa surinamensis).

2†. [Used as a singular.] A genus of pyralid moths, containing such species as A. pinguinalis and A. capreolatus.

aglossal (a-glos′al), a. [< Gr. ἀγλωσσος, tongueless, + -al.] Tongueless; pertaining to the Aglossa.

aglossate (a-glos′āt), a. and n. [< NL. aglossatus: see Aglossa and -ate[1].] I. a. Having no tongue; aglossal.

II. n. An aglossal batrachian; a member of the suborder Aglossa. See Aglossa, 1.

aglossostoma (ag-lo-sos′tō-mä), n.; pl. aglossostomata (ag″lo-sō-stō′ma-tä). [NL., < Gr. ἀγλωσσος, without a tongue, + στόμα, mouth.] In teratol., a monster having a mouth without a tongue.

aglow (ạ-glō′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3] + glow.] In a glow; glowing: as, her cheeks were all aglow.

The ascetic soul of the Puritan, aglow with the gloomy or rapturous mysteries of his theology.
Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 12.

A painted window all aglow with the figures of tradition and poetry. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 251.

aglutition (ag-lö-tish′ọn), n. [< Gr. a- priv. + L. glutitio(n-)*, < glutire, pp. glutitus, swallow.] In pathol., inability to swallow.

Aglycyderes (ag-li-sid′ẹ-rēz), n. [NL., < Gr. a- priv. + γλυκύς, sweet, + δέρη, Attic form of δειρή, neck. The first two elements, meaning lit. 'not sweet,' are taken in the forced sense of 'uncomely' or 'unusual.'] A notable genus of beetles, of the family Bruchidæ, characterized by the fact that the head of the male is anteriorly produced on each side into a horn-like process, and posteriorly contracted into a narrow neck, whence the name. Westwood, 1863.

aglyphodont (a-glif′ọ̄-dont), a. and n. [< Aglyphodontia.] I. a. In herpet., having the characteristics of the Aglyphodontia; without grooved teeth and poison-glands.

II. n. A serpent of this character; one of the Aglyphodontia (which see).

Aglyphodonta (a-glif-ọ̄-don′tạ), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Aglyphodontia.

Aglyphodontia (a-glif-ọ̄-don′shiạ), n. pl. [< Gr. ἀγλυφος, uncarved (< a- priv. + γλύφειν, carve, cut out), + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A group or series of innocuous serpents (Ophidia), embracing ordinary colubrine or colubriform snakes, without poison-glands, with a dilatable mouth, and with solid hooked teeth in both jaws. The name is derived from the last character; for the venomous serpents of the series Proteroglypha or Solenoglypha have poison-fangs channeled or grooved for the transmission of the venom. The Aglyphodontia include numerous families and genera, of most parts of the world, Colubridæ and Boidæ being among the best known of the families. Synonymous with Colubrina. See cuts under Coluber and Boa.

agmatology (ag-ma-tol′ọ̄-jĭ), n. [< Gr. ἄγμα(τ-), a fragment (< ἀγνύναι, break), + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That department of surgery which is concerned with fractures.

agmen (ag′men), n.; pl. agmina (-mi-nä). [L., a train, troops in motion, army, multitude, < agere, drive, move, do: see agent.] In zoöl., a superordinal group; a division of animals ranking between a class and an order. Sundevall.

Sundevall would still make two grand divisions (Agmina) of birds. A. Newton, Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 37.

agminal† (ag′mi-nal), a. [< L. agminalis, < agmen (agmin-), a train: see agmen.] 1†. Pertaining to an army or a troop. Bailey.—2. In zoöl., of or pertaining to an agmen.

agminate (ag′mi-nāt), a. [< NL. agminatus, < L. agmen (agmin-), a multitude: see agmen.] Aggregated or clustered together: in anat., said of the lymphatic glands forming patches in the small intestines (Peyer's patches), as distinguished from the solitary glands or follicles: as, "agminate glands," H. Gray, Anat.

agminated (ag′mi-nā-ted), a. [< agminate + -ed[2].] Same as agminate.

agnail (ag′nāl), n. [Early mod. E. agnail, agnale, agnel, agnell, agnayle, angnale, angnayle, mod. dial. angnail, < ME. agnayle, angnail*, < AS. angnægl, occurring twice (Leechdoms, II. p. 80, and index, p. 8), and usually explained by paronychia, i. e., a whitlow, but prop., it seems, a corn, wart, or excrescence (cf. angset, angseta, ongseta, a wart, boil, carbuncle), (= OFries. ongnil, ogneil, a misshapen finger-nail or an excrescence following the loss of a finger-nail, = OHG. ungnagel, G. dial. annegelen, einnegeln—Grimm), < (?) ange, ænge, enge, narrow, tight, painful (see anger[1], anguish; for the sense here, cf. LG. noodnagel, a hangnail, nood, distress, trouble, pain), + nægl, a nail, i. e., a peg (cf. L. clavus, a nail, peg, also a wart), in comp. wernægl, E. warnel, q. v., a wart, lit. 'man-nail.' The second element was afterward referred to a finger- or toe-nail, and the term applied to a whitlow (end of 16th century), and to a 'hangnail' (Bailey, 1737), hangnail, like the equiv. Sc. anger-nail, being due to a popular etymology.] 1†. A corn on the toe or foot.

Agnayle upon ones too, corret. Palsgrave.

Corret, an agnaile, or little corn, upon a toe. Cotgrave.

Fignoli, agnels, corns, pushes, felons or swellings in the flesh. Florio.

Passing good for to be applyed to the agnels or corns of the feet. Holland, Pliny, xx. 3. (N. E. D.)

2†. A painful swelling or sore under or about the toe- or finger-nails; a whitlow.

Good to be layde unto . . . ulcered nayles or agnayles, whiche is a paynefull swelling aboute the ioyntes and nayles. Lyte, Dodoens (1578), p. 258. (N. E. D.)

Agnail, a sore at the root of the nail on the fingers or toes. Bailey (1721).

3. A hangnail; a small piece of partly separated skin at the root of a nail or beside it.

agname (ag'nām), n. [< ag- + name, after L. agnomen.] An appellation over and above the ordinary name and surname. N. E. D.

agnamed (ag'nāmd), a. [< agname + *-ed*².] Styled or called apart from Christian name and surname. N. E. D.

agnate (ag'nāt), n. and a. [Early mod. E. agnat, agnet, < F. agnat, < L. agnatus, adgnatus, adnatus, prop. pp. of agnasci, adgnasci, be born to, belong by birth, < ad, to, + gnasci*, nasci, be born. Cf. adnate and cognate.] I. n. Specifically, a kinsman whose connection is traceable exclusively through males; more generally, any male relation by the father's side. See agnati.

Who are the Agnates? In the first place, they are all the Cognates who trace their connexion exclusively through males. A table of Cognates is, of course, formed by taking each lineal ancestor in turn and including all his descendants of both sexes in the tabular view; if then, in tracing the various branches of such a genealogical table or tree, we stop whenever we come to the name of a female and pursue that particular branch or ramification no further, all who remain after the descendants of women have been excluded are Agnates, and their connexion together is Agnatic Relationship. Maine, Ancient Law, p. 148.

II. a. 1. Related or akin on the father's side. —2. Allied in kind; from a common source: as, "agnate words," Pownall, Study of Antiquities, p. 168. [Rare.]

Agnatha (ag'nā-thā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of agnathus, jawless: see agnathous.] A section of geophilous gastropods destitute of jaws.

Agnathi (ag'nā-thī), n. pl. [NL., masc. pl. of agnathus, jawless: see agnathous.] A group or series of neuropterous insects, held by some as a suborder of the order Neuroptera: so called because the jaws are rudimentary or obsolete.

The wings are naked and not folded in repose, the posterior pair small, sometimes wanting; the antennæ are short, setaceous, and 3-jointed; and the abdomen ends in two or three long, delicate setæ. The group includes the well-known May-flies, and is practically identical with the order Ephemerida.

agnathia (ag-nā'thi-ä), n. [NL., < agnathus, jawless (see agnathous), + -ia.] In pathol. anat., absence of the lower jaw, due to arrested development.

agnathous (ag'na-thus), a. [< NL. agnathus, jawless, < Gr. ἀ- priv. + γνάθος, jaw.] 1. Without jaws; characterized by the absence of jaws. Syd. Soc. Lex.—2. Of or pertaining to the Agnatha or Agnathi.

agnati (ag-nā'tī), n. pl. [L., pl. of agnatus: see agnate.] The members of an ancient Roman family who traced their origin and name to a common ancestor through the male line, under whose paternal power they would be if he were living; hence, in law, relations exclusively in the male line. See agnate.

agnatic (ag-nat'ik), a. [< F. agnatique, < L. agnatus: see agnate.] Characterized by or pertaining to descent by the male line of ancestors. See agnate.

Nevertheless, the constitution of the [Hindu] family is entirely, to use the Roman phrase, agnatic; kinship is counted through male descents only. Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 76.

agnatically (ag-nat'i-kal-i), adv. In an agnatic manner; by means of agnation.

agnation (ag-nā'shon), n. [< F. agnation, < L. agnatio(n-), < agnatus: see agnate.] 1. Relation by the father's side only; descent from a common male ancestor and in the male line: distinct from cognation, which includes descent in both the male and the female lines.

I have already stated my belief that at the back of the ancestor-worship practised by Hindus there lay a system of agnation, or kinship through males only, such as now survives in the Punjâb. Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 118.

2. Alliance or relationship generally; descent from a common source. [Rare.]

Agnation may be found amongst all the languages in the Northern Hemisphere. Pownall, Study of Antiquities, p. 168.

agnel¹† (ag'nel), n. Obsolete form of agnail.

agnel² (ag'nel; F. pron. a-nyel'), n. [< OF. agnel (F. agneau), a lamb, an agnel, < L. agnellus, dim. of agnus, a lamb: see agnus.] A French gold coin bearing a figure of the paschal lamb, first issued by Louis IX., and not struck after Charles IX. Its original weight was from 62.5 to 64.04 grains, but after the reign of John II. it gradually fell to about 38.7 grains.

Obverse.

Reverse.

Agnel of John II., King of France. (Size of the original.)

agni, n. Plural of agnus.

agnition† (ag-nish'-on), n. [< L. agnitio(n-), < agnitus, pp. of agnoscere, also adgnoscere, adnoscere, know as having seen before, recognize, acknowledge, < ad, to, + gnoscere*, noscere, know: see know. Cf. agnomen.] Acknowledgment.

agnize (ag-nīz'), v. t. [< L. agnoscere, in imitation of cognize, ult. (through F.) < L. cognoscere: see agnition.] To acknowledge; own; recognize. [Rare.]

I do agnize
A natural and prompt alacrity
I find in hardness. Shak., Othello, i. 3.

Doubtless you have already set me down in your mind as . . . a votary of the desk—a notched and crop scrivener—one that sucks his sustenance, as certain sick people are said to do, through a quill. Well, I do agnize something of the sort. Lamb, Elia, I. ii. 11.

agnœa (ag-nē'ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄγνοια, want of perception, ignorance, < ἄγνοος*, not knowing, < ἀ- priv. + γνόος*, νόος, contr. νοῦς, perception, mind, akin to E. know: see nous and know.] The loss of the power to distinguish the nature or uses of any object. [Rare.]

Agnoëtæ (ag-nō-ē'tē), n. pl. [ML.; also impr. Agnoïtæ; < Gr. Ἀγνοηταί, heretics so named, < ἀγνοεῖν, be ignorant, < ἄγνοος*, not knowing: see agnœa.] 1. A Christian sect of the fourth century, which denied the omniscience of the Supreme Being, maintaining that God knows the past only by memory, and the future only by inference from the present.—2. A sect of the sixth century, followers of Themistius, deacon of Alexandria, who, on the authority of Mark xiii. 32 ("But of that day and that hour knoweth no man, . . . neither the Son, but the Father"), held that Christ, as man, was ignorant of many things, and specifically of the time of the day of judgment.

Other forms are Agnoïtæ and Agnoïtes.

Agnoëte, Agnoïte (ag'nō-ēt, -īt), n. One of the Agnoëtæ.

agnoëtism (ag-nō-ē'tizm), n. [< Agnoëtæ + -ism.] The doctrinal system of the Agnoëtæ.

agnoiology (ag-noi-ol'ō-ji), n. [Better agnœology*, < Gr. ἄγνοια, ignorance (see agnœa), + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak of: see -ology.] In metaph., the doctrine or theory of ignorance, which seeks to determine what we are necessarily ignorant of.

We must examine and fix what ignorance is—what we are, and can be, ignorant of. And thus we are thrown upon an entirely new research, constituting an intermediate section of philosophy, which we term the agnoiology, . . . the theory of true ignorance. Ferrier, Inst. of Metaphysics, p. 51.

Agnoïte, n. See Agnoëte.

agnomen (ag-nō'men), n.; pl. agnomina (-nom'-i-nä). [L., also adnomen (min-), < ad, to, + gnomen*, nomen, name (= E. name), < gnoscere*, noscere, know, = E. know.] An additional name given by the Romans to an individual in allusion to some quality, circumstance, or achievement by which he was distinguished, as Africanus added to the name of P. Cornelius Scipio; hence, in modern use, any additional name or epithet conferred on a person.

agnomical (ag-nō'mi-kal), a. [< Gr. ἀ- priv. + γνώμη, thought, purpose: see gnome, gnomic.] Of or pertaining to the absence of set purpose or intention. N. E. D.

agnomina, n. Plural of agnomen.

agnominal (ag-nom'i-nal), a. [< agnomen (agnomin-) + -al.] Of or pertaining to an agnomen.

agnominate† (ag-nom'i-nāt), v. t. [< L. agnominatus*, pp. of agnominare*, implied in agnominatio: see agnomination.] To name.

The flowing current's silver streams . . .
Shall be agnominated by our name. Locrine, iii. 2.

agnomination (ag-nom-i-nā'shon), n. [< L. agnominatio(n-), adnominatio(n-), paronomasia, < agnominare*, < ad, to, + gnominare*, nominare, name.] 1. An additional name or title; a name added to another, as expressive of some act, achievement, etc.; a surname.—2. Resemblance in sound between one word and another, especially by alliteration; also, the practice of using in close proximity to one another words which resemble each other in sound (see annomination): as, "Scott of Scotstarvet's Staggering State of Scots Statesmen."

Our bards . . . hold agnominations and enforcing of consonant words or syllables one upon the other to be the greatest elegance. . . . So have I seen divers old rhymes in Italian running so: . . . "In selva salvo a me: Piu caro cuore." Howell, Letters, i. 40.

agnostic (ag-nos'tik), n. and a. [< Gr. ἄγνωστος, unknowing, unknown, unknowable, < ἀ- priv., not, + γνωστός, later form of γνωτός, known, to be known (cf. γνωστικός, good at knowing), verbal adj. of γι-γνώ-σκ-ειν, know, = L. gno-scere, no-sc-ere* = E. know: see *a-*¹⁸ and gnostic. The word agnostic was "suggested by Prof. Huxley . . . in 1869. . . . He took it from St. Paul's mention of the altar to 'the Unknown God' [ἀγνώστῳ θεῷ, Acts xvii. 23]. R. H. Hutton, in letter, . . . 1881." N. E. D.] I. n. One of a class of thinkers who disclaim any knowledge of God or of the ultimate nature of things. They hold that human knowledge is limited to experience, and that since the absolute and unconditioned, if it exists at all, cannot fall within experience, we have no right to assert anything whatever with regard to it.

I only said I invented the word agnostic.
Huxley, London Academy, Nov. 24, 1883.

While the old Atheist sheltered his vice behind a rampart of unbelief where no appeals could reach him, the new Agnostic honestly maintains that his opinions are the very best foundations of virtue. F. P. Cobbe, Peak in Darien, p. 3.

II. a. Pertaining to the agnostics or their doctrines; expressing ignorance or unknowableness.

That bold thinker in the third century, Clement of Alexandria, declares . . . that the process of theology is, with regard to its doctrine of God, negative and agnostic, always "setting forth what God is not, rather than what he is." Pop. Sci. Mo., XXV. 79.

agnostically (ag-nos'ti-kal-i), adv. In an agnostic manner; from an agnostic point of view; with a tendency or inclination to agnosticism; as an agnostic.

agnosticism (ag-nos'ti-sizm), n. [< agnostic + -ism.] 1. The doctrines of the agnostics; the doctrine that the ultimate cause and the essential nature of things are unknowable, or at least unknown.

By Agnosticism I understand a theory of things which abstains from either affirming or denying the existence of God. It thus represents, with regard to Theism, a state of suspended judgment; and all it undertakes to affirm is, that, upon existing evidence, the being of God is unknown. But the term Agnosticism is frequently used in a widely different sense, as implying belief that the being of God is not merely now unknown, but must always remain unknowable. G. J. Romanes, Contemporary Rev., L. 59.

2. Belief in the doctrines of the agnostics.

Agnostus (ag-nos'tus), n. [NL.; < Gr. ἄγνωστος, unknown: see agnostic.] A genus of trilobites of the Lower Silurian rocks: so called because of the uncertainty attaching to its true affinities. They are of small size and somewhat semicircular form, and it has been supposed that they may be the larval form of some other animal.

Agnotherium (ag-nō-thē'ri-um), n. [NL., short for agnostotherium*, < Gr. ἄγνωστος, unknown (see agnostic), + θηρίον, a wild beast, < θήρ, a wild beast.] A genus of extinct mammals of uncertain affinities. It is identified by some with the amphicyon (which see). Kaup.

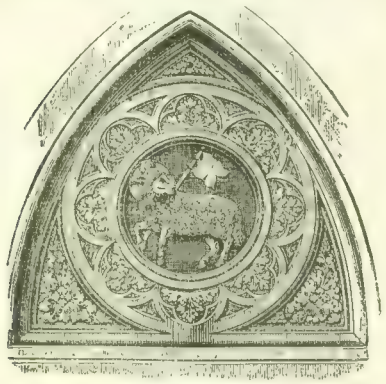
agnus (ag'nus), n.; pl. agni (-nī). [L., a lamb, perhaps for avignus*, lit. 'sheep-born,' < avis*, older form of ovis, a sheep (= Skt. avi = Gr. ἄϝις*, ὄϝις*, οἶς = E. ewe, q. v.; cf. also Gr. ἀμνός, a lamb, for ἀϝινός*, prop. adj., < ἀϝι-* + -νος), + -gnus (cf. benign, malign), -genus (see -genous), < √ gen*, beget, bear.] 1. An image or representation of a lamb as emblematical of Christ; an Agnus Dei (see below).



They will kiss a crucifix, salute a cross, carry most devoutly a scapulary, an agnus, or a set of beads about them.
Brevint, Saul and Samuel at Endor, p. 331.

2. [cap.] In zoöl.: (a) A genus of beetles. Burmeister, 1847. (b) A genus of fishes. Günther, 1860.—Agnus castus (kas'tus). [L., supposed to mean 'chaste lamb' (hence tr. into G. keuschlamm), but agnus is here only a transliteration of ἄγνος, the Greek name of the tree, and L. castus, chaste, is added in allusion to its imagined virtue of preserving chastity, from the resemblance of the Greek name ἄγνος to ἁγνός, chaste.] A disagreeably aromatic shrub or small tree of the genus Vitex, V. Agnus-castus, in the family Verbenaceæ. It has digitate leaves and spikes of purplish-blue flowers, and is native in the countries around the Mediterranean. Also called chaste-tree and Abraham's-balm.

The herbe Agnus castus is always grene, and the flowre therof is namly callyd Agnus castus, for wyth smelle and vse it makyth men chaste as a lombe.
Trevisa, tr. of Barth. Ang. de P. R., xvii. 612. (N. E. D.)

And wreaths of Agnus-castus others bore;
These last, who with those virgin crowns were drest,
Appear'd in higher honour than the rest.
Dryden, Flower and Leaf, l. 172.

Agnus Dei (dē'ī). [LL., Lamb of God.] (a) Any image or representation of a lamb as emblematical of Christ;

Agnus Dei.
(From the Campanile of Giotto, Florence.)

specifically, such a representation with the nimbus inscribed with the cross about its head, and supporting the banner of the cross. (b) One of the titles of Christ. John i. 29. (c) In the Rom. Cath. Ch.: (1) A waxen medallion blessed by the pope and stamped with the figure of a lamb bearing the banner of the cross. It is worn by Roman Catholics as a supplication to be preserved from evil by the merits of the Lamb of God. Anciently these cakes of wax were often mounted or inclosed in precious metals, etc., but this is not now permitted. Relics of the saints were sometimes preserved within them. (2) A prayer, beginning with these words, said by the priest at mass shortly before the communion. (d) In the Gr. Ch., the cloth bearing the figure of a lamb which covers the communion service.—Agnus Scythicus (sith'i-kus), the Scythian or Tatarian lamb, a fabulous creature, half animal, half plant, formerly believed to inhabit the plains bordering upon the Volga; in reality, the shaggy rhizome of the fern Cibotium Barometz, which when inverted and suitably trimmed somewhat resembles a small lamb.

Agnus Scythicus

ago, agone (ą-gō', ą-gôn'), a. and adv. [< ME. ago, agon, agoon, pp. of agon, < AS. āgān, go away, pass away, go forth, come to pass (= G. ergehen, come to pass; cf. agon[1]†. An obsolete form of ago.

agon[2]† (ag'on), n.; pl. agones (a-gō'nēz). [< Gr. ἀγών, contest: see agony.] In Gr. antiq., a contest for a prize, whether of athletes in the games or of poets, musicians, painters, and the like.

agone[1], a. and adv. See ago.

agone[2] (ag'ōn), n. [< Gr. ἄγωνος, without an angle, < ἀ- priv. + γωνία, angle: see goniometer, trigonometry, etc.] An agonic line. See agonic.

agonic (a-gon'ik), a. [< Gr. ἄγωνος, without an angle: see agone[2].] Not forming an angle.—Agonic line, an irregular line connecting those points on the earth's surface where the declination of the magnetic needle is zero, that is, where it points to the true north, and consequently does not form an angle with the geographical meridian. There are two principal agonic lines: one, called the American agone, is in the western hemisphere, and passes northward through the eastern part of Brazil, North Carolina, Virginia, Ohio, Lake Erie, and British America. The other, called the Asiatic agone, is in the eastern hemisphere, and traverses western Australia, the Indian ocean, Persia, and Russia, toward the magnetic north pole. A third agonic line, having the form of an oval curve, incloses a part of eastern Asia. The agonic lines are continually changing their position; that in the eastern United States has been moving slowly westward since the beginning of the nineteenth century. See declination and isogonic.

agonid (a-gon'id), n. One of the fishes forming the family Agonidæ.

Agonidæ (a-gon'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Agonus + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, exemplified by the genus Agonus.

Agoninæ (ag-ō-nī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Agonus + -inæ.] A subfamily of the Agonidæ, having two dorsal fins, the spinous being well developed.

agonise, agonisingly. See agonize, agonizingly.

agonist (ag'ō-nist), n. [< L. agonista, < Gr. ἀγωνιστής, contestant, pleader, actor, < ἀγωνίζεσθαι, contend, etc.: see agonize. Cf. antagonist, protagonist.] 1. One who contends for the prize in public games; a combatant; a champion; a dramatic actor. Also called agonister. —2. [cap.] One of a violent party of Donatists in northern Africa in the fourth century.

agonistarch (ag-ō-nis'tärk), n. [< L. agonistarcha (in an inscription), < Gr. *ἀγωνιστάρχης, < ἀγωνιστής (see agonist) + ἄρχειν, rule, govern.] In Gr. antiq., one who trained persons to compete in public games and contests.

agonister† (ag'ō-nis-tėr), n. [< agonist + -er[1]. Cf. sophister.] Same as agonist, 1.

★agonistic (ag-ō-nis'tik), a. [< ML. agonisticus, < Gr. ἀγωνιστικός, < ἀγωνιστής, agonist: see agonist.] 1. Pertaining to contests of strength or athletic combats, or to contests of any kind, as a forensic or argumentative contest.

The silver krater given by Achilles as an agonistic prize at the funeral of Patroklos, which, as the poet tells us, was made by the Sidonians, and brought over the sea by the Phœnicians. C. T. Newton, Art and Archæol., p. 289.

2. Combative; polemic; given to contending.

Two conflicting agonistic elements seem to have contended in the man, sometimes pulling him different ways, like wild horses.
Walt Whitman, in Essays from The Critic, p. 32.

3. Strained; aiming at effect; melodramatic. N. E. D.

agonistical (ag-ō-nis'ti-kąl), a. Same as agonistic.

agonistically (ag-ō-nis'ti-kąl-i), adv. In an agonistic manner. [Rare.]

agonistics (ag-ō-nis'tiks), n. [Pl. of agonistic: see -ics.] The art or science of contending in public games or other athletic contests.

★agonizant (ag-ō-nī'zant), n. [< ML. agonizan(t-)s, ppr. of agonizare: see agonize.] One of a Roman Catholic confraternity whose chief duty it is to offer prayers for the dying, and more especially to assist and pray for criminals under sentence of death.

agonize (ag'ō-nīz), v.; pret. and pp. agonized, ppr. agonizing. [< F. agoniser, < ML. agonizare, labor, strive, contend, be at the point of death, < Gr. ἀγωνίζεσθαι, contend for a prize, fight, struggle, exert one's self, < ἀγών, a contest for a prize, etc. See agony, from which the stronger sense of agonize is imported.] I. intrans. 1. To struggle; wrestle, as in the arena; hence, to make great effort of any kind.—2. To writhe with extreme pain; suffer violent anguish.

To smart and agonise at every pore.
Pope, Essay on Man, i. 198.

II. trans. To distress with extreme pain; torture.

He agonized his mother by his behaviour. Thackeray.

Also spelled agonise.

agonizingly (ag'ō-nī-zing-li), adv. In an agonizing manner; with extreme anguish. Also spelled agonisingly.

Agonoderus (ag-ō-nod'e-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀγωνος, without angle, + δέρη, δειρή, neck, throat.] A genus of Carabidæ, comprising a moderate number of species of very small or medium-sized beetles peculiar to temperate America. It is not readily defined either by structural character or by general appearance, and the smaller species, which are of nearly uniform light-brown or testaceous color, are very difficult to distinguish from similarly colored species of other genera. A. pallipes (Fabricius), one of the commonest species, is about a quarter of an inch long, and of a pale-yellowish color. Its elytra have a wide black stripe, divided by the suture; the disk of the prothorax is usually marked with a large black spot, and the head is always black. Most of the species in the United States are extremely abundant, especially in moist places, and are readily attracted by light. Nothing is known of their earlier stages.

Agonoderus dorsalis (Le Conte). Vertical line shows natural size.

agonoid (ag'ō-noid), a. and n. [< Agonus + -oid.] I. a. Having the characters of the Agonidæ.

II. n. A fish of the family Agonidæ; an agonid.

agonothete (a-gō'nō-thēt), n. [< L. agonotheta and agonothetes, < Gr. ἀγωνοθέτης, < ἀγών, contest, + τι-θέ-ναι, place, appoint: see theme, thesis, etc.] One of the officials who presided over public games in ancient Greece and awarded the prizes.

agonothetic (a-gō-nō-thet'ik), a. [< Gr. ἀγωνοθετικός, < ἀγωνοθέτης: see agonothete.] Pertaining to the office of agonothete.

Agonus (ag'ō-nus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + γόνυ, knee (taken in the sense of 'joint'), = E. knee.] A genus of fishes, typical of the family Agonidæ. Bloch, 1801. Also called Aspidophorus. A. cataphractus (Asp. europæus) is the sea-poacher or pogge.

agony (ag'ō-ni), n.; pl. agonies (-niz). [< ME. agonie, < OF. agonie, < LL. agonia, < Gr. ἀγωνία, a contest, struggle, agony, orig. a contest for a prize at the public games, < ἀγών, a contest, wrestle, a place of contest, an assembly (see agon[2]), < ἀγειν, assemble, bring together, lead, drive, move, etc., = L. agere: see agent, act, etc. Cf. agonize, etc.] 1. A violent contest or struggle. [Rare.]

Till he have thus denudated himself of all these incumbrances, he is utterly unqualified for these agonies.
Decay of Christ. Piety, p. 408.

2. The struggle, frequently unconscious, that often precedes natural death: in this sense often used in the plural: as, he is in the agonies of death.—3. Extreme, and generally prolonged, bodily or mental pain; intense suffering; hence, intense mental excitement of any kind: as, the agony of suspense or uncertainty.

A great agony
Of hope strove in her.
W. Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 316.

A solitary shriek, the bubbling cry
Of some strong swimmer in his agony.
Byron, Don Juan, ii. 53.

Continued agony is followed by exhaustion, which in feeble persons may be fatal. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 29.

4. In a special sense, the sufferings of Christ in the garden of Gethsemane.—Agony column, the column of a newspaper which contains advertisements relating to lost relatives and friends and other personal matters: so called from the apparent distress of the advertisers. [English, and chiefly in London.]=Syn. 3. Agony, Anguish, Pang, Torture, Torment, throe, paroxysm, ache. These all denote forms of excruciating pain of the body or the mind. Agony is pain so extreme as to cause struggling; it is general rather than local pain. Anguish is, in the body, commonly local, as the anguish of amputation, and transient. Pang is brief and intermittent; it is a paroxysm, spasm, throe, thrill, or throb of pain; in the mind there may be the pangs of remembrance, etc., and in the body the pangs of hunger, etc. The agonies or pangs of dissolution; the anguish of a fresh bereavement. Torture and torment are by derivation pains that seem to wrench or rack the body or mind; they are the most powerful of these words. Torment expresses a more permanent state than torture. See pain.

The octopus had seized his left arm, causing dreadful agony by the fastening of its suckers upon the limb.
P. Robinson, Under the Sun, vii.

One fire burns out another's burning,
One pain is lessen'd by another's anguish.
Shak., R. and J., i. 2.

That last glance of love which becomes the sharpest pang of sorrow. George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xliii.

Suspense in news is torture; speak them out.
Milton, S. A., l. 1569.

O, that torment should not be confined
To the body's wounds and sores!
Milton, S. A., l. 606.

agood† (ạ-gụd′), prep. phr. as adv. [< a[3], on, in, + good. Cf. the phrase in good earnest,] In earnest; heartily.

I made her weep a-good. Shak., T. G. of V., iv. 4.

The world laughed agood at these jests.
Arnim, Nest of Ninnies, 1608. (Halliwell.)

agora (ag′ọ̄-rặ), n. [< Gr. ἀγορά, assembly, market-place, < ἀγείρειν, call together, assemble.] In ancient Greece: (a) A popular political assembly; any meeting of the people, especially for the promulgation or discussion of laws or public measures. Hence—(b) The chief public square and market-place of a town, in which such meetings were originally held, corresponding to the Roman forum. The agora usually occupied the site about the original public fountain or well of a settlement, which was the natural place of reunion for the inhabitants. It was often surrounded by colonnades and public buildings; sometimes public buildings and temples stood within it. In some instances a large open space was reserved for public meetings, and the remainder was variously subdivided for purposes of traffic. It was customary to erect in the agora altars to the gods and statues of heroes and others, and sometimes, as at Athens, it was adorned with alleys of trees.

agoranome (ag′ọ̄-rạ-nōm″), n. [< L. agoranomus, < Gr. ἀγορανόμος, clerk of the market, < ἀγορά, market, + νέμειν, manage, rule.] One of those magistrates in a Greek city who had charge of the inspection of the markets, of weights and measures, and of public health. Their functions corresponded to those of the Roman ediles.

agoraphobia (ag″ọ̄-rạ-fō′bi-ặ), n. [< Gr. ἀγορά, market-place (see agora), + -φοβία, fear: see -phobia.] In pathol., a dread of crossing open spaces, such as open squares, city parks, etc.: a feature of some cases of neurasthenia.

agostadero (ä-gō-stä-dā′rō), n. [Sp., a summer pasture, < agostar, pasture cattle on stubble in summer, dial. plow in August, < Agosto, August, harvest-time, harvest.] A place for pasturing cattle. [Used in parts of the United States settled by Spaniards.]

agouara (a-gö-ä′rặ), n. [Native name in South America.] A species of racoon, Procyon cancrivorus, about the size of a fox. It is a native of the warmer parts of America, and eats all kinds of crustaceans and mollusks, marine and terrestrial; from this habit it is also called the crab-eating racoon.

agoumenos (a-gö′me-nos), n. Same as hegumenos.

Agouta (Solenodon paradoxus).

agouta (a-gö′tặ), n. [Native name.] An insectivorous mammal peculiar to Hayti, the type-member of the genus Solenodon and of the family Solenodontidæ. It is so puzzling to naturalists that it has received the name of S. paradoxus. It has the fur, ears, and tail of the opossum, but the teeth and elongated nose of the shrew. Its feet terminate in five toes, and the long claws are curved and evidently adapted for scraping in the earth. The dentition is unique, the grooving of the second incisor of the lower jaw distinguishing this genus from all others whose dental system is known. It is of the size of a rat, and not unlike one in general appearance. See almiqui and Solenodon.

agouti (a-gö′ti), n. [< F. agouti, acouti, < Sp. aguti, < Galibi agouty, Tupi aguti, acuti.]

Agouti (Dasyprocta agouti).

The American name of several species of rodent mammals of the genus Dasyprocta and family Dasyproctidæ. The common agouti, or yellow-rumped cavy, D. agouti, is of the size of a rabbit. The upper part of the body is brownish, with a mixture of red and black; the belly yellowish. Three varieties are mentioned, all peculiar to South America and the West Indies. It burrows in the ground or in hollow trees, lives on vegetables, doing much injury to the sugar-cane, is as voracious as a pig, and makes a similar grunting noise. It holds its food in its fore paws, like a squirrel. When scared or angry its hair becomes erect, and it strikes the ground with its hind feet. Its flesh is white and of agreeable taste, and the animal is pursued as game in Brazil. Also spelled aguti and agouty. See acouchy and Dasyprocta.

agracet, v. t. See aggrace.

agraffe (a-graf′), n. [Also, as a historical ★term, agrappe, aggrappe; < F. agrafe, formerly agraffe, "agraphe, a clasp, hook, brace, grapple, hasp" (Cotgrave), also agrappe* (Walloon agrap), < a- + grappe, < ML. grappa, < OHG. chrapfo, G. krapfe, a hook: see grape, grapple.] 1. A clasp or hook, used in armor or in ordinary costume, fastening in the same manner as the modern hook and eye, often made into a large and rich ornament by concealing the hook itself beneath a jeweled, engraved, embossed, or enameled plate: as, "an agraffe set with brilliants," Scott, Ivanhoe. Also agrappe, fermail.

Agraffe—13th century.

The plate is in two parts; a hook behind the left-hand piece enters a ring behind the other. (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dict. du Mobilier français.")

Amongst the treasures is the Crowne of Charlemagne, his 7 foote high scepter and hand of justice, the agraffe of his royall mantle beset with diamonds and rubies, his sword, belt and spurrs of gold.
Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 12, 1643.

2. A device for preventing the vibration of that part of a piano-string which is between the pin and the bridge.—3. A small cramp-iron used by builders.

agrammatism (a-gram′ạ-tizm), n. [< Gr. ἀγράμματος, without learning (< ἀ- priv. + γράμμα(τ-), a letter), + -ism.] In pathol., inability to form a grammatical sentence.

agrammatist† (a-gram′ạ-tist), n. [As agrammat-ism + -ist.] ★An illiterate person. Bailey.

agraphia (a-graf′i-ặ), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] A form of cerebral disorder in which there is a partial or total loss of the power of expressing ideas by written symbols.

agraphic (a-graf′ik), a. Pertaining to or characterized by agraphia.

agrappe (a-grap′), n. Same as agraffe, 1.

agrarian (ạ-grā′ri-ạn), a. and n. [< L. agrarius, < ager, field, country, land, = E. acre, q. v.; agrariæ leges, laws relating to the division of the public lands among the poorer citizens; agrarii, n. pl., those who favored such laws.] I. a. 1. Relating to lands, especially public lands; pertaining to the equal or uniform division of land.

His grace's landed possessions are irresistibly inviting to an agrarian experiment. Burke.

2. Growing in fields; wild: said of plants.

We believe that the charlock is only an agrarian form of Brassica.
Prof. Buckman, Rep. Brit. Ass. Adv. of Sci., 1861.

3. Rural.—Agrarian laws, in ancient Rome, laws regulating the distribution of the public lands among the citizens; hence, in modern use, laws relating to or providing for changes in the tenure of landed property.—Agrarian murder, agrarian outrage, a murder or an outrage brought about by some dispute concerning the occupancy of land, or by general discontent among tenants or the rural classes.—Agrarian region, the name proposed by H. C. Watson for that altitudinal zone of vegetation within which grain can be cultivated.

II. n. 1. One who favors an equal division of property, especially landed property, among the inhabitants of a country, or a change in the tenure of land. Hence, sometimes applied to agitators accused of leveling tendencies or of hostile designs against the holders of property, as to certain political parties at different times in the United States.

The new party [the Equal Rights party, 1835, nicknamed Locofocos] was arrayed in the habiliments of a real bugbear. Agrarians was the accursed name to be fastened on them, and to make them an abomination in the eyes of all those who took any interest in law or social order.
H. von Holst, Const. Hist. (trans.), II. 397.

2. The land itself. [Rare.]

The agrarian in America is divided among the common people in every state. J. Adams, Works, IV. 359.

3. An agrarian law. [Rare.]

agrarianism (ạ-grā′ri-ạn-izm), n. [< agrarian + -ism.] 1. The principle or theory of an equal or uniform division of lands; more generally, any theory involving radical changes in the tenure of land, as the denial of the right of private property in it, and advocacy of its distribution and control by the government.—2. The movement or agitation in favor of agrarian views, or for the establishment of more favorable conditions in the use of land; violence exercised in pursuit of this object.

Every county board, every central council, however limited its legal powers, may become a focus for agrarianism or sedition. Nineteenth Century, XIX. 319.

agrarianize (ạ-grā′ri-ạn-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. agrarianized, ppr. agrarianizing. [< agrarian + -ize.] 1. To distribute, as public lands, among the people.—2. To imbue with ideas of agrarianism. N. E. D.

Agra work. See work.

agret, prep. phr. as adv. See agree.

agreablet, agreabletet. Obsolete forms of agreeable, agreeability.

agreet, prep. phr. as adv. [< ME. agree, agre (also in forms in gree, at gree, to gree), < OF. a gre (F. à gré), favorably, according to one's will, at pleasure: a (< L. ad), to, at; gre, earlier gred, gret, that which pleases, < ML. gratum, will, pleasure, neut. of L. gratus, pleasing: see grateful. Cf. agree, v.] In good part; kindly; in a friendly manner.

But toke agree alle hool my play.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 4349.

agree (ạ-grē′), v. [< ME. agreen, < OF. agreer, F. agréer = Pr. agreiar, from the OF. phrase a gre, favorably, according to one's will, at pleasure: see agree, adv.] I. intrans. A. With a personal or personified subject, in which case agree is either used absolutely or is followed by with before the agreeing object, and by upon, on, for, to, or in, and sometimes with, before the object or condition of the agreement; the latter may be expressed by an infinitive or a clause. 1. To be of one mind; harmonize in opinion or feeling: as, with regard to the expediency of the law all the parties agree.

Science . . . agrees with common sense in demanding a belief in real objective bodies, really known as causes of the various phenomena, the laws and interrelations of which it investigates. Mivart, Nature and Thought, p. 89.

2. To live in concord or without contention; harmonize in action; be mutually accordant in intercourse or relation.

How dost thou and thy master agree?
Shak., M. of V., ii. 2.

3. To come to one opinion or mind; come to an arrangement or understanding; arrive at a settlement.

Agree with thine adversary quickly. Mat. v. 25.

They agree, he to command, they to obey.

Shak., M. for M., iii. 1.

The tyrant would have agreed to all that the nation demanded. Macaulay, Burleigh.

B. With a thing or things for the subject, in which case agree now takes no preposition except with or in after it, though formerly to was also so used. 5. To be consistent; harmonize; not to conflict, or be repugnant: as, this story agrees with what has been related by others.

Their witness agreed not together. Mark xiv. 56.

When we possess ourselves with the utmost security of the demonstration, that the three angles of a triangle are equal to two right ones, what do we more but perceive that equality to two right ones does necessarily agree to, and is inseparable from, the three angles of a triangle?
Locke, Human Understanding, v. 1.

A wild-rose roofs the ruined shed,
And that and summer well agree.
Coleridge, A Day Dream.

6. To resemble; be similar; be applicable or appropriate; tally; match; correspond; coincide: as, the picture does not agree with the original.

[Erroneously printed in the New Testament as two words, in the forms (in different editions) a hungered, an hungered, and an hungred.] ahungry† (ą-hung′gri), a. [Same as ahungered, with suffix changed in imitation of hungry.] Hungry: as, "I am not a-hungry," Shak., M. W. of W., i. 1.

Ahuramazda (ä″hö-ra-maz′dą), n. [Zend Ahuro mazdao, > Pers. Ormuzd.] Same as Ormuzd.

ai, ayu (ī), n. [Jap.] A Japanese salmonoid fish, Salmo (Plecoglossus) altivelis, also known as the one-year fish. It is catadromous, and an annual.

The most widely spread species of salmon in the Japanese rivers and lakes . . . is the Ayu (pronounced Ai) or Plecoglossus altivelis, Schl. The Ayu is not found near the sources of the rivers. Rein, Japan (1884), p. 197.

ai[1]. [(1) < ME. ai, ay, ei, ey, æi, az, ez, æz, < AS. æg, eg, ēg, ēg, that is, the vowel æ or e, ē or ē, followed by the palatal g, in ME. g, z, or y, also written i, merging with vowel y or i: see g, y, i. (The digraph in hair, ME. here, has taken the place of earlier e as in ere, there, their, etc.) (2) < ME. ai, ay, ei, ey, with following vowel aie, etc., < OF. ai, ei, etc., of various origin, usually developed from L. a or e. (3) Of various other origin. See examples cited below.] A common English digraph, representing generally the sound of "long a" (ā), which becomes ã before r, as in ail (sounded like ale), vain (sounded like vane, vein), air (sounded like ere, heir), etc. As commonly pronounced, it is strictly a diphthong consisting of "long a" (ā), or e (e), followed by a vanish, i (i), which is, in words of Anglo-Saxon origin, historically identical with the consonant y. This digraph occurs in words — (1) of Anglo-Saxon origin, as in ail, hail[1], nail, sail, fain, wain, fair[1], lair, etc., being also used, parallel with ae, in modern Scotch spelling for "long a" equivalent to E. "long o," oa, o-e, as in aith, raid, ain, etc., = E. oath, road, rode, own, etc.; (2) of French, and ultimate Latin origin, as in fail, faint, vain, grain, aim, fair[2], etc.; (3) of Greek origin, being used sometimes as a direct transliteration of Greek αι instead of the usual Latin transliteration ae or æ (see æ[1]), as in aitiology, etc.; (4) of various other origin, usually representing the diphthong äi or ī, as in German kaiser and Oriental and "native" words, especially proper names, as Aino, Cairo, etc. In the words of Anglo-Saxon and French origin ai varied with ay, which now prevails when final, usually changing back to ai when made medial by the addition of a suffix, as in day, clay, gay, affray, array, etc., daily, afraid, raiment, etc.; but in some such cases, especially before a suffix beginning with a vowel, ay remains unchanged, as in payment, betrayed, clayey, etc.

ai[2] (ä′ē), n. [= F. aï, hay, < Tupi aï, haï, ahy.] The three-toed or collared sloth, Bradypus tridactylus or torquatus: so called from having a feeble, plaintive cry somewhat resembling the sound represented by its name. See sloth[1], 4, and Bradypus (the typical genus of the family Bradypodidæ).

The South American name of the roseate spoonbill, a large grallatorial bird of the genus Platalea, family Plataleidæ, related to the ibis.—2. In the form ajaja: (a) The specific name of the bird Platalea ajaja. (b) [cap.] Reichenbach's generic name of the bird, which he calls Ajaja rosea, to separate it generically from the old-world spoonbill, Platalea leucorodia. See spoonbill.—3. In Paraguay, the jabiru, Mycteria americana: in this sense only in the form aiaiai. E. D. See cut under jabiru.

Roseate Spoonbill (Ajaja rosea).

aiblins (āb′linz), adv. [Also spelled ablins, ablis, abil, able (Jamieson); < able, "fit, proper, apt, liable, in danger of" (Jamieson), + -lins, -lings, -lis: see able[1] and -ling[2].] Perhaps; peradventure; possibly. [Scotch.]

But fare-ye-weel, auld Nickie-ben!
Oh wad ye tak' a thought and men',
Ye aiblins might—I dinna ken—Still ha'e a stake. Burns, To the De'il.

aid[1] (ād), v. t. [< ME. aiden, < OF. aider, also eider, aidier, mod. F. aider = Pr. ajudar, < L. adjutare, help, aid, freq. of adjuvare, pp. adjutus, help, < ad, to, + juvare, help: see adjutant, adjute.] 1. To help; assist; afford support or relief; promote the desire, purpose, or action of: as, to aid a person in his business, or an animal in its efforts; to aid a medicine in its operation.

Till more hands
Aid us, the work under our labour grows,
Luxurious by restraint. Milton, P. L., ix. 208.

So aid me Heaven when at mine uttermost.
Tennyson, Geraint.

2. To promote the course or accomplishment of; help in advancing or bringing about; forward; facilitate: as, to aid the recovery of a patient, or the operation of a machine; to aid one's designs.

Take your choice of those
That best can aid your action. Shak., Cor., i. 6.

No more these scenes my meditation aid.
Pope, Eloisa to Abelard, l. 161.

[In this sense aid is often followed by in, giving it the appearance of an intransitive verb, the direct object of assistance being unexpressed: as, he actively aided in the search.]—Aiding and abetting, in criminal law, an offense committed by one who, though not directly perpetrating a crime, is yet present at its commission and renders aid to the perpetrator. = Syn. To support, sustain, serve, back, second, abet, coöperate with, relieve.

★aid[1] (ād), n. [< F. aide, < OF. aide, eide, etc.; from the verb.] 1. Help; succor; support; assistance.

Sweet father, I behold him in my dreams
Gaunt as it were the skeleton of himself,
Death-pale, for lack of gentle maiden's aid.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

2. He who or that which aids or yields assistance; a helper; an auxiliary; an assistant: as, Coleridge's "Aids to Reflection."

It is not good that man should be alone; let us make unto him an aid like unto himself. Tobit viii. 6.

The aids to noble life are all within.
M. Arnold, Worldly Place.

3. In feudal law, a customary payment made by a tenant or vassal to his lord, originally a voluntary gift; hence, in Eng. hist., applied to the forms of taxation employed by the crown between the Norman conquest and the fourteenth century. Aids in the narrower sense, whether to the crown or mesne lords, were by Magna Charta limited to grants on three special occasions: (a) to ransom the lord when a prisoner; (b) to make the lord's eldest son a knight; (c) the marriage of the lord's eldest daughter. The legal authority to enforce such aids was abolished in 1660.

First there were payments called aids; in the theory of our earlier authors they were offered of the tenant's free will, to meet the costs incurred by the lord on particular occasions; but they settled into a fixed custom afterwards, if they had not really done so when those authors wrote.
F. Pollock, Land Laws, iii.

The marriage was, according to the new feudal ideas, made the excuse for a heavy exaction of money, an aid, as the feudal lawyers call it.
E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V. 123.

4. An aide-de-camp: so called by abbreviation.—5. pl. In the manège, the helps by which a horseman contributes toward the motion or action required of a horse, as by a judicious use of the heel, leg, rein, or spur.—Court of aid, in French hist., a court for the collection of the royal aids, or excise.—Emigrant aid societies. See emigrant.—Extents in aid. See extent.—To pray in aid. See aid-prayer. = Syn. 1. Coöperation, furtherance, relief.—2. Coadjutor, assistant.

aid[2] (ād), n. [Eng. dial.; etym. unknown.] 1. A deep gutter cut across plowed land. [Shropshire, Eng.]—2. A reach in a river. [Shropshire, Eng.]

Ailantus (ī-lan′tus), n. [NL.; also erroneously Ailanthus (simulating Gr. ἄνθος, flower); < ailanto, given as an Amboyna name, said to mean 'tree of heaven'; appar. for ai lanit*, a Molucca form of Malay kāyu langit, 'tree of the sky.'] 1. A genus of trees of the family Simaroubaceæ. The only commonly known species is the tree of heaven or Chinese sumach, A. glandulosa, native of Mongolia and Japan, frequently planted as a shade-tree. It is of rapid growth, with very long pinnate leaves, and throws up abundant root-suckers, by which it is usually propagated. The flowers are polygamous or nearly dicœcious, and are very ill-scented. Bombyx (Philosamia) cynthia, a species of silkworm, feeds on its leaves. In Japan the produce of silkworms fed on this tree is large.

2. [l. c.] A tree of the genus Ailantus, or the genus collectively: as, the ailantus, when once established, is difficult to eradicate.

ailet, n. 1. The older and more correct spelling of aisle.—2. [F.: see ailette.] Milit., a wing or flank of an army or a fortification.

★aileron (ā′le-ron), n. [F., dim. of aile, wing: see ailette.] Same as ailette.

ailette (ā-let′), n. [F., dim. of aile, a wing, < L. āla, wing: see ala and aisle.] A plate of iron worn over the mail to protect the shoulders of a man-at-arms, before the introduction of plate-armor for the body. Ailettes were sometimes charged with heraldic bearings. Also aislette and aileron.

Ailette with armorial bearings, middle of 13th century. (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dict. du Mobilier français.") ailing (ā′ling), n. [Verbal n. of ail[1], v.] Sickness; indisposition.

ailing (ā′ling), p. a. Not well; indisposed.

But there is a sort of puny sickly reputation, that is always ailing, yet will outlive the robuster characters of a hundred prudes.
Sheridan, School for Scandal, i. 1.

My mother had long been ailing, and not able to eat much.
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, p. 41.

= Syn. Unwell, etc. See sick.

ailment (āl′ment), n. [< ail[1], v., + -ment.] Disease; indisposition; morbid affection of the body: not ordinarily applied to acute diseases. = Syn. Sickness, etc. (see illness), indisposition, disorder, complaint.

Ailurus (ā-lū′rus), n. Same as Ælurus.

ailweed (āl′wēd), n. [< ail[1] (?) + weed[1].] The clover-dodder, Cuscuta Trifolii.

aim (ām), v. [< ME. aymen, amen, eymen, < OF. amer (Picard), esmer (= Pr. esmer, < L. æstimare), and with prefix, eesmer, aesmer, aasmer, < ML. adæstimare, < L. ad, to, + æstimare, estimate: see estimate.] I. trans. 1†. To esteem; consider.—2†. To estimate; guess; conjecture. Wyclif.—3†. To calculate; devise; intend.

My speech should fall into such vile success
Which my thoughts aim'd not. Shak., Othello, iii. 3.

4. To direct or point at something; level: as, to aim the fist or a blow; to aim a satire or a reflection at some person or vice.

Bulls aim their horns, and asses lift their heads.
Pope, Im. of Horace, Sat. i. 85.

5. To give a certain direction and elevation to (a gun, cannon, arrow, etc.), for the purpose of causing the projectile, when the weapon is discharged, to hit the object intended to be struck: as, to aim a gun.

II. intrans. 1†. To estimate; guess; conjecture.

Rom. In sadness, cousin, I do love a woman.
Ben. I aim'd so near, when I suppos'd you lov'd.
Shak., R. and J., i. 1.

2. To direct one's intention, purpose, or action, as to the attainment or accomplishment of something; intend; endeavor: as, a man aims at distinction; aim to be just in all you do.

The short-sighted policy which aimed at making a nation of saints has made a nation of scoffers.
Macaulay, Leigh Hunt.

3. To direct or point anything, as a weapon or missile, toward an object.

[In all senses aim is used with at or an infinitive before the object to be reached.]

To cry aim†, in archery, to encourage the archers by crying out "Aim!" when they were about to shoot. Hence it came to mean to applaud or encourage in a general sense.

It ill beseems this presence to cry aim
To these ill-tuned repetitions. Shak., K. John, ii. 1.

★aim (ām), n. [< ME. ayme, ame, < OF. esme; from the verb.] 1†. Conjecture; guess.

He that seeth no mark, must shoot by aim.
Bp. Jewell, Reply to Hardinge, p. 31.

It is impossible by aim to tell it.
Spenser, State of Ireland.

What you would work me to, I have some aim.
Shak., J. C., i. 2.

2. Course; direction: in particular, the direction in which a missile is pointed; the line of shot.

And when the cross-blue lightning seem'd to open
The breast of heaven, I did present myself
Even in the aim and very flash of it. Shak., J. C., i. 3.

3. The act of aiming or directing anything (as a weapon, a blow, a discourse, or a remark) at or toward a particular point or object with the intention of striking or affecting it; the pointing or directing of a missile.

Each at the head
Levell'd his deadly aim. Milton, P. L., ii. 712.

4. The point intended to be hit, or object intended to be affected; the mark or target.

To be the aim of every dangerous shot.
Shak., Rich. III., iv. 4.

5. A purpose; intention; design; scheme: as, men are often disappointed of their aim.

The aim, if reached or not, makes great the life.
Try to be Shakspeare, leave the rest to fate.
Browning, Bishop Blougram's Apology.

The aim of scientific thought, then, is to apply past experiences to new circumstances.
W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 131.

To give aim, in archery, to stand near the butts to tell the archers where their arrows alight. The terms are "wide on the shaft (right) hand," "wide on the bow (left) hand," "short," "gone"; the distances being measured by bow-lengths. See bow-hand. = Syn. 5. End, scope, drift, goal, intent, ambition.

aim-crier† (ām′krī″ėr), n. 1. One who encouraged an archer by crying "Aim!" when he was about to shoot. Hence—2. An encourager generally; an approving on-looker; an abetter.

Thou smiling aim-crier at princes' fall.
G. Markham, Eng. Arcadia.

aimer (ā′mėr), n. One who aims.

aim-frontlet† (ām′frunt″let), n. A piece of wood fitted to the muzzle of a cannon so as to make it level with the breech, formerly used by gunners to facilitate aiming.

aimful (ām′fûl), a. [< aim + -ful.] Full of purpose.

aimfully (ām′fûl-i), adv. In an aimful manner; with fixed purpose.

aiming-drill (ā′ming-dril), n. A military exercise designed to teach men the proper method of pointing and aiming firearms; a training preliminary to target-practice.

aiming-stand (ā′ming-stand), n. Milit., a rest for a gun, used in teaching the theory of aiming.

aimless (ām′les), a. [< aim + -less.] Without aim; purposeless.

The Turks, half asleep, ran about in aimless confusion.
Dryden, Don Sebastian.

aimlessly (ām′les-li), adv. Without aim; purposelessly.

aimlessness (ām′les-nes), n. The state or quality of being without aim or definite purpose.

[Thoreau's] whole life was a rebuke of the waste and aimlessness of our American luxury, which is an abject enslavement to tawdry upholstery.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 209.

ain (ān), a. [Also spelled ane, = E. own[1].] Own. [Scotch.]

-ain. [< ME. -ain, -ein, -ayn, -eyn, < OF. -ain, -ein, < L. -ānus: see -an.] A suffix of Latin origin, occurring unfelt in English nouns, as in chieftain, captain, chaplain, curtain, and, as originally, in adjectives, as in certain, etc. It is a Middle English and Old French form of -an (which see).

aince, aines (ānes), adv. [< ME. anes, north. form of ones (pron. ō′nes), now corrupted to once (pron. wuns).] Once. [Scotch.]

ainhum (ī′nyŏm), n. [A Pg. spelling of an African word.] A disease peculiar to the negro race, consisting of the sloughing off of the little toes, unaccompanied by any other disorder of the system.

Aino (ī′nō), a. and n. [Etym. doubtful; supposed to be a corruption of Jap. inū (pron. ē′nō), a dog, applied contemptuously by the Japanese.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Ainos, certain aboriginal tribes in Japan and Siberia now forming small tribal communities in the island of Yezo and on the southern part of Saghalin: formerly also on the Kurile islands. They are remarkably hairy. They are in a low stage of culture. Also Ainu.

II. n. The language of the Ainos.

ainsel', ainsell (ān-sel'), n. [< ain = E. own, + sell = E. self.] Own self. [Scotch.]

ain't, an't (ānt). A vulgar contraction of the negative phrases am not and are not: often used for is not, and also, with a variant hain't, for have not and has not.

Aiolian (ā-ō'li-ạn), a. and n. Same as Æolian[1] and Æolian[2].

Aiolic (ā-ol'ik), a. Same as Æolic.

Aiolism (ā'ọ̄-lizm), n. Same as Æolism.

air[1] (ãr), n. [Early mod. E. ayre, also aer (after L.), < ME. eier, aire, eire, ayer, eyer, ayre, eyre, aier, eyr, eir, < OF. air, F. air, the air, breath, wind, = Pr. air, aire = Sp. aire = Pg. ar = It. aere, aire, now commonly aria, all in the physical sense; < L. aër, < Gr. ἀήρ (ἀερ-), air, mist, < ἀεύν, breathe, blow, prob. akin to E. wind, q. v. See air[2] and air[3], ult. identical with air[1], but separated in sense and in time of introduction.] 1. The respirable fluid which surrounds the earth and forms its atmosphere. It is inodorous, invisible, insipid, colorless, elastic, possessed of gravity, easily moved, rarefied, and condensed, essential to respiration and combustion, and is the medium of sound. It is composed by volume of 21 parts of oxygen and 78 of nitrogen; by weight, of about 23 of oxygen and 77 of nitrogen. These are not chemically united, but are mixed mechanically. Air contains also .03 p.c. of carbon dioxid, some aqueous vapor, about one per cent. of argon, and small varying amounts of ammonia, nitric acid, ozone, and organic matter. The specific gravity of the air at 32° F. is to that of water as 1 to 773, and 100 cubic inches at mean temperature and pressure weigh 30½ grains. When air is inhaled into the lungs oxygen is separated from the nitrogen, and, uniting with the carbon in the blood, is expelled as carbon dioxid; it thus serves to purify the blood and furnishes the body with heat. By the ancient philosophers air was considered one of the four elements of all things, a view maintained until recent times. See supplement.

> The greate house, formerly the Duke of Buckingham's, a spacious and excellent place for the extent of ground, and situation in a good aire. Evelyn, Diary, Jan. 15, 1679.

> The health of the mental and bodily functions, the spirit, temper, disposition, the correctness of the judgment, and brilliancy of the imagination, depend directly upon pure air. Huxley and Youmans, Physiol., § 395.

2. In old chem., gas: still in use in this sense in foundries and machine-shops, especially for such gases as are mingled with air or formed from it, as the gases from a furnace. In distinction from this use, common air is often called atmospheric air.

3. A movement of the atmosphere; a light breeze: usually in the plural.

> The summer airs blow cool. Tennyson, May Queen, ii.

4. Utterance abroad; publication; publicity.

> You gave it air before me. Dryden.

Hence—5†. Intelligence; information; advice.

> It grew from the airs which the princes and states abroad received from their ambassadors and agents here. Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII.

6. The graphic representation, as in a painting, of the effect of the atmospheric medium through which natural objects are viewed.—7. In the Gr. Ch., a very thin veil spread over both the paten and the chalice, in addition to the paten and chalice veils. Also called nephele.

> The third [chalice veil] is called . . . air, because, as the air surrounds the earth, so does this surround the holy gifts. . . . This name, air, has found its way into our own Church, through Bishop Andrewes, and the divines of his time, who (especially Wren) were well versed in the Eastern Liturgies. J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, i. 350, note.

Dephlogisticated air, in old chem., oxygen: so called from the notion that it was ordinary air deprived of phlogiston (which see).—Fixed air, the name given by Dr. Joseph Black of Edinburgh to carbonic-acid gas on his discovery of it in 1754, because it was found in solid bodies. See carbonic.—Ground-air, air inclosed in porous surface-soil, like surface-moisture or ground-water. Like ground-water, ground-air is regarded as an important factor in determining the sanitary condition of a locality. Ground-air fluctuates with the barometric pressure, and with the conditions of temperature and the rise and fall of ground-water.—In the air. (a) In circulation; flying about from one to another; hence, generally felt or anticipated: as, there is a rumor of war in the air; it is in the air that he cannot succeed. (b) Without foundation or actuality; visionary or uncertain: as, a castle in the air (see castle); our prospects are in the air. (c) Milit., in an unsupported or disconnected position; incapable of receiving or giving aid; improperly exposed or separated: as, the left wing of the army was in the air. Liquid air. See liquefaction of gases, under liquefaction.—Residual air, the air which remains in the chest and cannot be expelled. The amount thus left is variously estimated at from 80 to 120 cubic inches.—Tidal air. See tidal.—To beat the air. See beat, v. t.—To take air, to be divulged; be made public: as, the story has taken air.—To take the air, to go abroad; walk or ride a little distance.

> I din'd at Sir William Godolphin's, and with that learned gentleman went to take ye aire in Hyde Park, where was a glorious cortege. Evelyn, Diary, July 1, 1679.

[Air is used in many compounds of obvious meaning; only those which have a peculiar or specific sense are entered below in alphabetical order.]

air[1] (ãr), v. [First in mod. E.; from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To expose to the air; give access to the open air; ventilate: as, to air clothes; to air a room.

> I ayre or wether, as men do thynges whan they lay them in the open ayre, or as any lynen thyng is after it is newe wasshed or it be worne. . . . Ayre these clothes for feare of mothes. Palsgrave.

> To this [public prison] is also annexed a convenient yard to air the criminals in, for the preservation of their life and health, till the time of their trial. Beverley, Virginia, iv. ¶ 68.

Hence—2. To expose ostentatiously; display; bring into public notice: as, to air one's views.

> Airing a snowy hand and signet gem. Tennyson, Princess, i.

3. To expose to heat; warm: as, to air linen; to air liquors.—4. refl. To expose (one's self) to the air.

> To go and air myself in my native fields. Lamb, Elia.
>
> It is my pleasure to walk forth,
> And air myself a little.
> Middleton, Chaste Maid, ii. 2.

II. intrans. To take the air.

> She went airing every day. Miss Mitford, Our Village, 2d ser., 317.

air[2] (ãr), n. [First in mod. E. (end of 16th century); < F. air, OF. aire, nature, disposition, manner, mien, air, = Pr. aire = It. aire, aere, now aria, manner, mien, countenance; a word of disputed origin, prob. the same as OF. air, Pr. air, aire, E. air[1], the atmosphere (cf. atmosphere in similar uses): see air[1] and air[3].] 1. The peculiar look, appearance, and bearing of a person: as, the air of a youth; a graceful air; a lofty air.

> Then returned to my side, . . . and strolled along with the air of a citizen of the place pointing out the objects of interest to a stranger. C. D. Warner, Roundabout Journey, xiv.

2. The general character or complexion of anything; appearance; semblance.

> Too great liberties taken [in translation] in varying either the expression or composition, in order to give a new air to the whole, will be apt to have a very bad effect. Bp. Lowth, On Isaiah.

> As it was communicated with the air of a secret, it soon found its way into the world. Pope, Ded. of R. of the L.

3. pl. Affected manner; manifestation of pride or vanity; assumed haughtiness: chiefly in the phrases to put on airs, to give one's self airs.

> Mrs. Crackenbury read the paragraph in bitterness of spirit, and discoursed to her followers about the airs which that woman was giving herself. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, lxviii.

> And the queen of the hoopoes gave herself airs, and sat down upon a twig; and she refused to speak to the merops her cousin, and the other birds who had been her friends, because they were but vulgar birds. R. Curzon, Monast. in the Levant, p. 136.

4†. pl. The artificial motions or carriage of a horse.—5. In painting, that which expresses action, manner, gesture, or attitude.

air[3] (ãr), n. [First in mod. E. (end of 16th century); < F. air, a tune, sound, or air in music, < It. aere, aire, now aria (> Sp. Pg. aria, E. aria, q. v.); prob. identical (through aere, aire, aria, manner, E. air[2]; cf. L. modus, manner, mode, musical mode, melody) with aere, aire, aria, E. air[1].] 1. In music: (a) Any simple and comparatively regular melody or tune. (b) A particular song or aria: as, the air "Sound an alarm." (c) The soprano or treble part in a harmonized piece; that by which it is characterized and known.—2. Any piece of poetry. [Rare.]

> And the repeated air
> Of sad Electra's poet had the power
> To save the Athenian walls from ruin bare.
> Milton, Sonnets, iii.

National air, in music, a popular tune peculiar to or characteristic of a particular nation; specifically, that tune which by national selection or consent is usually sung or played on certain public occasions, as "God Save the King" in England, "The Star-Spangled Banner" in the United States, the "Marseillaise" in France, the "Emperor's Hymn" in Austria, etc.

air[3]† (ãr), v. t. [< air[3], n.] To set to music.

> For not a drop that flows from Helicon
> But ayred by thee grows streight into a song.
> J. Cobb, Prefix to Lawes's Ayres and Dialogues (1653).

air[4]†, n. Same as airy[2], aery[2].

air[5] (ãr), adv. and a. [Also written ear; = E. ere, < AS. ǣr, rarely used as an adj., common as a prep. and adv.: see ere and early.] Early. [Scotch.]

> An air winter's a sair winter. Scotch proverb.

Aira (ā'rạ̈), n. [NL., prop. æra*, < Gr. αἶρα, a kind of darnel, prob. Lolium temulentum (Linnæus).] A genus of slender perennial grasses of temperate regions, mostly of little value. The more common species are known as hair-grass.

airable† (ãr'ạ-bl), a. [< air[3], v., + -able.] Suitable to be sung. Howell.

air-bag (ãr'bag), n. A large bag composed of layers of canvas, saturated or coated with air-proof and water-proof preparations and filled with air, designed for use in raising sunken vessels. When needed for use, empty air-bags are secured to the vessel beneath the surface of the water, and air is then forced into them. Also called air-cushion.

air-balloon (ãr'ba-lön″), n. See balloon.

air-bath (ãr'bȧth), n. 1. The protracted exposure of the person to the action of the air, for the promotion of health, usually under the direct rays of the sun. See sun-bath.—2. An apparatus for drying or evaporating by exposure to air of any desired temperature.

air-bed (ãr'bed), n. A bed consisting of an air-tight mattress inflated with air.

air-bladder (ãr'blad″ėr), n. 1. A vesicle in an organic body filled with air.

> The pulmonary artery and vein pass along the surfaces of these air-bladders in an infinite number of ramifications. Arbuthnot, Aliments.

2. In ichth., the sound or swim-bladder; a symmetrical bladder or sac filled with air, generally situated directly under the vertebral column in front, and homologous with the lungs of air-breathing animals. Its principal function is the regulation of the equilibrium of the body. It is either connected by a tube with the intestinal canal, as in the physostomous fishes, or shut off from all communication with it, as in the physoclistous fishes. It is subject to great variation in form, and is liable to atrophy or complete abortion in species allied to such as have it well developed.

air-blast (ãr'blȧst), n. A stream or current of air under pressure; specifically, such a stream used to urge fires in forges or to assist combustion in furnaces. When heated it is called a hot blast; when at normal temperature, a cold blast. Air-blasts are also used to perform certain kinds of light work, as separating hairs and dust from fur in hat-making, removing dust in grinding, etc., cleansing textile fabrics, and painting large surfaces; also in the sand-blast process.

air-bone (ãr'bōn), n. A bone having a large cavity filled with air, as in birds. Owen. Specifically, the atmosteon (which see).

air-box (ãr'boks), n. 1. A ventilating flue; specifically, a wooden tube or box used to convey air to a mine for ventilation.—2. A flue used to supply air to a furnace, either (a) to promote combustion, or (b) to be heated in order to warm apartments.—3. A chamber at the rear of the fire-box of a furnace to supply air for the more complete combustion of the gases disengaged from the fuel.

air-brake (ãr'brāk), n. A system of continuous railway-brakes operated by compressed air. The air is compressed by a pump upon the locomotive, and conveyed, through pipes beneath the cars and flexible hose between them, to reservoirs and cylinders under each car. The pistons of the cylinders are connected with and move the brake-levers, which transmit pressure to the brake-shoes. See the supplement.

air-braving (ãr'brā″ving), a. Breasting or defying the air or wind.

> Stately and air-braving towers. Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iv. 2.

air-breather (ãr'brē″ŦHėr), n. An animal which breathes air; specifically, a marine animal breathing out of water by means of lungs, instead of under water by means of gills.

air-brick (ãr'brik), n. 1. A brick perforated or with open sides, to permit the flow of air through it for purposes of ventilation.—2. A metal box of the size of a brick, with grated sides for the passage of air. See air-grating.

air-bridge (ãr'brij), n. A furnace-bridge so constructed as to admit heated air to the gases passing over it, to facilitate their combustion. See bridge.

air-brush (ãr'brush), n. An atomizer used for distributing liquid pigment upon any surface. It employs an air-compressor, reservoir, pipe, and nozle for controlling the jet of combined compressed air and paint. Also, the nozle of a painting-machine or of a pneumatic broom.

air-bucket (ãr'buk″et), n. A water-wheel bucket, so constructed as to permit the unimpeded outflow of the air displaced by the water as it enters the bucket.

air-buffer (ãr'buf″ėr), n. Same as air-spring.

air-bug (ãr'bug), n. Any heteropterous hemipterous insect of the division Geocores (land-bugs) or of the Aurocores.

air-built (ãr'bilt), a. Erected in the air; having no solid foundation; chimerical: as, an air-built castle; air-built hopes.

air-camel (ãr'kam″el), n. A caisson or air-chamber placed beneath or alongside of vessels, to diminish their draft and enable them to pass over shallow spots or obstructions, and also used in raising sunken vessels.

air-cane (ãr'kān), n. A walking-stick having an air-gun concealed within it.

air-carbureter (ãr′kär″bū-ret-ėr), n. An apparatus in which air is passed through or over the surface of liquid hydrocarbons and is charged with inflammable vapor, or by which the liquid fuel is injected into the air.

air-casing (ãr′kā″sing), n. An air-tight casing of sheet-iron placed around a pipe to prevent undue transmission of heat or cold; specifically, the casing placed around the base of the funnel or smoke-stack of a steamship, to prevent too great a transmission of heat to the deck.

air-castle (ãr′kȧs″l), n. A castle in the air; a day-dream; a visionary scheme. See castle.

Adventures, triumphs of strength and skill—these furnish subject-matter for the talk of the uncivilized man and the air-castles of the youth.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 482.

air-cavity (ãr′kav″i-ti), n. A cavity containing air; specifically, such a cavity occurring in the body or bones of an animal; a large air-sac or pneumatocyst of a bird.

In the latter case, air-cavities take the place of the medulla, which disappears, and so diminish permanently the specific gravity of the animal.
Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 573.

air-cell (ãr′sel), n. 1. In bot., one of the cavities in the leaves, stems, or other parts of plants, containing air. They are well seen in the bladders of seaweeds, and are found in other aquatic plants, which they serve to float.

Air-cells in Gulf-weed (Sargassum vulgare).

2. In anat. and zoöl., a definite circumscribed cavity in the body, containing atmospheric air inhaled through air-passages which place it in direct communication with the outer air. The term is used for any such cavity, without reference to the technical meaning of cell (which see). An air-cell is generally of small size, if not microscopic, as one of those in lung-tissue; but it sometimes forms a great space or inflatable inclosed area, as the air-cells of birds, and is then also called air-space, air-receptacle, or pneumatocyst. Specifically—(a) One of the small hemispherical saccules which beset the walls of the alveolar passages and infundibula of the lungs. Also called alveolus. (b) One of the dilatations of the trachea or air-tube in insects forming the respiratory apparatus. (c) In ornith., a pneumatocyst; any one of the extra-pulmonary cavities of the body of a bird, containing air, which are continuous with one another and with one or more of the bronchial tubes. See pneumatocyst.

★air-chamber (ãr′chām″bėr), n. 1. A large cavity in an organic body containing air.—2. A compartment of a hydraulic engine or apparatus, as a pump, interposed between and connected with the supply- and delivery-passages, and containing air which by its elasticity equalizes the pressure and flow of the fluids. Thus, in a reciprocating force-pump, the impulse given to the fluid by the delivery-stroke compresses the air in the air-chamber, and this compressed air reacts upon the outflowing fluid to continue its motion during the reverse stroke, or during those intervals when the force imparted falls below the average or normal amount. The pressure and flow are thus made practically uniform, notwithstanding the intermittent or variable action of the force. For some special forms, see air-vessel.

Air-chamber.

3. Any compartment or chamber designed to contain air: as, the air-chamber of a life-boat.

air-chambered (ãr′chām″bėrd), a. Furnished with an air-chamber or with air-chambers.

It [the life-boat] was air-chambered and buoyant.
Kane, Sec. Grinn. Exp., I. 49.

air-cock (ãr′kok), n. A cock used to control the admission or outflow of air. See cock[1], 8.

★air-compressor (ãr′kȯm-pres″ȯr), n. A machine for raising the pressure of air, usually in the form of a piston-pump. See compressor.

air-cone (ãr′kōn), n. A cone in a marine engine designed to receive air and steam from the hot-well, and carry them off through a pipe at the top.

air-cooler (ãr′kō″lėr), n. Any appliance for lowering the temperature of the air, as in hospitals, dwellings, and theaters. Common forms are chambers filled with ice or fitted with screens of light fabric kept constantly wet, and coils of pipe in which a cool liquid is circulating. See refrigerating-chamber, under refrigerate.

air-course (ãr′kōrs), n. A passage in a mine made or used for ventilating purposes; an air-way.

air-crossing (ãr′krôs″ing), n. A passageway or bridge constructed to carry one air-course over another, as in the ventilation of coal-mines.

★air-cushion (ãr′kush″ȯn), n. 1. A bag made of an air-tight fabric used when inflated with air as a cushion for a seat.—2. Same as air-bag.—3. A ball or cylinder (usually of india-rubber) filled with air and placed in a water-pipe, to act as a cushion for the water, or to receive the pressure or shock caused by a sudden stoppage of its flow, or by the expansion of the water in freezing.—4. Same as air-spring or pneumatic spring.

air-cylinder (ãr′sil″in-dėr), n. In gun., a device consisting of a cylinder and piston, used for checking the recoil of heavy guns by means of the elasticity of atmospheric air confined within it; a pneumatic buffer.

air-dew (ãr′dū), n. Manna. [Rare.]

air-drain (ãr′drān), n. 1. An empty space left around the external foundation-walls of a building to prevent the earth from lying against them and thus causing dampness.—2. In molding, a large passage for the escape of gases from heavy castings while in the mold.

air-drawn (ãr′drân), a. Drawn or depicted in the air: as, "the air-drawn dagger," Shak., Macbeth, iii. 4.

air-dried (ãr′drīd), a. Dried by or in the air: applied to fruits and materials from which moisture has been removed by exposure to currents of air under natural atmospheric conditions.

air-drill (ãr′dril), n. A rock-drill driven by compressed air, as distinguished from a drill driven by steam. See rock-drill.

air-drum (ãr′drum), n. A drum-shaped chamber or reservoir for air; specifically, in ornith., a large lateral cervical pneumatocyst.

The great air-drums of our pinnated grouse and cock-of-the-plains. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 200.

★air-duct (ãr′dukt), n. A duct or passage conveying air; specifically, in ichth., the communication of the air-bladder with the intestinal canal. It is persistent in physostomous, temporary in physoclistous, fishes.

aire[1]†, n. An old form of aery[2].

aire[2] (ī′re; mod. pron. ãr), n. [Ir., pl. airig; cf. aireach, a noble, a privileged person.] In Irish antiq., a freeman; a gentleman; one of the privileged classes. Aires were of two classes: (a) the flaths, or those who possessed property in land; and (b) the bo-aires, who possessed cows and other chattels. The king was elected by these two classes.

Clansmen who possessed twenty-one cows and upwards were airig (sing. aire), or, as we should say, had the franchise, and might fulfil the functions of bail, witness, etc.
Encyc. Brit., XIII. 257.

The upper classes were all aires. To be eligible to the aire grade, the freeman should possess, besides a certain amount of wealth in cattle, a prescribed assortment of agricultural implements and household goods.
Encyc. Brit., IV. 252.

air-endway (ãr′end″wā), n. A roadway or level driven into a coal-seam parallel with a main level, used chiefly for purposes of ventilation. Gresley. [Eng.]

air-engine (ãr′en″jin), n. A motor employing (a) the elastic force of air expanded by heat, Ericsson's Hot-air Pumping-engine.

a, beam; b, air-piston; c, transfer-piston; d, cylinder; f, air-piston link; k, bell-crank; o, side-rods; p, transfer-piston rod; r, pump; s, air-chamber; t, vacuum-chamber; u, gas-furnace; v, gas-burners; w, gas-chamber; x, water-jacket.

or (b) air compressed by means of another and separate motor, called a compressor, which is generally a steam-engine. Mining machinery, such as drills and underground pumps, are often run by compressed-air engines, the compressor being located at the surface, and the air-engines distributed underground, at the various points where their work is required.

air-equalizer (ãr′ē″kwal-ī-zėr), n. A device for distributing a current of air equally throughout its working-space.

airer (ãr′ėr), n. [< air[1], v., + -er[1].] 1. One who airs or exposes to the air.—2. A screen for drying clothes, etc.

air-escape (ãr′es-kāp″), n. An air-trap for the escape of air which collects in the upper bends of water-pipes and in other hydraulic apparatus. The usual form is that of a ball-cock (which see) inclosed in a chamber situated at the point at which the air is to be withdrawn, and so adjusted that as the water-level within is lowered by the pressure of the accumulated air the ball-float descends, opens the valve, and permits the air to escape; the water then rising buoys up the float and closes the valve.

air-exhauster (ãr′eg-zâs″tėr), n. 1. Same as air-escape.—2. Any apparatus, as an air-pump, exhaust-fan, suction-blower, or steam-jet, used for withdrawing air from an inclosed place, for ventilation or for the creation of a vacuum. See air-pump, blower, fan, and ventilator.

air-faucet (ãr′fâ″set), n. A stop-cock for letting air out or in.

air-filter (ãr′fil″tėr), n. An apparatus for extracting dust, smoke, microscopic germs, etc., from the air. It consists of screens or strainers of woven-wire fabrics, cotton, asbestos, slag-wool, or other flocculent material, through which the air is drawn; or of showers, sprays, or films of water or chemical solutions, through or over which the air to be filtered passes. Air-filters are used in the ventilation of buildings and railroad-cars, in physical research, in surgery, and in the recovery of by-products in manufactures.

air-flue (ãr′flö), n. A conduit for air. See air-box, air-funnel, and air-pipe.

air-fountain (ãr′foun″tān), n. An apparatus for producing a jet of water by the elastic force of air compressed in a close vessel and made to act on the surface of the water to be raised.

air-funnel (ãr′fun″el), n. In ship-building, a flue formed by the omission of a timber in the upper works of a vessel, and designed to promote the ventilation of the hold.

air-furnace (ãr′fėr″nās), n. 1. A reverberatory furnace (which see, under furnace).—2. An air-heating furnace for warming apartments. Air is led into a space formed between an outer casing and the sides of a fire-pot and combustion-chamber, and is there heated. See furnace.

air-gage (ãr′gāj), n. An instrument for indicating the pressure of air or gases. For low pressure it may consist of a glass tube of uniform caliber, closed at the top and having its lower end dipped into a cup of mercury on the surface of which the air or gas presses, thus forcing mercury into the tube, and compressing the air within it to an amount directly proportioned to the pressure. This pressure can be read from a scale attached to the tube, the zero of the scale being usually placed at the upper surface of the mercurial column when the instrument is exposed to the ordinary atmospheric pressure. For higher pressure some form of calibrated spring is used whose deformation measures the pressure.

★air-gas (ãr′gas), n. An inflammable illuminating gas made by charging ordinary atmospheric air with the vapors of petroleum, naphtha, or some similar substance, as the hydrocarbon called gasolene.

air-gate (ãr′gāt), n. 1. An underground roadway in a coal-mine, used chiefly for ventilation. [Eng. Midland coal-fields.]—2. In molding, an orifice through which the displaced air and the gases which are formed escape from the mold while the molten matter is filling it.

air-gossamer (ãr′gos″a-mėr), n. Same as air-thread.

air-governor (ãr′guv″ėr-nȯr), n. A device, attached to pneumatic apparatus and machinery, for regulating the pressure or delivery of air.

air-grating (ãr′grā″ting), n. A grating protecting or forming a ventilating orifice in a wall or partition. See air-brick.

air-gun (ãr′gun), n. A gun in which condensed air is used as the propelling agent. The bore of the barrel is connected with a reservoir inclosed within or attached without the stock, into which air is forced by a piston or plunger fitted to the bore, or by an independent condenser. When the trigger is pulled it operates a valve which permits the sudden escape of the whole or of a portion of the condensed air into the barrel at the rear of the ball or dart, thus projecting the latter. In some forms the propelling agent is a compressed spring freed by the trigger. The reactive force of the spring compresses the air which interposes between it and the projectile, and the air acts upon and projects the ball.

Air-gun.

air-heading (ãr′hed″ing), n. An excavation in a mine through which air is made to pass for ventilation.

★air-hoist (ãr′hoist), n. Hoisting machinery operated by compressed air. A simple form, used with cranes, is a cylinder with piston and piston-rod operated by compressed air. The load is suspended from the end of the piston-rod. See crane, pneumatic hoist.

air-holder (ãr′hōl″dėr), n. 1. A vessel for holding air for any purpose, as for counteracting the pressure of a decreasing column of mercury, or for keeping up a moderate and steady current of air. See airometer, air-vessel, and gas-holder.—2†. A gasometer.

air-hole (ãr′hōl), n. 1. An opening to admit or discharge air.—2. In founding, a fault in a casting, caused by a bubble of air which passes from the core outward, and is retained in the metal. Also called blow-hole.—3. A natural opening in the frozen surface of a river or pond, caused by currents or springs.

airie[1]† (ãr′i), a. An old spelling of airy[1].

airie[2]† (ãr′i), n. An old spelling of aery[2].

airified (ãr′i-fīd), a. [< airify,* make airy (< air[1] (air[2]) + -fy), + -ed[2].] Fashioned in an airy manner; characterized by the assumption of airs: as, an airified style. [Contemptuous or slighting.]

airily (ãr′i-li), adv. [< airy[1] + -ly[2].] 1. In an airy or gay manner; gaily; jauntily.

Fanny bade her father good-night, and whisked off airily. Dickens, Little Dorrit.

2. Lightly; delicately: as, airily wrought details.

airiness (ãr′i-nes), n. 1. Exposure to a free current of air; openness to the air: as, the airiness of a country-seat.—2. Unsubstantiality, like that of air.—3. Delicacy and lightness; ethereality.—4. Sprightliness of motion or manner; gaiety; jauntiness; vanity; affectation: as, the airiness of young persons.

airing (ãr′ing), n. [Verbal n. of air[1], v.] 1. An exposure to the air, or to a fire, for drying or warming.—2. Exercise in or exposure to the open air; an excursion for the purpose of taking the air.

All the virtues seemed to have come out for an airing in one chariot. Motley, Dutch Republic, III. 534.

airing-stage (ãr′ing-stāj), n. A stage or platform upon which materials are placed to be aired or dried: as, the airing-stage upon which powder is dried.

air-injector (ãr′in-jek″tọr), n. A simple blowing device, used with a dental drill or employed for removing dust from the path of a fine saw.

airisad†, airisard†, n. Same as arisad.

airish† (ãr′ish), a. [ME. ayrisshe, ayerissh, etc.; < air[1] + -ish[1].] 1. Of or belonging to the air; aërial.

And beheld the ayerisshe bestes. Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 965.

2. Cool; fresh.

The morninges are airish. Best, Farming, p. 18. (N. E. D.)

★air-jacket (ãr′jak″et), n. A jacket inflated with air, or to which bladders filled with air are fastened, to render the wearer buoyant in water.

airless (ãr′les), a. [< air[1] + -less.] 1. Not open to a free current of air; wanting fresh air or communication with open air.—2. Without air; devoid of atmosphere.

Desolate as the lifeless, airless moon. Harper's Mag., LXV. 73.

air-level (ãr′lev″el), n. A name sometimes given to a spirit-level (which see).

air-line (ãr′līn), n. and a. I. n. A line as direct as though drawn or stretched through the air; a bee-line.

II. a. Straight or direct as a line in the air; not deflected laterally: as, an air-line railroad.

airling† (ãr′ling), n. [< air[1] + -ling[1].] A thoughtless, gay person.

Some more there be, slight airlings, will be won With dogs and horses. B. Jonson, Catiline, i. 3.

air-lock (ãr′lok), n. An air-tight chamber in a caisson in which operations are carried on under water, communicating by one door with the outer air and the main entrance-shaft of the caisson, and by another door with the chambers filled with condensed air in which the men are at work. Its purpose is to prevent escape of air-pressure when workmen or materials are to enter or leave the compressed-air chamber. When a workman steps from the shaft into the air-lock the door of ingress is closed, and condensed air is admitted until the pressure is the same as that in the working-chamber. The process is reversed when leaving the caisson.

air-locomotive (ãr′lō-kō-mō″tiv), n. A locomotive driven by compressed or heated air, usually the former.

air-logged (ãr′logd), a. [< air[1] + logged, after water-logged.] In mach., impeded, as motion, by the intrusion of air: as a machine comprising a piston and cylinder when air enters the cylinder and remains between the piston and the cylinder-head, preventing a full stroke, or liquid flowing in pipes when stopped by a pocket of air.

air-machine (ãr′ma-shēn″), n. In mining, an apparatus by which pure air is forced into parts badly ventilated, and the foul air extracted.

air-manometer (ãr′ma-nom″e-tėr), n. Same as air-gage. See manometer.

air-meter (ãr′mē″tėr), n. An apparatus for measuring the quantity or rate of flow of air; a form of anemometer usually so graduated as to give directly the volume of air (cubic feet or meters) delivered per second by a stream of air of a given cross-section.

airn (ārn), n. Scotch form of iron.

airohydrogen (ãr′ō-hī″drō-jen), a. [< air[1], after aëro-, + hydrogen.] Pertaining to a mixture of atmospheric air and hydrogen.—Airohydrogen blowpipe. See blowpipe.

airometer (ãr-om′e-tėr), n. [< air[1], after aëro-, + Gr. μέτρον, measure. Cf. aërometer.] 1. An air-holder constructed upon the principle of the gasometer, whence the name. See gasometer.—2. Same as air-meter.

The airometer, the invention of Mr. Henry Hall, the Inspector, by means of a delicately-constructed windmill, shows the rate of the current of air in the passages of the colliery. Ure, Dict., IV. 890.

air-passage (ãr′pas″āj), n. 1. In anat., one of the passages by which air is admitted to the lungs, as the nasal passages, the larynx, the trachea, and the bronchial tubes or their minute ramifications.—2. In bot., a large intercellular space in the stems and leaves of aquatic plants, and in the stems of endogens.

air-pipe (ãr′pīp), n. A pipe used to draw foul air out of or conduct fresh air into close places. Specifically—(a) A pipe used to draw foul air from a ship's hold by means of a communication with the furnace and of the rarefaction of the air by the fire. (b) In mining, a pipe through which air passes, either for ventilation or for use in an air-engine. (c) A small copper pipe leading from the top of the hot-well of a marine engine through the side of the vessel, for the discharge of the air and uncondensed vapor removed from the condenser by the air-pump.

air-pit (ãr′pit), n. A pit or shaft in a coal-mine, used for ventilation. Also called air-shaft. [Eng.]

air-plant (ãr′plant), n. A plant unconnected with the ground and apparently living on air: applied to epiphytes, but usually not to parasites. Many epiphytic orchids in cultivation are popularly so named.

air-poise (ãr′poiz), n. An instrument used to measure the weight of the air.

air-port (ãr′pōrt), n. In ship-building: (a) A small aperture cut in the side of a vessel to admit light and air. One is generally placed in each state-room, and there are several on each side along the berth-deck. They are usually fitted so as to close with a pane of thick glass, set in a brass frame, turning on a hinge, and secured when closed by a heavy thumb-screw. (b) A large scuttle placed in a ship's bows for the admission of air. Also called air-scuttle.

air-proof (ãr′prōf), a. Impervious to air.

air-pump (ãr′pump), n. An apparatus for the ★exhaustion, compression, or transmission of air. Air-pumps are used for many purposes, and are made in a variety of forms, which differ according to the uses that they serve. In the more common forms the air is exhausted by means of a cylinder and piston, as in Ritchie's air-pump (see cut), or by centrifugal action. Rotating buckets dipping into water, which forms a seal, are used for some special purposes; as is also, for slight changes of pressure, a form consisting of a vessel closed at the top and sides but open at the bottom, and dipping to a certain extent into water or other fluid, which forms a seal and prevents the escape of the air. For the Sprengel air-pump, see mercury air-pump, under mercury. The air-pump of a condensing steam-engine is used to maintain a vacuum within the condenser by withdrawing from it air and uncondensed vapor. See air-compressor, aspirator, ejector, pump, steam-jet.—Air and circulating pumps, in a condensing steam-engine, a combined apparatus used as an air-pump and also to circulate the condensing water.—Air-pump bucket, an open piston with valves on the upper surface opening upward so as to admit air and water during the down-stroke, and lift them with the up-stroke, of the pump.

Ritchie's Air-Pump.

air-pyrometer (ãr′pī-rom″e-tėr), n. An instrument used for measuring high temperatures. It consists of a hollow globe made of platinum, so that it may resist excessive heat, filled with air or gas, and connected with a bent glass tube, which holds at its bend water, mercury, or other liquid. The expansion by heat of the air within the globe exerts a pressure upon the liquid, causing it to rise in one leg of the tube to a height proportioned to the expansion, and therefore to the heat which causes it. See pyrometer.

air-receptacle (ãr′rē-sep″ta-kl), n. In ornith., a large air-cell; an air-space, air-sac, or pneumatocyst.

Continuous air-receptacles throughout the body. Owen.

air-regulator (ãr′reg″ū-lā-tọr), n. Any apparatus designed to govern the admission or flow of air, as a damper or register.

air-reservoir (ãr′rez″ėr-vwor), n. See air-holder and air-vessel.

★air-sac (ãr′sak), n. 1. In ornith., a large air-cell; an air-space, an air-receptacle, or a pneumatocyst; one of the membranous bags or receptacles of air lodged in the hollow bones and the cavities of the body of birds, and communicating with the lungs.—2. pl. The elongated cavities forming the ultimate branches of the air-passages in the lungs of mammals. Also called infundibula.

air-scuttle (ãr′skut″l), n. Same as air-port, (b).

air-setting (ãr′set″ing), a. Setting or hardening on exposure to air, as common mortar.

air-shaft (ãr′shaft), n. 1. Same as air-pit.—2. Any ventilating shaft.

air-slaked (ãr′slākt), a. Hydrated and disintegrated by exposure to atmospheric air: as, air-slaked lime.

air-sollar (ãr′sol″ãr), n. A compartment, passageway, or brattice carried beneath the floor of a heading or an excavation in a coal-mine, for ventilation. See sollar.

air-space (ãr′spās), n. 1. In ornith., an air-cell of large size; an air-receptacle or a pneumatocyst (which see).—2. In med. and sanitary science, the clear cubic contents of a room, as the ward of a hospital, with reference to the respirable air contained in it: as, air-space per man, so many cubic feet.—3. In firearms, the space in the powder-chamber not occupied by powder grains.

air-spring (ãr′spring), n. Any device designed to resist a sudden pressure, as the recoil of a gun, the closing of a swinging door, or the thrust of the moving parts of a machine, by means of the elasticity of compressed air. The common form is that of a cylinder containing air which is compressed by a piston or plunger. Same as pneumatic spring. Also called air-cushion or air-buffer.

air-stack (ãr′stak), n. A chimney used for ventilating a coal-mine. [Pennsylvania.]

air-stove (ãr′stōv), n. A stove provided with flues about the fire-box and chamber, the air in which when heated ascends through pipes to the apartments to be supplied with warmth. See air-furnace and heater.

air-strake (ãr′strāk), n. In ship-building, an opening left for ventilating purposes between two planks of the inside ceiling of a ship.

airt (ārt), n. [Also spelled airth, art, arth; < Gael. àird, àrd = Ir. ard, a height, top, point, a promontory, a point of the compass, esp. one of the four cardinal points, a quarter of the heavens.] Point of the compass; direction. [Scotch.]

Of a' the airts the wind can blaw, I dearly lo'e the west. Burns, Song.

airt (ārt), v. t. [Also spelled art, ert; < airt, n.] To direct or point out the way: as, can you airt me to the school-house? [Scotch.]

air-thermometer (ãr′thėr-mom″e-tėr), n. A thermometer in which air is used instead of mercury. It has the advantage of being more delicate and accurate, and can be employed at any temperature; but it is difficult to use, and hence is employed only in physical experiments. It is useful as a standard with which the indications of ordinary thermometers may be compared. Leslie's differential thermometer is a kind of air-thermometer. See thermometer.

air-thread (ãr′thred), n. A spider's thread floating in the air. Also called air-gossamer.

air-tight (ãr′tīt), a. So tight or close as to be impermeable to air: as, an air-tight vessel.—Air-tight stove, a kind of sheet-iron stove in which wood is used as fuel: so named because, although not literally air-tight, it is practically so in comparison with an open fireplace.

★air-trap (ãr′trap), n. 1. A contrivance for preventing the access, as to a room, of the effluvia arising from drains and sinks.—2. A reservoir and escape-valve placed at the joints or higher points of a water-main or pipe-line to allow the escape of air which may accumulate in the pipes.

air-trunk (ãr′trungk), n. A large conduit for supplying pure air to, or for removing foul or heated air from, theaters, etc.

air-tube (ãr′tūb), n. 1. In zoöl., a name given to certain horny passages for air in the abdomen of some aquatic insects.—2. Naut., a small iron tube filled with water and hung in a coal-box in the coal-bunkers of a steamship as a means of ascertaining the temperature of the coal. The temperature of the water is taken by means of a thermometer. Its use is a precaution against the spontaneous combustion of the coal.
3. The tube of an atmospheric railway, as the pneumatic tube (which see, under tube).

air-tumbler (ãr′tum″blėr), n. That which tumbles through the air; specifically, a kind of pigeon. See tumbler, 3.

Mr. Brent, however, had an Air-Tumbler . . . which had in both wings eleven primaries.
Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, p. 167.

★air-valve (ãr′valv), n. In general, a valve designed to control the flow of air. Specifically —1. A valve placed upon any vessel to admit air, and thus prevent the formation of a vacuum by the condensation of vapor within when the vessel is cooling off, and the consequent tendency to collapse.—2. A valve placed at bends and summits of water-pipes, etc., for the outflow of air, as when the pipes are being filled, and for the ingress of air to prevent the formation of a vacuum when the water is drawn out.

★air-vesicle (ãr′ves″i-kl), n. 1. In entom., a dilatation of the trachea of certain insects, which enables them to change their specific gravity by filling the trachea with or emptying it of air.—2. In ichth., a vesicle containing air, connected with the swim-bladder and also with the ear-parts.

air-vessel (ãr′ves″el), n. 1. An air-chamber or air-holder, especially one which serves as a reservoir of air in certain machines, as in carbureters.—2. The air-chamber of certain pumps. In the feed-pumps of a steam-boiler an air-vessel is used which serves both to equalize the flow of the water and to collect from it the free air. In pumping-engines working against considerable heads and into long rising mains such air-vessels are made of great size to insure steady flow.
3. In anat. and zoöl., a cavity of the body receiving, containing, or conveying atmospheric air; an air-tube, air-cell, or air-chamber; especially, a respiratory passage, as the windpipe of a vertebrate or the trachea of an insect.
Also called air-reservoir.

airward, airwards (ãr′wärd, -wärdz), adv. [< air[1] + -ward, -wards.] Up into the air; upward: as, "soar airwards again," Thackeray, Shabby-Genteel Story, iv.

air-washings (ãr′wosh″ingz), n. pl. Any fluid in which air has been washed, or the residue left after the evaporation of such fluid. The process of washing consists either in causing air to bubble slowly through the fluid, or in agitating a confined volume of air with the fluid. The air in either case gives up to the fluid the dust, spores, and other foreign substances suspended in it.

In several cases, the air-washings which were under examination gave a distinct, clear, green coloration in place of the characteristic yellowish-brown precipitate produced by ammonia. Science, III. 463.

airway (ãr′wā), n. Any passage in a mine used for purposes of ventilation; an air-course. [In England, to fill up, obstruct, or damage an airway maliciously is a felony.]

air-wood (ãr′wůd), n. Wood dried or seasoned by exposure to the air, and not artificially.

Have the veneers ready, which must be air-wood, not too dry. Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 414.

airy[1] (ãr′i), a. [Early mod. E. airie, ayry, aiery, ayery (sometimes, and still poet., aery, after L. aërius: see aery[1]), < ME. ayery; < air[1] (in sense 8, < air[2], ult. = air[1]) + -y[1].] 1. Consisting of or having the character of air; immaterial; ethereal.

The thinner and more airy parts of bodies. Bacon.

Oft, as in airy rings they skim the heath,
The clamorous lapwings feel the leaden death.
Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 131.

2. Relating or belonging to the air; being in the air; aërial.

Her eye in heaven
Would through the airy region stream so bright.
Shak., R. and J., ii. 2.

Airy navies grappling in the central blue.
Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

3. Open to a free current of air; breezy: as, an airy situation.

And by the moon the reaper weary,
Piling sheaves in uplands airy.
Tennyson, Lady of Shalott.

4. Light as air; intangible; unsubstantial; empty; unreal; flimsy: as, airy ghosts.

The poet's pen . . . gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name.
Shak., M. N. D., v. 1.

I hold ambition of so airy and light a quality, that it is but a shadow's shadow. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2.

5. Visionary; speculative: as, airy notions; an airy metaphysician.—6. Graceful; delicate.

E'en the slight hare-bell raised its head,
Elastic from her airy tread.
Scott, L. of the L., i. 18.

Here delicate snow-stars, out of the cloud,
Come floating downward in airy play.
Bryant, Snow-Shower.

7. Light in manner or movement; sprightly; gay; lively.

It saddens the heart to see a man, from whom nature has withheld all perception of the tones and attitudes of humour, labouring with all his might to be airy and playful. Gifford, Ford's Plays, Int., p. xlv.

Chaucer works still in the solid material of his race, but with what airy lightness has he not infused it?
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 252.

8. Jaunty; full of airs; affectedly lofty; pretentious.—9. In painting, showing that proper recession of all parts which expresses distance and atmosphere. = Syn. Airy, Aërial, aëriform. Airy is more open to figurative meanings than aërial. The latter is the more exact word in other respects; it applies to the air as atmosphere: as, aërial navigation. Airy applies rather to air in motion, and to that which has the qualities, literal or imagined, of air.

Echo's no more an empty airy sound;
But a fair nymph that weeps her lover drown'd.
Dryden, Art of Poetry, iii. 598.

We have already discovered the art of coasting along the aërial shores of our planet, by means of balloons.
Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 77.

airy[2]† (ãr′i), n. An old and better spelling of aery[2].

airy[3] (ãr′i), n. A provincial form of area.

aisle (īl), n. [< ME. ele, hele, eille, eyle, ille, ylle, ile, yle, whence in early mod. E. isle, and even yland (see ile[2], isle[2]), by confusion with ME. ile, yle, later corruptly isle (see ile[1], isle[1]), < OF. ele, eele, ale, later aelle, aile (whence the mod. E. spelling aile, recently spelled with s, aisle, after isle[2], isle[1], as above), aisle, wing of a church, < L. āla, a wing, wing of a building, upper end of the arm, a contr. of axula*, axla*, dim. (double dim. axilla: see axil) of axis: see ala, axis, axle. The s in aisle, isle[2] is thus unoriginal; the pronunciation has remained true to the proper historical spelling ile.] Properly, a lateral subdivision of a church, parallel to the nave, choir, or transept, from which it is divided by piers or columns, and often surmounted by a gallery. The term is also improperly applied to the central or main division: as, a three-aisled church, that is, a church with a nave and two aisles. It is also used to designate the alleys or divisions of other structures, such as mosques, Egyptian temples, theaters, public halls, etc. As popularly applied to churches in which the nave and aisles proper are filled with pews, and in general to modern places of assembly, aisle denotes merely a passageway giving access to the seats: as, the center aisle and side aisles. Sometimes written isle. See figure showing ground-plan of a cathedral, under cathedral.

South Aisle of Rouen Cathedral (13th century).

aislé (ā-lā′), a. [F. aislé, ailé, pp. of aisler, ailer, give wings to, < aisle, aile, a wing: see aisle.] In her., winged or having wings.

aisled (īld), a. Furnished with aisles.

aisleless (īl′les), a. [< aisle + -less.] Without aisles.

The so-called Christian basilica may have been a simple oblong aisleless room divided by a cross arch.
Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 46.

aislet (ī′let), n. Misspelling of islet.

aislette, n. See ailette.

ait (āt), n. [Little used in literature; also spelled aight, eyet, eyot, eyght, < ME. eyt, æit (also in comp. eitlond and æitlond, an island), earlier eyet*, < AS. ēget*, a prob. var. of īget (found once in the AS. Charters), an ait, another form of the reg. (W. Saxon) īgoth, also spelled īgeoth, iggoth, iggath (ēgath* not found), an island, with suffix -oth, -ath, here appar. dim., < īg, var. ēg, an island, found in mod. E. only as the first element of i-land, now spelled improp. island, and as the final element (-ey, -ea, -y) in certain place-names: see island and ey[2].] A small island in a river or lake.

Fog up the river, where it flows among green aits and meadows. Dickens.

aitch (āch), n. A modern spelling of the name of the letter H: formerly written ache. See H.

aitchbone (āch′bōn), n. [Written and pronounced variously, aitch-, H-, ach-, each-, edge-, ash-, ische-, ise-, ize-, ice-bone, etc., and even turned into haunch-, hook-, ridge-bone, etc., all being corruptions or erroneous explanations of the misunderstood or not-understood original ME. nache-bone, < nache (< OF. nache, nage, the buttock, < ML. natica*, < L. natis, buttock) + bone[1]. The initial n was early lost, as in adder[1]; hence the form ach-, hach-bone, etc.] The bone of the buttock or rump in cattle; the cut of beef which includes this bone.

Kerve up the flesh ther up to the hach-bone.
Book of St. Albans (1486).

aitchpiece (āch′pēs), n. [< aitch, the name of the letter H, + piece.] A part of a plunger or force-pump by which the water is forced into the stand-pipe through the door-piece. Also H-piece.

aith (āth), n. Scotch form of oath.

aitiology (ā-ti-ol′ō-ji), n. Another spelling, nearer the Greek, of ætiology.

aits (āts), n. Scotch form of oats.

aiver (ā′vėr), n. Scotch form of aver[2], a work-horse.

Aix (āks), n. [NL., < Gr. αἴξ (αἰγ-), a waterbird, appar. of the goose kind; prop. a goat.] A genus of fresh-water ducks, of the family Anatidæ and subfamily Anatinæ, noted for the elegance of their plumage. It includes the celebrated mandarin-duck of China, A. galericulata, and the beautiful wood-duck or summer duck of North America, A. sponsa. Also written Æx.

Aix beds. See bed.

aizle (ā′zl or ē′zl), n. Scotch form of isle[3].

ajaia, ajaja, n. See aiaia.

ajar[1] (a-jär′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3] + jar[1], discord.] Out of harmony; jarring.

Any accident . . . that puts an individual ajar with the world. Hawthorne, Marble Faun, I. xiii.

ajar[2] (a-jär′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< ME. on char, ajar, lit. on the turn; rare as applied to a door, but common in other senses: on, prep., on; char, cherre, etc., a turn, time, piece of work, etc.: see a[3] and jar[2] = char[2]. The change of ME. ch to E. j is very rare; it appears also in jowl and jaw, q. v.] On the turn; neither quite open nor shut; partly opened: said of a door.

Leave the door ajar
When he goes wistful by at dinner-time.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 129.

ajava (aj′a-vä), n. Same as ajowan.

ajee, agee (a-jē′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[3] + jee or gee: see jee, gee.] Awry; off the right line; obliquely; wrong. [Scotch and prov. Eng.]

His brain was a wee ajee, but he was a braw preacher for a' that. Scott, Old Mortality, xxiv.

ajouan, n. See ajowan.

ajoupa (a-jö′pä), n. [F. spelling of native name.] A hut or wigwam, built on piles and covered with branches, leaves, or rushes.

à jour (ä zhör). [F.: à, to, with; jour, day: see journal.] In decorative art, pierced through; showing daylight through. Said of carving where the work is carried through the solid mass, leaving open spaces, and also of embroidery, metal-work, or any other fabric; said also of translucent designs, as in enamel or intaglio, when meant to be seen by transmitted rather than reflected light. Also called a giorno. See openwork.

ajouré (a-zhö-rā′), a. [F., as if pp. of ajourer*, let daylight through, < à jour: see above.] In her., said of any ordinary or bearing of which the middle part is taken away, leaving only an outer rim, through or within which the field is seen.

ajowan, ajouan (aj′ö-an), n. [E. Ind.] The fruit of an annual umbelliferous plant, Ammi Copticum, cultivated in Egypt, Persia, and India. It is much used as a condiment and as a carminative. The oil extracted from it contains thymol or thymic acid. Also called ajava or javanee seeds.

ajust†, v. t. An old spelling of adjust.

ajutage (aj′ö-tāj), n. [< F. ajoutage, something added, < ajouter, add, join: see adjust.] Properly, a short tube, or nozle, inserted into the wall of a vessel or into the end of a pipe, so shaped as to offer the least frictional resistance to the outflow of a liquid. The cross-section of an ajutage is generally circular; longitudinally, the most advantageous section approaches that of two frustums of cones with their smaller bases in contact. The word is also used for the spout or nozle of a funnel or of a fountain. Sometimes spelled adjutage.

akamatsu (ä-kä′mats), n. [< Jap. aka, red, + matsŭ, pine.] The Japanese red pine, Pinus densiflora.

akazga (a-kaz′gä), n. [Native name.] A kind of poison used as an ordeal in Africa. Also called boudou (see voudou) and quai.

akazgia (a-kaz′ji-ä), n. [NL., < akazga.] An alkaloid obtained from akazga, resembling strychnine in its physiological action.

akbeer (ak′bēr), n. [Hind.] A red powder thrown on the clothes and person at Hindu festivals.

ake, n. and v. See ache[1].

Akebia (a-kē′bi-ä), n. [NL., < Jap. akebi.] A genus of woody climbing plants, of the family Lardizabalaceæ, of China and Japan. A. quinata has been introduced into cultivation, and is a handsome, hardy vine, with dark-green digitate leaves and small purplish flowers.

akee (a-kē′), n. A tree, Blighia sapida, belonging to the family Sapindaceæ, a native of Guinea, whence it was carried by Captain Bligh to Jamaica in 1793, and thence disseminated over the West Indies and South America. It is a small tree, with ash-like leaves and a fleshy fruit containing several large jet-black seeds partly embedded in a white spongy aril. This aril when cooked becomes somewhat like custard, and is highly esteemed.

Akee Fruit.

akehorn†, n. A corrupt spelling of acorn.

akelet, v. t. [< ME. akelen (also achelen), < AS. ācēlan, < ā- + cēlan, > E. keel[3], make cool: see keel[3] and acold.] To make cold; cool. Court of Love.

aker[1]† (ā′ker), n. The old and regular spelling of acre.

aker[2]†, n. Older form of acker[2].

Akera (ak′e-rä), n. Same as Acera, 1.

akern†, n. The historically correct but long obsolete spelling of acorn.

akerspire†, v. and n. An old spelling of acrospire.

aker-staff†, n. See acre-staff.

akey (ak′ä), n. [Native term.] The monetary standard of the Gold Coast of Africa, equal to 20 grains of gold-dust, or about 80 cents.

akimbo, akimbow (a-kim′bō), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [Recently also written akembo, akembow, earlier a-kimbo, a-kembo, a kimbow, a kembo, on kimbo, on kimbow, and by apheresis kimbo, kimbow, kembo (used attrib. as an adj. and also as a verb: see kimbo, kimbow), also with perverted termination, a-kimboll, a-kemboll, on kemboll, a kenbold, a kenbol, early mod. E. a kenbow, on kenbow, < ME. (once) in kenebowe, i. e., 'in keen bow,' in a sharp bend, at an acute angle, presenting a sharp elbow: in or on, E. a[3]; kene, E. keen[1], sharp-pointed, sharp-edged (in common use in ME. as applied to the point of a spear, pike, dagger, goad, thorn, hook, anchor, etc., or the edge of a knife, sword, ax, etc.); bowe, E. bow[2], a bend: see a[3], keen[1], bow[2], and cf. elbow; for the phonetic changes, cf. alembic, limbeck, and keelson, kelson, kilson. In its earliest use, and often later, the term connotes a bold or defiant attitude, involving, perhaps, an allusion to keen in its other common ME. sense of 'bold.' Previous explanations, all certainly erroneous, have been: (1) It. aschembo, asghembo, or rather a schembo, a sghembo, across, awry, obliquely (Skinner, Wedgwood); (2) < a cambok, in the manner of a crooked stick (ME. cambok, Sc. cammock, a crooked stick, a shinny-club: see cammock[2]); (3) a cam bow, in a crooked bow: a phrase invented for the purpose, like the once-occurring a-gambo for akembo, simulating cam[2], gamb; (4) Icel. kengboginn, crooked, < kengr, a crook, staple, bend, bight, + boginn, bent, pp. of bjūga = AS. būgan, E. bow[1]: see kink and bow[1].] Literally, in a sharp bend; at an acute angle; adjectively, bent; crooked: said of the arms when the hands are on the hips and the elbows are bent outward at an acute angle.

> The hoost . . . set his hond in kenebowe. . . .
> Woulst thow, said he to Beryn, for to skorne me?
> Tale of Beryn (ed. Furnivall), 1837.

> A book through which folly and ignorance, those brethren so lame and impotent, do ridiculously look very big and very dull, strut and hobble, cheek by jowl, with their arms on kimbo, being led and supported, and bully-backed by that blind Hector, Impudence.
> Dennis, Pope's Ess. on Criticism, p. 30.

> That struts in this fashion with his Arms a kimbo, like a City Magistrate. Dryden, Amphitryon, ii.

> She would clap her arms a kimbo.
> Steele, Spectator, No. 187.

akin (a-kin′), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [< a[4] + kin[1]; earlier of kin, which is still in use: see kin[1], n. Sometimes abbr. kin: see kin[1], a.] Of kin. Specifically—(a) Related by blood; hence, intimately allied, as by affinity, union, or structure: as, the two families are near akin; the buffalo is akin to the ox.

> Akin to thine is this declining frame,
> And this poor beggar claims an Uncle's name.
> Crabbe, Parish Register.

> Wert thou akin to me in some new name
> Dearer than sister, mother, or all blood,
> I would not hear thee speak.
> Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, i. 3.

(b) Allied by nature; partaking of the same properties: as, envy and jealousy are near akin; "pity's akin to love," Southern, Oroonoko, ii. 1.

> Near akin as the judicial and military actions originally are, they are naturally at first discharged by the same agency. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 528.

★= Syn. Kin, kindred, cognate, analogous.

akinesia (ak-i-nē′si-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀκινησία, quiescence, motionlessness, < ἀ- priv. + κίνησις, motion, < κινεῖν, move.] A neurosis or psychosis accompanied with a loss of motor power. Also written acinesia, akinesis.

akmite, n. See acmite.

aknee (a-nē′), prep. phr. as adv. [< ME. a kne, a cne, on kne, on cneowe, < AS. on cneówe: on, E. a[3]; cneów, E. knee.] On the knee or knees. [Rare.]

> Aknee they fell before the Prince.
> Southey, Madoc.

aknow†, aknowledge†. Older forms of acknow, acknowledge.

ako (ak′ō), n. [Hung. akó.] A liquid measure used in Hungary, equal to about 18½ gallons.

akorn†, n. An old spelling of acorn.

al[1] (äl), n. [< Hind. āl, a plant (see def.).] The ★Indian mulberry, Morinda citrifolia.

al[2]†, a., adv., and n. An old form of all.

Al. In chem., the symbol for aluminium.

al-[1]. An assimilated form of Latin ad- before l (see ad-); also an erroneous form of a-[1], from Anglo-Saxon ā-. See ad-.

al-[2]. [Ar. al, in mod. Ar. commonly el; before a sibilant or a liquid, the l is assimilated (as-, az-, ar-, am-, an-, etc.), with the elision of the vowel if another vowel precedes.] A prefix in some words of Arabic origin, being the Arabic definite article "the"; as in alcaid, alchemy, alcohol, alcove, Aldebaran, algebra, alguazil, alkali, Alkoran, etc.; and, variously disguised, in apricot, artichoke, assagai, azimuth, hazard, lute, etc.; also el, as in elixir.

-al. [< F. -al, -el = Sp. Pg. -al = It. -ale, < L. -ālis, acc. -ālem, an adj. suffix, 'of the kind of,' 'pertaining to,' varying with -āris, orig. the same as -ālis, and used for it when l precedes, as in al-aris, E. al-ar: see -ar[3]. In OF. this suffix was reg. -el, > ME. -el, but afterward -al prevailed: cf. mortal, annual, gradual, n., etc. As a noun suffix, -al is due to the adj. suffix, L. -ālis, neut. -āle, in nouns also -al (as animal, animal). In espousal, and some other words, -al is ult. due to L. -āl-ia, neut. plur.; hence the plur. E. form, espousals. In bridal and burial -al is of different origin. Cf. -el and -il.] A very common suffix, of Latin origin. It forms from nouns in Latin, and thence in English—(a) Adjectives, as in oral [< L. or-ālis, < os (or-), mouth], manual [< L. manu-ālis, < manu-s, hand], etc.: in this use equivalent to -ar, of the same ultimate origin, as in alar, polar, both forms occurring with a differentiation of meaning in lineal, linear (which see). (b) Secondary from primary adjectives, as in equal [< L. æqu-ālis, < æqu-us, equal], whence in English -al is now applied to Latin adjectives ending in -e-us, -i-us, -u-us, -rn-us, -i-s, -ic-us, etc., to give them a distinctive English form, as in aërial, senatorial, perpetual, eternal, celestial, medical, etc., and similarly to Greek adjectives in -ικ-ός, -ακ-ός, -οειδ-ής (English -ic, -ac, -oid), etc., as in musical, heliacal, rhomboidal, etc.; hence in some cases a differentiation of meaning, as in comic and comical, historic and historical, etc. (c) Nouns from such adjectives, as in animal, rival, etc. (d) Nouns from verbs in English after the analogy of espousal, as in denial, proposal, refusal, etc., and even from native English verbs, as in bestowal, betrothal, withdrawal, etc.

à la (ä lä). [F.: à, < L. ad, to; la, fem. of def. art. le, < L. ille, fem. illa.] To the; in the; hence, according to; in the (fashion of); after the (manner of): as, à la française, after the manner of the French; à la mode, in the fashion.

alabaster (al′a-bàs-tėr), n. and a. [Early mod. E. usually alablaster, allablaster, < ME. alabastre, alabaster, alabaustre, alabast (= OD. alabast, abast, D. albast = Dan. alabast = Sw. albaster, now alabaster), < OF. alabastre, F. albâtre = Sp. Pg. It. alabastro = MHG. G. alabaster, < ML. alabastrum, alabaustrum, alabaster (the mineral), < L. alabaster, m., alabastrum, neut., a box or casket for perfumes, unguents, etc., tapering to a point at the top, hence also the form of a rose-bud, = Goth. alabalstraun, < Gr. ἀλάβαστρος, m., ἀλάβαστρον, neut., earlier and more correctly ἀλάβαστος, a box, casket, or vase of alabaster (later also of other materials), the mineral itself being hence known as ἀλαβαστίτης or ἀλαβαστρίτης, L. alabastrites (see alabastrites); said to be named from a town in Egypt where there were quarries of alabaster; but in fact the town was named from the quarries, Ἀλαβαστρῶν πόλις (Ptolemy), L. Alabastrōn oppidum, i. e., 'town of alabastra.' In Ar. and Pers. alabaster is called rukhām.] I. n. 1†. A box, casket, or vase made of alabaster. See alabastrum.—2. A marble-like mineral of which there are two well-known varieties, the gypseous and the calcareous. The former is a crystalline granular variety of sulphate of calcium or gypsum, $CaSO_4.2H_2O$. It is of various colors, as yellow, red, and gray, but is most esteemed when pure white. Being soft, it can be formed by the lathe or knife into small works of art as vases, statuettes, etc. For this purpose the snow-white, fine-grained variety found near Florence in Italy is especially prized. Calcareous or Oriental alabaster (the alabastrites of the ancients) is a variety of carbonate of calcium or calcite, occurring as a stalactite or stalagmite in caverns of limestone rocks.

II. a. Made of alabaster, or resembling it: as, "an alabaster column," Addison, Travels in Italy.—Alabaster glass, an opaque enamel or glass made in imitation of alabaster.

alabastos (al-a-bas'tos), n. Same as alabastrum.

alabastra, n. Plural of alabastrum.

alabastrian (al-a-bas'tri-an), a. Pertaining to or like alabaster.

alabastrine (al-a-bas'trin), a. Of, pertaining to, or resembling alabaster.—Alabastrine positive, in photog., a collodion positive on glass, in which the light portions of the picture have been bleached and rendered permanently white in a bath of bichlorid of mercury, alcohol, and nitric and hydrochloric acids.

alabastrites (al″a-bas-trī'tēz), n. [L., < Gr. ἀλαβαστρίτης, more correctly ἀλαβαστίτης (sc. λίθος, stone), calcareous alabaster, < ἀλάβαστος, a box or vase: see alabaster.] A precious and richly veined mineral much used in ancient art; the hard Oriental alabaster. See alabaster, 2.

It is evident from Pliny that the Alabastrites which this Phrygian marble resembled was diversified with varied colours. Stuart and Revett, Antiq. of Athens, I. v.

alabastrum (al-a-bas'trum), n.; pl. alabastra (-trä). [L., < Gr. ἀλάβαστρον: see alabaster.]

Alabastrum.

1. In Gr. antiq., a small elongated vase for unguents or perfumes, rounded at the bottom and provided with a broad rim about a small orifice. Vases of this class were originally so called because made of alabaster; but the name was applied also to vessels of similar form and use in other materials, as metal, glass (sometimes richly ornamented in color), or pottery. Sometimes called alabaster, alabastos.

2. [NL., also alabastrus; prop. L. alabaster (acc. pl. alabastros, in Pliny), a rose-bud: see alabaster.] A flower-bud.—Iconic alabastrum, a name sometimes given to an alabastrum terminating above in a figure or head.

à la carte (ä lä kärt). [F.: à la (see à la); carte = Pr. Sp. It. carta, < L. charta, card: see card[1], chart, and charta.] By a bill of fare: as, dinner à la carte, that is, a dinner in which only such dishes as have been ordered from the bill of fare are paid for: opposed to table d'hôte, in which a fixed charge is made covering the whole meal, whether all the dishes served in regular course are eaten, or only some of them. See carte[1], 1.

alack (a-lak'), interj. [Early mod. E. alac, alacke, North. alake, alaik; according to Skeat, < a[9], ah, + lack, failure, fault, disgrace. Otherwise explained as a variation of alas, q. v.; the phonetic change is unusual, but interjections are unstable. Also shortened to lack.] An exclamation expressive of sorrow. [Obsolete or poetical.]

Alack, when once our grace we have forgot,
Nothing goes right. Shak., M. for M., iv. 4.

Alack, alack, his lips be wondrous cold!
Ford, Broken Heart, iv. 2.

alackaday (a-lak'a-dā), interj. [Also alack the day! as if alas the day! day being vaguely used. Also shortened to lackaday, q. v.] An exclamation expressive of regret or sorrow. Also written alack the day. [Now rare.]

Alack the day, . . . I pray you tell me is my boy . . . alive or dead? Shak., M. of V., ii. 2.

Hammond, Sermons, p. 553.

alacritous (a-lak'ri-tus), a. [< alacrity + -ous.] Brisk; lively; cheerful; full of alacrity. Hawthorne.

alacrity (a-lak'ri-ti), n. [= F. alacrité = It. alacrità, < L. alacrita(t-)s, liveliness, briskness, < alacer, alacris, lively, brisk: see alacrious.] 1. Liveliness; briskness; sprightliness.—2. Cheerful readiness or promptitude; cheerful willingness.

I have not that alacrity of spirit,
Nor cheer of mind, that I was wont to have.
Shak., Rich. III., v. 3.

Hence—3. Readiness; quickness; swiftness.

With a dream's alacrity of change,
The priest, and the swart fisher by his side,
Beheld the Eternal City lift its domes.
Whittier, Dream of Pio Nono.

Alactaga (a-lak'ta-gä), n. [NL., said to be the native name, in the Mongol Tatar language, of a spotted colt.] A genus of rodent mammals, of the family Dipodidæ, or jerboas, of the murine series of the suborder Simplicidentata, order Rodentia. It belongs to the same subfamily (Dipodinæ) as the true jerboas of the genus Dipus, but is distinguished from them by having hind feet with 5 toes instead of 3, plain instead of grooved upper incisors, a small upper premolar on each side, and certain cranial characters resulting from less development of the occipital region of the skull. The best-known species is A. jaculus, which resembles a jerboa, but is larger, with a longer, tufted tail. It is yellowish above and white beneath, moves on all-fours as well as by leaping, lives in colonies in underground burrows, and hibernates in winter. Species of the genus occur throughout a large part of central Asia, Syria, Arabia, etc., and also in northern Africa. They are commonly called jumping rabbits.

à la cuisse (ä lä kwēs). [F., at the thigh: see à la and cuisse.] Literally, at the thigh: applied in her. to a leg used as a bearing, when it is erased or couped in the middle of the thigh.

A hawk's leg erased à la cuisse, belled, jessed, and varveled. (From Berry's "Dict. of Heraldry.")

Aladdinist (a-lad'in-ist), n. [< Aladdin, a learned divine under Mohammed II. and Bajazet II., + -ist. The name Aladdin, Ar. Aʻl-ad-dīn, means 'height of faith or religion'; < aʻlā, height, acme, ʻalīy, high, + al, the, + dīn, faith, creed.] A free-thinker among the Mohammedans.

Aladdinize (a-lad'in-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Aladdinized, ppr. Aladdinizing. [< Aladdin, the possessor of the magic lamp, in the "Arabian Nights," a common personal name (see Aladdinist), + -ize.] To transform as if by magic. N. E. D.

aladja (al-a-jä'), n. [Prob. the same as alatcha, both appar. repr. Turk. alaja, spotted, streaked, < ala, spotted, + -ja, an adj. formative.] A cotton stuff made throughout Turkey and Greece; nearly the same as alatcha (which see).

> Sound an alarm in my holy mountain. Joel ii. 1.
>
> Ready to ride and spread the alarm
> Through every Middlesex village and farm.
> Longfellow, Paul Revere's Ride.

2†. A hostile attack; a tumult; a broil; a disturbance.

> Remove your siege from my unyielding heart;
> To love's alarms it will not ope the gate.
> Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 424.

3. A sudden fear or painful suspense excited by an apprehension of danger; apprehension; fright: as, there is nothing in his illness to cause alarm.

> I shook her breast with vague alarms.
> Tennyson, The Letters.

4. A warning sound; a signal for attention; an urgent call, summons, or notification. Specifically—(a) In fencing, an appeal or a challenge made by a step or stamp on the ground with the advancing foot. (b) In freemasonry, a knock at the door of the lodge to give warning, as of the entrance of a candidate for initiation.

5. A self-acting contrivance of any kind used to call attention, rouse from sleep, warn of danger, etc. Such devices are made in a great variety of forms, as, for example, alarm-clocks, fog-bells, fog-whistles, and sounding or whistling buoys; bells to indicate changes in temperature, the opening or shutting of doors, gates, or drawers, the arrival of a given hour, or the condition of telephone- and telegraph-wires; signals to call attention to the escape of gas, steam, water, air, etc.—Alarm check-valve, a valve in a steam-boiler usually closed by a spring and opening under the pressure of steam, used to give an alarm when the injector ceases to work or refuses to start.—Electric alarm. See electric.—Low-water alarm, in a steam-boiler, an automatic device for signaling by a whistle when the water falls below or rises above the safety-point.—Still alarm. See still.

=Syn. 1. Alarum, tocsin.—3. Alarm, Apprehension, Fright, Terror, Dismay, Consternation, Panic, affright, agitation, flutter, perturbation. These words all express degrees of fear in view of possible or certain, perhaps imminent, danger. Apprehension is the lowest degree of fear; the mind takes hold of the idea of danger, and without alarm considers the best way of meeting it. Alarm is the next stage; by derivation it is the alarum or summons to arms. The feelings are agitated in view of sudden or just-discovered danger to one's self or others. Generally its effect upon the mind is like that of apprehension; it energizes rather than overpowers the mental faculties. Fright, terror, and dismay are higher and perhaps equal degrees of fear; their difference is in kind and in effect. Fright affects especially the nerves and senses, being generally the effect of sudden fear. Terror may be a later form of fright, or independent and as sudden; it overpowers the understanding and unmans one. Dismay appals or breaks down the courage and hope, and therefore, as suggested by its derivation, the disposition to do anything to ward off the peril; what dismays one may be the failure or loss of his chosen means of defense. Fright and terror are often the effect of undefined fears, as in superstition, and are especially used with reference to physical fear. Consternation overwhelms the mental faculties by the suddenness or the utterly unexpected greatness of the danger. Panic is a peculiar form of fear; it is sudden, demoralizing, a temporary madness of fear, altogether out of proportion to its cause; there may even be no cause discoverable. It is the fear of a mass of people, or, figuratively, of animals.

> It was clear that great alarm would be excited throughout Europe if either the Emperor or the Dauphin should become King of Spain.
> Macaulay, Mahon's Succession in Spain.
>
> Rip now felt a vague apprehension stealing over him; he . . . perceived a strange figure slowly toiling up the rocks. Irving, Rip Van Winkle.
>
> To go to bed was to lie awake of cold, with an added shudder of fright whenever a loose casement or a waving curtain chose to give you the goose-flesh.
> Lowell, Study Windows, p. 30.
>
> Shadows to-night
> Have struck more terror to the soul of Richard,
> Than can the substance of ten thousand soldiers.
> Shak., Rich. III., v. 3.
>
> Dismay seized our soldiers, the panic spread, increased by the belief that a fresh army had come up and was entering the field. W. Ware, Zenobia, II. xiii.
>
> Conceive but for a moment the consternation which the approach of an invading army would impress on the peaceful villages in this neighbourhood.
> R. Hall, Reflections on War.
>
> Each [the child and the soldier] is liable to panic, which is, exactly, the terror of ignorance surrendered to the imagination. Emerson, Courage.

alarm (ą-lärm′), v. [< alarm, n.] I. trans. 1. To call to arms for defense; give notice of danger to; rouse to vigilance and exertions for safety: as, alarm the watch.

> A countryman had come in and alarmed the Signoria before it was light, else the city would have been taken by surprise. George Eliot, Romola, II. liv.

2. To surprise with apprehension of danger; disturb with sudden fear; fill with anxiety by the prospect of evil.

> Pan flies alarm'd into the neighbouring woods,
> And frighted nymphs dive down into the floods.
> Dryden, Art of Poetry, ii. 245.
>
> A screech-owl at midnight has alarmed a family more than a band of robbers. Addison, Spectator, No. 7.

II.† intrans. To give an alarm.

> Now, valiant chiefs! since heaven itself alarms,

Glass a latticinio.

alatrate†, v. t. See allatrate.

a latticinio (ä lät-ti-chē′ni-ō). [It.: a, < L. ad, to; latticinio, < L. lacticinium, milk-food, < lac(t-), milk: see lactation.] (Decorated) with lines or bands of opaque white glass, buried in the transparent body of the vessel: said of ornamental glass, such as that made in Murano, near Venice.

Alauda (a-lâ′dạ), n. [L., the lark; according to Pliny, Suetonius, and Gregory of Tours, a Gaulish or Celtic word (cf. Bret. alchoueder, alchouedez, the lark); said to be "lit. 'great songstress,' from al, high or great, and aud, song." The W. name uchedydd, lit. 'soarer,' is a different word. Hence It. aloda = Sp. alondra, OSp. aluda, aloa = Pr. alauza = OF. aloe, with dim. ML. laudula, laudila, It. allodola, lodola (dial. lodana), and OIt. alodetta, allodetta = OSp. alocta = Pr. alauzeta = F. alouette, the lark. Cf. calandra and lark[1].] A genus of birds, typical of the family Alaudidæ, or larks. The genus was formerly coextensive with the family, but is now restricted to such species as the skylark, A. arvensis, and the woodlark, A. arborea. The species of Alauda proper are natives of the old world, and inhabit chiefly its northern portions; they are small, plain-colored, spotted, and streaked birds; they nest on the ground, and are noted for singing as they soar aloft, and for the delicacy of their flesh. See Alaudidæ and lark[1].

Woodlark (Alauda arborea).

Alaudidæ (a-lâ′di-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Alauda + -idæ.] The lark family; a family of birds, of the order Passeres and suborder Oscines. They are notably distinguished from other oscine Passeres by having the tarsi scutellate behind, and are therefore referred by some to a special series, Oscines scutelliplantares, in distinction from most other Oscines, which are laminiplantar. By others, however, the Alaudidæ have been ranked as a subfamily, Alaudinæ, under Fringillidæ. The hallux bears a lengthened straightened claw. There are many genera and species, mostly of the old world, and especially of Africa; only one genus, Eremophila or Otocorys, the shore or horned lark, is indigenous to America. The Alaudidæ are mostly migratory; they inhabit open country, nest on the ground, lay colored eggs, and sing as they soar; some of the species are gregarious. See Alauda and lark[1].

Alaudinæ (al-â-dī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Alauda + -inæ.] A subfamily of larks. The term represents—(a) A subfamily of Fringillidæ, including all larks. [Disused.] (b) A subfamily of Alaudidæ, including the typical larks represented by the genus Alauda and its immediate allies.

alaudine (a-lâ′din), a. [< Alauda + -ine[1].] Having the character of a lark; pertaining to the Alaudidæ or lark family.

There is . . . abundant evidence of the susceptibility of the Alaudine structure to modification from external circumstances. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 316.

alaunt, alaundt, alauntt, n. Same as alan.

Alaus (a-lā′us), n. [NL., in form < Gr. ἀλαός, blind, < ἀ- priv. + λάειν, see; but said to be based on ἀλᾶσθαι, wander, roam, stray.] A genus of click-beetles, of the family Elateridæ. A. oculatus, one of the largest of the North American snapping-beetles, is a well-known species upward of 1½ inches long. It has two velvety black spots encircled with white on the prothorax, and white dots scattered over the whole surface; its larvæ live in decaying wood.

Alb of Thomas à Becket in the cathedral at Sens, with apparels of rich stuff sewed on the bottom and sleeves.

Alausa (a-lâ′sä), n. Same as Alosa.

alb[1] (alb), n. [< ME. albe, < AS. albe, < ML. alba (sc. vestis, garment), fem. of L. albus, white: see aube, the French form.] 1. In the Rom. Cath. Ch. (and in many Anglican churches), a white linen robe, with tight sleeves, worn at the celebration of the eucharist under the chasuble, cope, or dalmatic by the officiating priest and his assistants. It reaches to the feet, and is bound around the waist by a girdle called the alb-cord. Usually it is ornamented at the edges and wrists with embroidery or lace-work. The alb was formerly the common dress of the clergy. Colored albs have been used in the service of the English Church. The corresponding garment in the Greek Church is the stoicharion (which see).

A white albe plain with a vestment or cope.
Book of Common Prayer (1549).

Each priest adorn'd was in a surplice white;
The bishops donn'd their albs and copes of state.
Fairfax, Tasso, ii. 4.

2. In the early church, a white garment worn from the Saturday before Easter until the first Sunday after Easter by the newly baptized.

Formerly also written alba, albe.

Apparels of the alb, square pieces of embroidery in colors or precious orphrey-work sewed or otherwise fastened upon the alb, commonly in six places: much used between the eleventh and sixteenth centuries.

alb[2] (alb), n. [Turk.] A small Turkish coin, nearly equal in value to a cent.

alba (al′bạ), n. [NL. (sc. substantia), fem. of L. albus, white, used as a noun.] White fibrous nerve-tissue, as distinguished from the gray or cellular.

The alba constitutes the columns of the myelon, etc.
Wilder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 472.

Albanensian (al-ba-nen′si-ạn), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Albanenses.

II. n. A member of the sect of the Albanenses.

Albanian (al-bā′ni-ạn), a. and n. [< Albania.] I. a. Relating or pertaining to modern Albania, or to its inhabitants, or their language, manners, customs, etc.

II. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Albania, a division of European Turkey, comprising the greater part of the ancient Epirus, and parts of Illyria and Macedonia.—2. pl. Light cavalry, formerly recruited in Albania and the neighboring lands, and armed according to the Levantine fashion of the time. There was such a corps in the service of Charles VIII. and of Louis XII. of France. See argolet and estradiot.

Albarello. Italian glazed pottery, 17th century.

3. The language of Albania, possessing strongly marked dialects, and usually classed as Aryan or Indo-European.

[The adjective and noun also apply to ancient Albania, on the western coast of the Caspian sea: as, the Albanian Gates (Albaniæ Pylæ, now the pass of Derbend).]

albarello (al-ba-rel′ō), n. [It. albarello, albèrello, a vase, dim. of albero, OIt. albore, < L. arbor, a tree.] An earthen vessel, cylindrical in general shape, the sides externally concave, used in the fifteenth century and later as a drug-pot.

albarium (al-bā′ri-um), n. [L. (sc. opus, work), white stucco; neut. of albarius, pertaining to the whitening of walls. Cf. albare, whiten, < albus, white.] A stucco or white lime obtained from burnt marble. McElrath; Simmonds.

albata (al-bā′tä), n. [NL., < L. albata, fem. of albatus, clothed in white, made white, pp. of albare, make white, < albus, white.] An alloy consisting of a combination of nickel, zinc, and copper united in various proportions, often with antimony, iron, lead, tin, and silver. It is a white metal, resembling silver in appearance, and is made into spoons, forks, teapots, etc. Also called British plate and German silver.

He was not the genuine article, but a substitute, a kind of albata. G. A. Sala, Baddington Peerage, II. 232.

Albati (al-bā′tī), n. pl. [LL., pl. of L. albatus, clothed in white: see albata.] A body of fanatics who about 1400 appeared in Italy as penitents, clad in white garments. They were suppressed by the pope. Also called White Brethren.

albatross (al′bạ-trôs), n. [Formerly albitross, albetross, also algatross (cf. D. albatros = G. albatross (but D. usually stormvogel, G. sturmvogel, 'storm-bird') = F. albatros, formerly algatros, = It. albatro = Sp. albatrosle = Pg. albatroz, all prob. from or affected by the E. form), a modification (alc-, alg- changed to alb-, prob. in allusion to L. albus, white) of Pg. alcatraz, a seafowl, cormorant, albatross, orig. a pelican: see alcatras.] 1. A web-footed sea-bird of the petrel family, Procellariidæ, and subfamily Diomedeinæ. About 12 species of albatross are known, all except the sooty albatross, Phæbetria fuliginosa, belonging to the genus Diomedea. They are distinguished as a group from other birds of the petrel family by having the hind toe rudimentary, and the tubular nostrils separated, one on each side of the base of the upper mandible. The bill is stout and hooked at the end, the wings are very long, the tail and feet short, and the stature is very great. Albatrosses inhabit the southern seas at large, and the whole Pacific ocean, but not the northern Atlantic. Some of them are the largest known sea-birds, and all are noted for their powers of flight, sailing for hours, and in any direction with reference to the wind, without visible movement of the wings. They nest on the ground, and lay a single white egg. They are very voracious, may be caught with a hook and line baited with pork, and when taken on board a vessel are observed to walk with difficulty. One of the commonest and best-known species is the wandering albatross, D. exulans; it is also the largest species, having a stretch of wings of about 12 feet—an assigned dimension of 17½ feet being either a great exaggeration or highly exceptional. This bird is mostly white, with dark markings on the upper parts, flesh-colored feet, and a yellow bill. The short-tailed albatross, D. brachyura, is a related but smaller species. It goes far north in the Pacific ocean, where is also found the black-footed albatross, D. nigripes of Audubon. The yellow-nosed albatross is D. chlororhynchus, to which another species, D. culminata, is closely related; these, and D. melanophrys, are among the smaller species, and of about the size of the sooty albatross. The latter is wholly dark-colored. From their habit of following ships for days together without resting, albatrosses are regarded with feelings of attachment and superstitious awe by sailors, it being considered unlucky to kill one. Coleridge has availed himself of this feeling in his "Ancient Mariner." Also spelled albatros, and in New Latin form albatrus, as either a generic or a specific designation.

Wandering Albatross (Diomedea exulans).

2. A thin untwilled woolen material used for women's dresses.

albe[1], n. See alb[1].

Albertiidæ (al-bėr-tī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Albertia + -idæ.] A family of rotifers, or wheel-animalcules, of which the genus Albertia is the type. See Albertia.

Albertine (al′bėr-tin), a. Of or pertaining to the younger and royal branch of the Saxon house which descended from Albert (G. Albrecht), Duke of Saxony (1443–1500).—Albertine tracts, pamphlets dealing with economic subjects, written about 1530 under the auspices of the Albertine branch of the Saxon house, and in opposition to a debasement of the currency proposed by the Ernestine branch of the same house.

The Albertine tracts, according to Roscher, exhibit such sound views of the conditions and evidences of national wealth, of the nature of money and trade, and of the rights and duties of Governments in relation to economic action, that he regards the unknown author as entitled to a place beside Raleigh and the other English "colonial-theorists" of the end of the 16th and beginning of the 17th century.
Encyc. Brit., XIX. 356.

Albertist (al′bėr-tist), n. [< ML. Albertistæ, pl., < Albertus, Albert.] An adherent of the philosophy of Albertus Magnus, a German scholastic philosopher (1193–1280). The Albertists were only recognized as a distinct school in the university of Cologne in the fifteenth century. This school was an offshoot from that of the Thomists, from which it differed concerning many points of logic, physics, and theology. It was attached to the college of St. Lawrence. The differences which separated the Albertists from the Thomists were insignificant. Among other points, the former held that logic is a speculative, not a practical, discipline; that universals in re and post rem are identical (see universal, n.); and that the principle of individuation (which see) is matter.

albertite (al′bėr-tīt), n. [< the Albert mine in New Brunswick, where this mineral was first found, + -ite[2].] A hydrocarbon, pitch-like in appearance, and related to asphaltum, but not so fusible nor so soluble in benzine or ether. It fills a fissure in the lower carboniferous rocks at the Albert mine in New Brunswick. It is used in the manufacture of illuminating gas, and of illuminating and lubricating oils. Also called Albert coal.

albertype (al′bėr-tīp), n. [< Joseph Albert, name of the inventor, + type.] 1. A method of direct printing in ink from photographic (gelatin) plates. See photolithography.—2. A picture produced by this method.

albescence (al-bes′ens), n. [< albescent.] The act or state of growing white or whitish.

albescent (al-bes′ent), a. [< L. albescen(t-)s, ppr. of albescere, become white, inceptive of albere, be white, < albus, white.] Becoming white or whitish; moderately white; of a pale, hoary aspect; bleached; blanched.

albespine† (al′be-spīn), n. [< ME. albespyne, < OF. albespine, later aubespine, mod. F. aubépine = Pr. albespin, < ML. alba spinus*, the white-thorn (-tree), in ref. to the whiteness of its bark as contrasted with the blackthorn: L. alba, fem. of albus, white; spinus, the blackthorn, sloe-tree, < spina, a thorn, spine: see spine.] The hawthorn, Cratægus Oxyacantha.

albicans (al′bi-kanz), n.; pl. albicantia (al-bi-kan′shi-ạ). [NL., sc. corpus, body: see albicant.] One of the corpora albicantia of the brain. See corpora albicantia, under corpus.

albicant (al′bi-kant), a. [< L. albican(t-)s, ppr. of albicare, be white, < albus, white.] Becoming or growing white. N. E. D.

albicantia, n. Plural of albicans.

albication (al-bi-kā′shon), n. [< L. albicare, pp. albicatus*, be white: see albicant.] In bot., a growing white; a development of white patches in the foliage of plants.

albin (al′bin), n. [< L. albus, white. See albino.] A mineral of an opaque white color, a much altered variety of Bohemian apophyllite.

albiness (al-bī′nes), n. [< albino + -ess.] A female albino.

In them [the negative blondes] the soul has often become pale with that blanching of the hair and loss of color in the eyes which makes them approach the character of albinesses.
O. W. Holmes, The Professor.

albinism (al′bi-nizm), n. [< albino + -ism; = F. albinisme = Pg. albinismo.] The state or condition of being an albino; leucopathy; leucism. In bot., a condition of flowers or leaves in which they are white instead of having their ordinary colors, owing to a persistent deficiency of the usual coloring matter: to be distinguished from blanching or etiolation, where the color returns on exposure to light. Compare erythrism. Also written albinoism.

Albinism being well known to be strongly inherited, for instance with white mice and many other quadrupeds, and even white flowers.
Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, p. 115.

albinistic (al-bi-nis′tik), a. Same as albinotic.

albino (al-bī′nō), n. [< Pg. albino, orig. applied ★by the Portuguese to the white negroes they met with on the coast of Africa (= Sp. It. albino, > F. albinos), < albo, now alvo, = Sp. It. albo, < L. albus, white.] 1. A person of pale, milky complexion, with light hair and pink eyes. This abnormal condition appears to depend on an absence of the minute particles of coloring matter which ordinarily occur in the lowest and last-deposited layers of the epidermis or outer skin. Albinos occasionally occur among all races of men.

Hence—2. An animal characterized by the same peculiarity in physical constitution. A perfect albino is pure white, with pink eyes; but there may be every degree of departure from the normal coloration, exhibiting every variation in paleness of color or in spotting or marking with white, such pallid or pied individuals being called partial albinos. An albino is always a sport or freak of nature, as when one of a brood of crows or blackbirds is snow-white; but albinism tends to become hereditary and thus established, as in the case of white mice, white rabbits, and white poultry. Any albino, therefore, is to be distinguished from an animal that is naturally white, like the snowy heron or polar bear, or that periodically turns white in winter, like the arctic fox, polar hare, or ptarmigan. Some animals are more susceptible to albinism than others, but probably all are liable to the deficiency or total lack of pigment which constitutes this affection.

3. A plant the leaves of which are marked by the absence of chlorophyl, or whose flowers are exceptionally white. See albinism.

albinoism (al-bī′nō-izm), n. Same as albinism.

albinotic (al-bi-not′ik), a. [< albino + -otic, as in hypnotic and other words of Gr. origin.] Affected with albinism; exhibiting leucism; being an albino. An equivalent form is albinistic.

albione (al-bi-ō′nē), n. [NL., after L. Albion, a son of Neptune?] A sea-leech; a leech of the genus Pontobdella.

albion-metal (al′bi-on-met″al), n. [< Albion, poetic name of England (< L. Albion, Gr. Ἀλβίων, an ancient name of Britain), + metal.] A combination made by overlaying lead with tin and causing the two to adhere by passing them, under pressure, between rollers.

★albite (al′bīt), n. [< L. albus, white, + -ite[2].] A triclinic soda feldspar; a common mineral, usually white or nearly white, occurring in crystals and in cleavable masses in granite veins, also as a constituent of many crystalline rocks, as diorite and some kinds of granite. See feldspar.

albitic (al-bit′ik), a. [< albite + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of albite; containing albite.

Albizzia (al-bits′i-ạ), n. [NL., < It. Albizzi, a noble family of Tuscany, who first brought the silk-tree into Italy.] A large genus of leguminous plants of tropical Asia and Africa, allied to Acacia. Many are trees furnishing a hard, strong, and durable wood. A. Julibrissin (the silk-tree) and A. Lebbek are frequently cultivated for ornament in the Mediterranean region and in America. The bark of an Abyssinian species, A. anthelmintica, known as mesenna or besenna, is an effective tæniafuge.

albo-carbon (al′bō-kär″bon), n. [< L. albus, white, + E. carbon.] A solid residuum of creasote.—Albo-carbon light, a light produced by carbureting ordinary burning-gas by the volatilization of albo-carbon, which is placed in cylindrical chambers about a gas-burner.

albolite (al′bō-līt), n. Same as albolith.

albolith (al′bō-lith), n. [< L. albus, white, + Gr. λίθος, a stone.] A cement made by mixing pulverized calcined magnesite with fine silica. It forms a hard, durable compound which can be molded, and is found very useful in repairing stonework and as a preservative for various materials of construction.

Alb Sunday. [See alb[1] and Sunday. Cf. Whitsunday.] The first Sunday after Easter: so called because on that day those who had been baptized on Easter eve wore their white robes for the last time. Also called Low Sunday.

albuginea (al-bū-jin′ē-ạ), n. [NL., fem. (sc. tunica) of an assumed L. albugineus:* see albugineous.] In anat., a name (properly tunica albuginea) applied to several membranes: (a) To the fibrous covering of the testis beneath the tunica vaginalis (sheathing membrane); (b) to the similar fibrous covering of the ovary beneath the peritoneum; (c) to the sclerotic or white of the eye.

albuginean (al-bū-jin′ē-ạn), a. [< L. albugo (albugin-), whiteness, a white spot, + -e-an.] Same as albugineous.

albugineous (al-bū-jin′ē-us), a. [< L. as if albugineus* (> Sp. Pg. It. albugineo), the more correct E. form being albuginous = F. albugineux = Sp. It. albuginoso, < L. albuginosus*, < albugo (albugin-), whiteness: see albugo.] Pertaining to or resembling the white of the eye or of an egg. Equivalent forms are albuginean and albuginous. —Albugineous humor, the aqueous humor of the eye.—Albugineous tunic, the albuginea (which see).

albuginitis (al-bū-ji-nī′tis), n. [< albuginea + -itis.] Inflammation of the tunica albuginea of the testis. See albuginea.

albuginous (al-bū′ji-nus), a. Same as albugineous.

★albugo (al-bū′gō), n. [L., whiteness, a white spot, < albus, white.] A disease of the eye, characterized by deep opacity of the cornea. Sometimes called leucoma.

Albula (al′bū-lạ), n. [NL., fem. of L. albulus, whitish, < albus, white: see able[2], ablet.] A genus of fishes distinguished by their whitish or silvery color, typical of the family Albulidæ.

albulid (al′bū-lid), n. A fish of the family Albulidæ; a bonefish, ladyfish, macabé, or French mullet.

Albulidæ (al-bū′li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Albula + -idæ.] A family of abdominal fishes having an elongate body covered with silvery scales, conical head with produced overhanging snout, small mouth, and pavement-like teeth on the sphenoid and pterygoid bones. Only one species, Albula vulpes, is known. It is generally distributed in tropical seas, and is known in the West Indies and Florida as the ladyfish and bonefish. It is interesting from modifications of structure of the heart which suggest the ganoids. See cut under ladyfish.

Albulina (al-bū-lī′nạ), n. pl. [NL., < Albula + -ina.] In Günther's classification of fishes, the fifth group of Clupeidæ. The technical characters are—the mouth inferior, of moderate width and toothed, the upper jaw projecting beyond the lower, and the intermaxillary juxtaposed to the upper edge of the maxillary bones. The group corresponds to the family Albulidæ. Preferably written Albulinæ, as a subfamily.

album (al′bum), n. [L., prop. neut. of albus, white.] 1. In Rom. antiq., a white tablet, on which the names of public officers and records of public transactions were written, and which was put up in a public place.—2. A book consisting of blank leaves variously prepared for special purposes, as for the reception or preservation of autographs, photographs, verses, "sentiments," etc.—3. A book expensively printed or bound, containing short selections of poetry or prose, usually illustrated, and intended as a gift or an ornament.—4†. In law, ★white (silver) money paid as rent.

albumen (al-bū′men), n. [L.; albumen ovi, the white of an egg; lit., whiteness, < albus, white.] 1. The white of an egg; hence, an animal and vegetable principle which occurs in its purest natural form in the white of an egg: in the latter sense more correctly called albumin (which see).—2. In bot., any form of nutritive matter, whatever its chemical constitution, Seeds cut vertically, showing their Embryos and Albumen.

stored within the seed and about the embryo. It may be farinaceous, as in the cereals; oily and fleshy, as in many nuts; horny, as in the coffee-berry; or bony, as in the vegetable ivory. Also called endosperm.—Albumen glue. See glue.

albumenize (al-bū′men-īz), v. t. See albuminize.

albumenoid, a. and n. See albuminoid.

album græcum (al′bum grē′kum). [L.; lit., Greek white.] The dung of dogs, etc., which, from exposure to the air, has become white like chalk. It was formerly used as a medicine, and is still used by tanners to soften leather.

★albumin (al-bū′min), n. [< L. album(en) + *-in*2. See albumen.] In chem., a substance named from the Latin for the white of an egg, in which it occurs in its purest natural state (see albumen). It is a proximate principle composed of nitrogen, carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen, with a little sulphur, and enters generally into the composition of the animal and vegetable juices and solids. Animal albumin abounds in the serum of the blood, the vitreous and crystalline humors of the eye, the so-called coagulable lymph, the juices of flesh, etc. Vegetable albumin is found in most vegetable juices and in many seeds; in composition and properties it does not differ greatly from animal albumin. Albumin obtained from eggs or blood-serum is used for giving a lustrous coating to photographic paper, and rarely in some other photographic processes, for fixing colors in printing, and for clarifying syrupy liquids. When heated with such liquids it coagulates and sinks to the bottom, or else rises as a scum, carrying with it the fine suspended particles which had made the liquid turbid. When albumin in solution is digested with a weak acid, it passes into a modification distinguished by the following properties: it is insoluble in water and weak saline solutions, soluble in weak acids or alkalis, and not coagulated by heat. This modification is called acid albumin. Similar treatment with a weak or strong alkali produces a substance having nearly the same properties as acid albumin, but called alkali albumin. Syntonin is not distinguishable from acid albumin. When a solution of either acid or alkali albumin is neutralized, a neutralization precipitate is obtained. This, dissolved in acid, gives acid albumin; dissolved in alkali, it gives alkali albumin, though there is reason to believe that neither the acid nor the alkali combines chemically with the albumin. Albumin is found in commerce in a dry state, being prepared both from the white of eggs and from the serum of blood; 84 dozen eggs produce about 1.2 gallons of white, which yields 14 per cent. of commercial albumin, while the blood of 5 oxen yields about 2 lbs. Pure albumin, entirely free from mineral matter, begins to coagulate at about 139°, and becomes completely solidified at 167°. Coagulated albumin is a white opaque substance, possessing the property of combining readily with a great many coloring materials, such as fuchsine, aniline violet, purpuramide, etc. It is employed extensively in the arts, as in calico-printing, in which it is used to fix pigments, especially ultramarine, chrome-yellows, etc., upon the fibers of cotton cloth, serving both as a vehicle for the color and as a varnish. With aniline colors, however, it forms a true mordant. See supplement.—Albumin process, a little-used process of making photographic plates, in which albumin is used instead of collodion or gelatin.

★albuminate (al-bū′mi-nāt), n. [< albumen (albumin-) + *-ate*1.] A body resulting from the action of an alkali upon albumin: a form of denaturization of the native albumins analogous to the production of acid albumin.

albumin-beer (al-bū′min-bēr), n. A preserving bath which has been used for some early photographic emulsions, composed of albumin, ammonia, pyrogallic acid, beer, and water.

albuminiform (al-bū′mi-ni-fôrm), a. [< L. albumen (-min-) + -formis, < forma, form.] Formed like or resembling albumin.

★albuminimeter (al-bū-mi-nim′e-tėr), n. [< L. albumen (-min-) + metrum, < Gr. μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring the quantity of albumin contained in any liquid.

albuminin (al-bū′mi-nin), n. [< albumen (-min-) + *-in*2.] The substance of the cells inclosing the white of birds' eggs. It contains no nitrogen, and dissolves in caustic potash. Also called oönin.

albuminiparous (al-bū-mi-nip′a-rus), a. [< L. albumen (-min-) + -parus, < parere, produce.] Same as albuminiferous.

> At its upper end this latter [duct] has an albuminiparous gland attached to it.
> Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 383.

albuminize (al-bū′mi-nīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. albuminized, ppr. albuminizing. [< albumin + -ize.] To convert into albumin; cover or impregnate with albumin, as paper for the silver-printing of photographs. Also written albumenize.

★albuminoid (al-bū′mi-noid), a. and n. [< L. albumen (-min-) + -oid.] I. a. Resembling albumen or albumin.

> During hard work a larger supply than usual of albuminoid food is necessary.
> W. L. Carpenter, Energy in Nature, p. 192.

Albuminoid disease, lardaceous disease (which see, under lardaceous).

II. n. A substance resembling albumin; proteid (which see). See supplement.

Also written albumenoid.

albuminoidal (al-bū-mi-noi′dal), a. Relating to or of the nature of an albuminoid.

albuminone (al-bū′mi-nōn), n. Same as peptone.

★albuminose (al-bū′mi-nōs), a. [= F. albumineux = It. albuminoso, < NL. albuminosus, < L. albumen (-min-): see albumen, albumin.] 1. Full of or containing albumen: applied to the seeds of certain plants, as grain, palms, etc.—2. Pertaining to or of the nature of albumin.

albuminosis (al-bū-mi-nō′sis), n. [NL., < L. albumen (-min-) + -osis.] A condition of the blood characterized by the presence of more than the usual amount of albumin.

albuminous (al-bū′mi-nus), a. Same as albuminose.—Albuminous infiltration. See cloudy swelling, under cloudy.

albuminousness (al-bū′mi-nus-nes), n. The state of being albuminous.

albumin-paper (al-bū′min-pā″pėr), n. Paper sized or coated with albumin, used for ordinary photographic printing.

★albuminuria (al-bū-mi-nū′ri-ą), n. [NL., < L. albumen (-min-) + Gr. οὖρον, urine: see urine.] In pathol., the presence of albumin in the urine, indicating changes in the blood or in the kidneys.

★albuminuric (al-bū-mi-nū′rik), a. [< albuminuria + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by albuminuria.

alburn (al′bėrn), a. and n. [< ML. alburnus, whitish (see auburn), first as a noun, LL. alburnus, m., a white fish, prob. the bleak or blay, L. alburnum, neut., sap-wood (see alburnum), < albus, white.] I.† a. An obsolete form of auburn.

II. n. 1. Same as alburnum.—2. A name sometimes given to the fish commonly called the bleak.

alburnous (al-bėr′nus), a. [< alburnum, q. v., + -ous.] Relating to or of the nature of alburnum.

alburnum (al-bėr′num), n. [L., sap-wood, prop. neut. of alburnus, which appears in ML. in the sense of 'whitish': see auburn.] The lighter-colored and softer part of the wood of exogenous plants, between the inner bark and the heart-wood. It is frequently called sap-wood, and is gradually transformed into heart-wood or duramen. Another form is alburn.

Alburnum.
aa, alburnum, or sap-wood; bb, heart-wood; c, pith; dd, bark.

Alca (al′ką), n. [ML. and NL., < Icel. alka, álka, auk: see *auk*1.] The leading genus of the Alcidæ, or auk family of birds. It has been made to cover nearly all the species of the family, but is now generally restricted to the great auk, Alca impennis, alone or with the razor-billed auk, A. torda or Utamania torda. See auk, and cut in next column.

alcabala (Sp. pron. äl-kä-bä′lä), n. Same as alcavala.

alcahest, alcahestic, etc. See alkahest, etc.

Alcaic (al-kā′ik), a. and n. [< L. Alcaicus, < Gr. Ἀλκαϊκός, < Ἀλκαῖος, Alcæus.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to Alcæus, a lyric poet of Mytilene, in Lesbos, who flourished about 600 B. C.—2. [l. c.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or consisting of alcaics: as, an alcaic strophe. See II.—Alcaic verse. See II.

II. n. [l. c.] A line written in one of the measures invented by Alcæus. The most important one of these consists of an anacrusis, a trochee, a spondee, and two dactyls. A second consists of a catalectic iambic pentameter, of which the third foot is always a spondee, and the first may be. A third consists of two dactyls followed by two trochees. Two lines of the first, followed by one of the second and one of the third, constitute the alcaic strophe, the commonest arrangement of alcaics. The following is an example of an alcaic strophe:

Great Auk (Alca impennis).
(From a drawing by R. W. Shufeldt after Audubon.)

> O mighty-mouth'd inventor of harmonies,
> O skill'd to sing of Time or Eternity,
> God-gifted organ-voice of England,
> Milton, a name to resound for ages.
> Tennyson, Exper. in Quantity, Alcaics.

alcaid, alcayde (al-kād′; Sp. (alcaide) äl-kä′ē-dā), n. [< Sp. Pg. alcaide, formerly alcayde, a governor, jailer, warden, < Ar. al-qāīd, < al, the (see al-2), + qāīd, leader, governor, prefect, < qāda, lead, govern.] In Spain, Portugal, etc., a commander of a fortress; a military officer; also a jailer.

alcalde (al-kal′de; Sp. pron. äl-käl′dā), n. [Sp. alcalde (in Pg. alcaide by confusion with alcaide, alcaid), < Ar. al-qādī, < al, the, + qādī, judge (> Turk. kadi, > E. cadi, q. v.), < qaḍay, judge, decide.] In Spain and Portugal, and in countries settled by Spaniards or governed by Spanish law, the mayor of a pueblo or town, who is the head of the municipal council, and is vested with judicial powers similar to those of a justice of the peace.

alcaldeship (al-kal′de-ship), n. The office of alcalde.

> The heart of the Spanish local system is the Alcaldeship.
> C. H. Shinn, Mining Camps, p. 83.

alcali, alcalimeter, alcalizable, etc. See alkali, etc.

alcamistre†, alcamy†, etc. See alchemist, alchemy, etc.

Alcanæ (al-kā′nē), n. pl. Same as Alcinæ.

alcanna (al-kan′ą), n. [Also written alcana, < Sp. alcana, alcaña (= Pg. alcanna), < Ar. al-hennā, < al, the, + hennā, henna.] Same as henna.

Alcantarine (al-kan′ta-rin), n. [< Sp. Alcántara, a city on the Tagus, lit. the Bridge, < Ar. al, the, + qantarah, a bridge. Cf. almucantar.] A member of a branch of the Franciscans founded in 1555 by St. Peter of Alcántara (whence the name). See Franciscan.

alcarraza (al-ka-rä′zą; Sp. pron. äl-kär-rä′thä), n. [Sp., < Ar. al-kurrāz, < al, the (see al-2), + kurrāz, an earthen vessel, pitcher.] A vessel made of porous unglazed pottery, used in hot climates for cooling water by the evaporation of the moisture oozing through the substance of the vessel. The effectiveness of the process is greatly increased by exposure to a current of air. In the southwestern United States commonly called olla.

alcarsin, n. See alkarsin.

alcatote†, n. [E. dial., also alkitotle (Exmoor Courtship); origin obscure.] A silly elf or foolish oaf. Gloss. Exmoor Scolding.

> Why, you know I [am] an ignorant, unable trifle in such business, an oaf, a simple alcatote, an innocent.
> Ford, Fancies, iv. 1.

alcatras (al′ką-tras), n. [< Sp. Pg. alcatraz, a pelican, etc., prob. a modification of Pg. alcatruz = Sp. arcaduz, alcaduz, the bucket of a noria or water-raising wheel, < Ar. al, the, + qādūs, bucket, < Gr. κάδος, a water-vessel; the term "bucket" being applied to the pelican for the same reason that the Arabs call it saggā, water-carrier, because it carries water in its pouch (Devic).] A Spanish and Portuguese name loosely applied to sundry large sea-birds, as the pelican (Pelecanus), gannet (Sula), albatross (Diomedea, especially D. fuliginosa), frigate-bird (Tachypetes aquilus), etc., but of no exact signification in ornithology.

alcavala (al-ka-vä′lä), n. [Sp. alcabala, alcavala, < Ar. al-qabālah, < al, the, + qabālah, tax, duty, < qabala, receive: see cabala.] A tax of one tenth formerly imposed in Spain upon public sales and exchanges, and paid by the seller. Also written alcabala.

alcayde. n. See alcaid.

alcazar (al-kaz′är; Sp. pron. äl-kä′thär), n. [Sp. and Pg., a castle, fort, quarter-deck, < Ar. alqaṣr, < al, the, + qaṣr, a fortified place, in pl. a castle.] 1. In Spain, a fortress; a castle; also, a royal palace, even when not fortified.

> He was then conducted to the alcazar, and the keys of the fortress were put into his hand.
> Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 21.
>
> The blessed cross was planted in place of the standard of Mahomet, and the banner of the sovereigns floated triumphantly above the Alcazar. Irving, Granada, p. 516.

2. A name given to certain places of amusement in France and elsewhere, particularly when decorated in the Moorish style.—3. Naut., the quarter-deck.

Alce (al′sē), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄλκη, elk: see elk[1].] A genus of ruminating mammals, comprising the European elk and the American moose: synonymous with Alces (which see). See elk[1].

Alcedidæ (al-sed′i-dē), n. pl. Same as Alcedinidæ.

alcedinid (al-sed′i-nid), n. A bird of the family Alcedinidæ; a kingfisher or halcyon.

Alcedinidæ (al-sē-din′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Alcedo (Alcedin-) + -idæ.] A family of birds, the kingfishers, referred to the order Fissirostres when that group was in vogue, sometimes to a group known as Syndactyli, now to an order Picariæ, which includes many families of non-passerine insessorial birds. However classed, the Alcedinidæ form a very natural family of birds, distinguished by the cohesion of the third and fourth toes; the non-serrate tomia of the long, large, straight, and deeply cleft bill; the rudimentary or very small tongue; the small, weak feet, unfitted for progression, usually bare of feathers above the tibio-tarsal joint; the long wings, of 10 primaries; and a short tail, of 12 rectrices. The family includes a number of curious and aberrant forms, among them two genera (Ceyx and Alcyone) in which the inner front toe is defective. All the Alcedinidæ nest in holes and lay white eggs. Their characteristic habit is to sit motionless on the watch for their prey, to dart after it, seize it, and return to their perch. There are about 150 species in various parts of the world, referable to about 20 genera. The family is divided into two subfamilies, Alcedininæ and Daceloninæ. Sometimes called Halcyonidæ. Also Alcedidæ.

Alcedininæ (al″sē-di-nī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Alcedo (Alcedin-) + -inæ.] A subfamily of Alcedinidæ, embracing the piscivorous or fish-eating as distinguished from the insectivorous kingfishers, or Daceloninæ. It consists of about 6 genera and some 50 species; one of the genera, Ceryle, includes all the kingfishers of America. The common kingfisher of Europe, Alcedo ispida, and the belted kingfisher of North America, Ceryle alcyon, are typical examples.

alcedinine (al-sed′i-nin), a. [< Alcedininæ.] Having the characters of or pertaining to the Alcedininæ: applied to the piscivorous as distinguished from the halcyonine kingfishers.

Alcedinoideæ (al″sē-di-noi′dē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Alcedo (Alcedin-) + -oideæ.] A superfamily of birds, containing the families Alcedinidæ, Bucerotidæ, Momotidæ, Todidæ, and Meropidæ.

Alcedo (al-sē′dō), n. [L., also improp. halcedo, a kingfisher; the same, with different suffix, as Gr. ἀλκυών, > L. alcyon, halcyon, a kingfisher: see halcyon.] A genus of kingfishers, of the family Alcedinidæ and subfamily Alcedininæ, giving name to these. A. ispida is the common species of Europe. See Alcedinidæ and kingfisher.

Alcelaphinæ (al-sel-a-fī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Alcelaphus + -inæ.] A subfamily of bovine antelopes, containing large species, such as those of the genera Alcelaphus and Connochætes, or the bubaline antelopes of Africa—the hart-beests, blesboks, and gnus. See cut under blesbok.

Alcelaphus (al-sel′a-fus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἄλκη, elk, + ἔλαφος, deer.] The typical genus of the subfamily Alcelaphinæ. The leading species are the bubaline antelope (A. bubalis), the hartbeest (A. caama), and the blesbok (A. albifrons).

Alces (al′sēz), n. [L., elk, = Gr. ἄλκη, elk, = E. elk[1], q. v.] A genus of ruminant mammals of the deer family, Cervidæ. They are of immense stature, and have a heavy, ungainly body, very high at the withers; a short, thick neck, with a beard at the throat; a tumid muzzle; broadly palmate horns in the male; long ears; coarse, brittle hair; and no metatarsal gland, but a small tarsal gland covered with reversed hair. The genus includes two North American species, the eastern moose, A. americanus, and the larger A. gigas of Alaska. The elk of northern Europe is A. malchis. See elk[1], 2, and moose.

alchemic (al-kem′ik), a. [Formerly alchymic = F. alchimique, < ML. alchimicus, < alchimia, alchemy: see alchemy, and cf. chemic.] Relating to or produced by alchemy. Formerly also spelled alchymic.

> At last lowered into the semi-conscious alchemic state wherein misery turns to habit.
> L. Wallace, Ben-Hur, p. 138.

alchemical (al-kem′i-kal), a. Same as alchemic.

alchemically (al-kem′i-kal-i), adv. In an alchemic manner; by means of alchemy. Formerly also spelled alchymically.

> Lully would prove it alchemically.
> Camden, Remains, Money.

alchemist (al′ke-mist), n. [Early mod. E. alchymist, alchimist, alcumist, alkemyste (also with added term. -er[1], alchemister, alchymister, alchimister*, < ME. alcamister, alkamystere, alkamystre), < OF. alkemiste, alquemiste, mod. F. alchimiste = Sp. alquimista = Pg. It. alchimista, < ML. alchymista, < alchymia: see alchemy and -ist.] One who practises or is versed in alchemy. Formerly also spelled alchymist.

> You are an alchymist, make gold of that.
> Shak., T. of A., v. 1.

alchemister†, n. Same as alchemist.

alchemistic (al-ke-mis′tik), a. Relating to or practising alchemy.

> Paracelsus informs us that the composition of his "triple panacea" can be described only in the language of alchemistic adepts. Pop. Sci. Mo., XX. 64.

alchemistical (al-ke-mis′ti-kal), a. Same as alchemistic.

> Irregular, secular ale, courageous, contagious ale, alcumistical ale.
> Dekker and Webster (?), Weakest Goeth to the Wall, i. 2.

alchemistry (al-kem′is-tri), n. [Early mod. E. alchymistry, alchumistrie, alcumistrie: see alchemist and -ry. Cf. chemistry.] Alchemy. Formerly also spelled alchymistry.

alchemize (al′ke-mīz), v. t. [Early mod. E. alchymize, alcumize, -ise; < alchemy + -ize.] To change by alchemy; transmute, as metals. Lovelace. [Rare.]

> That which becks
> Our ready minds to fellowship divine,
> A fellowship with essence; till we shine
> Full alchemiz'd and free of space.
> Keats, Endymion, i. 781.

alchemy (al′ke-mi), n. [Early mod. E. also alchymy, alcumy, alcomy, alcamy, alkimy, etc., < ME. alkamye; also alknamye, alkenamye, alcamyne, and hence alconomie, alconomy, alconomye (simulating astronomy); < OF. alkemie, also assibilated alchemie (mod. F. alchimie), also arkemie, arquemie, = Pr. alkimia = Sp. Pg. alquimia (Pg. also alchimia) = It. alchimia, < ML. alchimia, alchymia, < MGr. ἀρχημία, < Ar. alkīmīa, < al, the (see al-[2]), + kīmīa, < MGr. χημεία, also χημία, alchemy, defined by Suidas as ἡ τοῦ ἀργυροῦ καὶ χρυσοῦ κατασκευή, i. e., the preparation of silver and gold. Joannes Antiochenus says that Diocletian burned the books of the Egyptians περὶ χημίας ἀργυροῦ καὶ χρυσοῦ, i. e., concerning the transmutation of silver and gold; hence the name has been identified with Χημία, the Gr. form of Khmi, the native name of Egypt, lit. 'black earth'; but χημία is prob. for χυμεία, a mingling, an infusion, < χυμός, juice, esp. juice of plants (> E. chyme, q. v.), < χέειν, pour, akin to L. fundere = AS. geótan, pour, and to E. gush. Alchemy would thus be originally the art of extracting juices from plants for medicinal purposes.] 1. Medieval chemistry; the doctrines and processes of the early and medieval chemists; in particular, the supposed process, or the search for the process, by which it was hoped to transmute the baser metals into gold.

> Alchemy was, we may say, the sickly but imaginative infancy through which modern chemistry had to pass before it attained its majority, or, in other words, became a positive science. Encyc. Brit., I. 459.

2. Any magical or mysterious power or process of transmuting or transforming.

> Go laugh, . . . transmuting imps into angels by the alchemy of smiles. Alcott, Tablets, p. 64.
>
> In the tiny cellulose sac, by the vegetable protoplasm is wrought the very alchemy of life.
> S. B. Herrick, Plant Life, p. 21.

3. Formerly, a mixed metal used for utensils, a modification of brass: so called because believed to have been originally formed by the art of alchemy; hence, an imitation, as alchemy was supposed to be of brass: used figuratively by Milton for a trumpet.

> Four speedy Cherubim
> Put to their mouths the sounding alchymy.
> Milton, P. L., ii. 517.

> Here be the tavern-beakers, and here peep out the fine alchemy knaves, looking like . . . most of our gallants, that seem what they are not.
> Middleton, Your Five Gallants, ii. 3.

Formerly also spelled alchymy.

alchochoden (al-kō-kō′den), n. [Ar.] In astrol., the giver of life or years; the planet which is the dispositor of the hyleg and in aspect with that planet when a person is born, indicating by its position the length of his life.

alchymic†, alchymist†, etc. See alchemic, etc.

Alcidæ (al′si-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Alca + -idæ.] The auks; a family of natatorial sea-birds having short wings and tail, palmate three-toed feet, and a bill shaped very variously in the different species. The body is stout and clumsy, and the legs are inserted far back and deeply buried in the common integument of the body, as in other birds of the order Pygopodes. The family is variously subdivided by different writers, the most obvious division being into the Alcinæ proper, with stout, hooked bills, comprising the auks, puffins, etc., and the Uriinæ, or guillemots and murres, with long, slender, acute bills. The family contains some 25 species of about 12 genera. The Alcidæ are all marine, and confined to the northern Atlantic, northern Pacific, and Polar seas. Also written Alcadæ. See cuts under Alca, murre, and puffin.

alcidine (al′si-dīn), a. [< Alcidæ + -ine[1].] In ornith., pertaining to or resembling the auk family.

Alcinæ (al-sī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Alca + -inæ.] A subfamily of birds, of the family Alcidæ, embracing the auks proper and their immediate allies. The bill is variously shaped, but always hard and horny, stout, compressed, and more or less hooked. The leading species of Alcinæ are the great auk, Alca impennis; the razor-bill, Alca or Utamania torda; the puffins, of the genera Fratercula and Lunda; and the horn-billed auk, Ceratorhyncha monocerata.

alcine[1] (al′sin), a. [< Alces + -ine[1].] Of or pertaining to the elk; noting the group of Cervidæ to which the elk of Europe and the moose of America belong.

alcine[2] (al′sin), a. [< Alca + -ine[1].] Of or pertaining to the auk, Alca, or family Alcidæ.

Alcippe (al-sip′ē), n. [NL., < Gr. Ἀλκίππη, in myth. a daughter of Ares, < ἀλκή, strength, + ἵππος, a horse.] 1. A genus of cirriped crustaceans, of the order Abdominalia, having three pairs of abdominal limbs, no thoracic limbs, a segmented body, two eyes, extensile mouth, and the sexes distinct. It is the type and only member of a family Alcippidæ. A species, A. lampas, is found on the British coast, burrowing in shells of Fusus and Buccinum (whelks).

Alcippe lampas.

1, female, with males seen as dark specks on either side of upper part of the sac; 2, female, in section; 3, male; 4, burrow of the animal in a shell; H, horny disk of attachment. In the female—c, ovary; h, first pair of cirri; k, l, n, three thoracic segments without cirri; next are short segments bearing three abdominal terminal cirri. In the male—a, antennary appendages; b, seminal vesicle; d, testis; m, penis; k, orifice of sac; o, eye.

2. A genus of birds, of uncertain position, classed by G. R. Gray (1869) as one of the Ægithinidæ. It was founded by E. Blyth in 1844, and contains 12 species, inhabiting India, China, the Malay peninsula, and Borneo. A. cinerea is the type.

alcippid (al-sip′id), n. [< Alcippidæ.] An abdominal cirriped of the family Alcippidæ.

Alcippidæ (al-sip′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Alcippe, 1, + -idæ.] A family of cirripeds of which Alcippe is the typical genus.

Alcmanian (alk-mā′ni-an), a. [< L. Alcmanius, < Gr. Ἀλκμάν, Doric of Ἀλκμαίων.] Pertaining to Alcman, a Spartan lyric poet of the seventh century B. C., celebrated for his amatory verses.—Alcmanian verse or line, a dactylic tetrameter catalectic, or series of three dactyls or spondees (the third foot regularly a dactyl), followed by a spondee or trochee. A couplet consisting of a hexameter followed by such a line is called an Alcmanian distich, and this may be used single or double as an Alcmanian strophe or stanza.

alco (al′kō), n. [Quichua (whence W. Ind. and Mex.) alco.] A variety of small dog, with a small head and large pendulous ears, found wild in Mexico and Peru, and now domesticated.

alcoate (al′kō-āt), n. A contracted form of alcoholate.

alcogene (al′kō-jēn), n. [< alco(hol) + -gene.] The vapor-cooler in a distilling apparatus. N. E. D.

alcohate (al′kō-hāt), n. A contracted form of alcoholate.

alcohol (al′kō-hol), n. [Formerly also spelled alcohole, alkohol, < F. alcohol, now alcool, = Sp. Pg. alcohol = It. alcohol, alcool, alcoole, < ML. alcohol, orig. in the sense of a fine, impalpable powder, the black sulphid of antimony, afterward extended to any fine powder produced by trituration or sublimation, then to essence, quintessence, or spirit, esp. the rectified spirits of wine, and finally used as at present; < Ar. al-koh'l, < al, the, + koh'l, the fine powder of antimony used in the East to paint the eyebrows, < kahala, stain, paint.] 1. A liquid, ethyl hydroxid, C_2H_5OH, formed by the fermentation of aqueous sugar-solutions, usually prepared from starch by the action of malt. Absolute or pure alcohol is a colorless mobile liquid, of a pleasant spirituous smell and burning taste, of specific gravity .793 at 60° F., and boiling at 173° F. It is inflammable, and burns without smoke or residue, the products of combustion being carbon dioxid and water. At very low temperatures it solidifies, but the melting-point is −170° F., and for this reason it is used for filling thermometers to register low temperatures. It mixes with water in all proportions, is a general solvent for organic principles, bases, resins, oils, etc., and as such has extensive use in the arts and in medicine. Different grades of alcohol are sometimes designated in trade according to the source from which they are derived, as grain-alcohol, prepared from maize or other grain; root-alcohol, from potatoes and beets; moss-alcohol, which is made in large quantity from reindeer-moss and Iceland moss in Norway, Sweden, and Russia. Alcohol is a powerful stimulant and antiseptic, and in some dilute form is used as an intoxicating beverage among all races and conditions of people. Proof spirit contains, in the United States, 50 per cent. by volume of pure alcohol. Underproof and overproof are designations of weaker and stronger solutions. Distilled liquors or ardent spirits, whisky, brandy, gin, etc., contain 40 to 50 per cent. of absolute alcohol, wines from 7 or 8 to 20, ale and porter from 5 to 7, and beer from 2 to 10.

2. In popular usage, any liquor containing this spirit.—3. In organic chem., the general name of a series of compounds which may be regarded as derived from the normal hydrocarbons by replacing hydrogen with the group OH, or hydroxyl, and which correspond to the hydroxids of the metals. Such compounds are classed as primary, secondary, or tertiary alcohols, according to their constitution and the products of their decomposition. Primary alcohols are regarded as containing the group CH_2OH, and by oxidation yield aldehyde and ultimately an acid of the same carbon series. Secondary alcohols are regarded as containing the group CHOH, and by oxidation do not yield aldehyde, but a ketone, which on further oxidation breaks up into two acids of a lower carbon series. Tertiary alcohols are regarded as having the group COH, and break up at once on oxidation into two acids of a lower carbon series. 4†. An impalpable powder.

If the same salt shall be reduced into alcohol as the chymists speak, or an impalpable powder, the particles and intercepted spaces will be extremely lessened. Boyle.

Amyl alcohol ($C_5H_{11}OH$), a name applied, with prefixes, to four of the eight isomeric alcohols having the formula given. The most common, inactive amyl alcohol, is a transparent colorless liquid, with a strong, offensive odor, derived from the fermentation of starchy matters. It is the chief constituent of fusel-oil, a product of fermentation in distilleries, which is contained in crude spirit, and whose presence, even in small quantity, injures the quality of the spirit.—Anhydrous alcohol, alcohol entirely free from water.—Caustic alcohol, sodium ethylate, C_2H_5NaO, or sodium alcoholate, a product formed by adding sodium to absolute alcohol. It forms a white powder, which in contact with water or moist animal tissue decomposes into alcohol and caustic soda. It is used in medicine as a caustic.—Cresylic alcohol. See cresylic.—Methylic or methyl alcohol, or wood-alcohol, alcohol obtained by the destructive distillation of wood. When pure it is a colorless mobile liquid (CH_3OH), with an odor and taste like ordinary alcohol (ethyl hydroxid, C_2H_5OH; see above), though the commercial article has a strong pyroligneous smell. It is inflammable. It is a by-product in the manufacture of charcoal, and is used in the arts as a solvent for resins, also in the manufacture of aniline dyes. A commercial product is called Columbian spirit. Also wood-spirit and methanol.

alcoholate (al'kō-hol-āt), n. [< alcohol + -ate[1].] A compound in which a hydrogen atom of alcohol is replaced by an alkali metal, as potassium alcoholate, or ethylate, C_2H_5OK, formed, with evolution of hydrogen, when metallic potassium is dissolved in alcohol. Sometimes contracted to alcoate, alcohate.

alcoholature (al-kō-hol'ā-tūr), n. [< F. alcoolature: see alcohol.] An alcoholic tincture prepared with fresh plants. N. E. D.

alcohol-engine (al'kō-hol-en″jin), n. A motor employing the vapor of alcohol in place of steam.

alcoholic (al-kō-hol'ik), a. 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of alcohol.—2. Containing or using alcohol: as, an alcoholic thermometer.

alcoholicity (al″kō-hol-is'i-ti), n. [< alcoholic + -ity.] Alcoholic quality.

Some brandy is added to the wine, by which its alcoholicity rises to about 29 per cent. of proof spirit.
Ure, Dict., IV. 950.

alcoholisable, etc. See alcoholizable, etc.

alcoholism (al'kō-hol-izm), n. [< alcohol + -ism.] In pathol., the effects of excessive use of alcoholic drinks. They are distinguished as acute, resulting from the consumption of a large amount of alcoholic drink at once or within a short period, and chronic, resulting from its habitual consumption in smaller quantities.

alcoholizable (al'kō-hol-ī″za-bl), a. [< alcoholize + -able.] Capable of yielding or of being converted into alcohol. Also spelled alcoholisable.

alcoholization (al″kō-hol-i-zā'shon), n. 1. The act of rectifying spirit till it is wholly deprived of impurities.—2. Saturation with alcohol, or exposure to its action.—3†. The act of reducing a substance to an impalpable powder. Phillips, 1678.—4. Same as alcoholism.

Also spelled alcoholisation.

alcoholize (al'kō-hol-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. alcoholized, ppr. alcoholizing. [< alcohol + -ize.] 1. To convert into alcohol; rectify (spirit) till it is wholly purified.—2. To saturate with alcohol; expose to the influence or subject to the effects of alcohol.

The gum will not penetrate any part which is still alcoholized. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 191.

3†. To reduce to an impalpable powder. Phillips, 1706; Johnson.

Also spelled alcoholise.

alcoholometer (al″kō-hol-om'e-tėr), n. [< alcohol + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] An instrument, usually a hydrometer, for determining, by means of a graduated scale, the percentage, either by weight or by volume, of pure alcohol in a liquid.

alcoholometrical (al″kō-hol-ō-met'ri-kal), a. Relating to the alcoholometer or to alcoholometry: as, alcoholometrical tables. Sometimes contracted to alcoömetrical.

alcoholometry (al″kō-hol-om'e-tri), n. [< alcoholometer.] The process of estimating the percentage of pure or absolute alcohol in a spirituous liquid. Sometimes contracted to alcoömetry.

alcohometer (al-kō-hom'e-tėr), n. See alcoholometer.

Alcoideæ (al-koi'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Alca + -oideæ.] A superfamily of birds, composed of the Alcidæ or auks and the Urinatoridæ or loons, and placed in the order Cecomorphæ.

alcoömeter (al-kō-om'e-tėr), n. See alcoholometer.

alcoömetrical (al″kō-ō-met'ri-kal), a. See alcoholometrical.

Alcoran (al'kō-ran or al-kō-rán'), n. [< ME. alkaron, alkaroun, < OF. alcoran, mod. F. alcoran = Sp. alcorán = Pg. alcorão = It. alcorano, < Ar. al-qorān, al-qurān, lit. the book, < al, the, + qorān, qurān: see Koran.] Same as Koran. Also spelled Alkoran.

Alcoranic (al-kō-ran'ik), a. Relating to the Koran or to Mohammedanism. Also spelled Alcoranic.

Alcoranish (al-kō-ran'ish), a. [< Alcoran + -ish[1].] Same as Alcoranic. Also spelled Alkoranish.

Alcoranist (al-kō-ran'ist), n. [< Alcoran + -ist.] A Mussulman who adheres strictly to the letter of the Koran, rejecting all comments. The Persians are generally Alcoranists; the Turks, Arabs, and Tatars admit a multitude of traditions. Also spelled Alkoranist.

The Persians are generally alkoranists, as admitting the alcoran only for their rule of faith.
Chambers, Cycl. Supp. (1753). N. E. D.

alcornoque (äl-kôr-nō'kā), n. [Sp. Pg. alcornoque (> It. alcornoch, the cork-tree), < Ar. al, the, + quern oco, spongy oak. N. E. D.] The bark of several trees, especially Alchornea latifolia and Bowdichia virgilioides, used as a remedy for phthisis. Also written alcornoco.—American alcornoque, the bark of several species of Byrsonima, used in tanning.—European alcornoque, the bark of the smaller branches of the cork-oak.

alcove (al'kōv or al-kōv'), n. [< F. alcôve, < It. alcova, alcovo = OF. aucube, tent, = Pr. alcuba, < Sp. alcova, now alcoba, = Pg. alcova, a recess, < Ar. al-qobbah, < al, the, + qobbah, a vault, a vaulted space, dome, tent, alcove, < qubba, vault, arch, dome. No connection with E. cove[1].] A covered recess. Specifically—(a) In the strictest sense, any recessed bay or small room attached to a larger one, having a coved or vaulted ceiling. (b) Most commonly, a recess in a room for the reception of a bed, one of the recesses or separate compartments for books in a library-building, a niche for a seat or statue, etc. (c) An arched or covered seat in a garden, or any natural recess, as a clear space in a grove or wood, a small bay, a place nearly inclosed by rocks or hills, and the like. [In this use, chiefly poetical.]

On mossy banks, beneath the citron grove,
The youthful wand'rers found a wide alcove.
Falconer, Shipwreck.

alcumist†, alcumy†. Former spellings of alchemist, alchemy.

alcyon (al'si-on), n. and a. [L., < Gr. ἀλκυών, the kingfisher; also written erroneously ἀλκυών, > L. halcyon, > E. halcyon, the form now usual: see halcyon.] I. n. 1. An old or poetical name of the kingfisher. Commonly written halcyon.—2. [cap.] A genus of kingfishers: same as Halcyon, 2.—3. The specific name of the belted kingfisher of North America, Ceryle alcyon.—4. A general name of the kingfishers of the genus Halcyon and others of the subfamily Daceloninæ: as, the wood-alcyons, tree-alcyons, etc.

★ II. a. Same as halcyon.

Alcyonaria (al″si-ō-nā'ri-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Alcyonium + -aria.] An order of actinozoan corals, or, as some hold, a subclass of coralligenous Actinozoa, distinguished in this use from Zoantharia, the other subclass of Actinozoa (which contains the sea-anemones, etc.), by having pinnately fringed instead of simple tentacles, arranged around the mouth like the rays of a starfish, whence the alternative name Asteroida. The tentacles of Alcyonaria are in one series of 8, instead of 6 or a multiple of 6, whence the alternative name Octocoralla, the sea-anemones being known as Hexacoralla. For the same reason, the Alcyonaria are also termed Octactiniæ. The corallum, when present, is external, spicular, or with a sclerobasic axis, but occasionally thecal or tubular. The polyps are connected by the cœnosarc, through which permeate prolongations of the body-cavity of each, thus permitting a free circulation of fluids. There is sometimes an outer skeleton, either with or without a central sclerobasic axis. The corallum is rarely thecal, never presenting traces of septa. (Pascoe.) These compound organisms are found only in deep water, and, except the sea-pens, are fixed to some foreign body. The subclass or order is divided into several orders or suborders, of which are: (a) the Alcyoniaceæ, having a leathery contractile ectoderm—a group including the so-called dead men's fingers; (b) the Gorgoniaceæ, or sea-fans, which are branched calcareous or horny corals; (c) the Isidaceæ, which are alternately calcareous and horny; (d) the Tubiporaceæ, or organ-pipe corals, which are tubular; and (e) the Pennatulaceæ, or sea-pens. See these words. Some species have the appearance of sponges, others resemble fans, feathers, stars, etc. Also called Halcyonoida.

Alcyonaria.
1, Sea-fan (Rhipidogorgia flabellum); 2, Sea-pen (Pennatula phosphorea); 3, Cornularia rugosa.

alcyonarian (al″si-ō-nā'ri-an), a. and n. [< Alcyonaria + -an.] I. a. Relating or pertaining to the order or to a member of the order Alcyonaria. Equivalent terms are halcyonoid and asteroidal.

II. n. One of the Alcyonaria (which see).

Various forms of alcyonarians, a special group of corals, were found at considerable depths. Science, IV. 171.

Also written halcyonarian.

Alcyone (al-sī'ō-nē), n. [L., < Gr. Ἀλκυόνη, in myth. the daughter of Æolus and wife of Ceÿx, a Thessalian king; she was changed into a kingfisher and her husband into a sea-bird. See alcyon.] 1. A greenish star of magnitude 3.0, the brightest of the Pleiades, η Tauri. See cut under Taurus.—2. In ornith., a genus of kingfishers, of the family Alcedinidæ, subfamily Daceloninæ, related to the genus Ceyx, both being distinguished by the rudimentary condition of the inner front toe. Also written Halcyone.

Alcyonella (al″si-ō-nel'ą), n. [NL., as Alcyon(ium) + dim. -ella.] A genus of fresh-water Polyzoa, or so-called ascidian zoöphytes, related to Plumatella, Fredericella, and Cristatella, of the family Plumatellidæ. A. stagnorum is of a greenish-black color, and is found in stagnant water. The species were formerly regarded as plants. Also written Halcyonella.

Alcyoniaceæ (al″si-on-i-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Alcyonium + -aceæ.] An order of Alcyonaria (which see) considered as a subclass. It is characterized by having a leathery contractile ectoderm with calcareous spicules, but no sclerobasis; the polypary is attached to some foreign object, and bears some resemblance to a sponge. The order consists of the families Alcyoniidæ and Cornulariidæ, to which some authorities add Telestidæ. See Alcyoniidæ. Also written Halcyoniaceæ.

alcyonic (al-si-on'ik), a. [< Alcyonium + -ic.] Pertaining to the Alcyoniidæ. Also written halcyonic.

Alcyonidiidæ (al″si-on-i-dī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Alcyonidium + -idæ.] A family of Polyzoa, or so-called ascidian zoöphytes, belonging to the infundibulate order (Gymnolæmata) of that class, the mouth having no epistome. The family forms with the Vesiculariidæ a group or suborder which has been called Ctenosomata, the cell-opening being closed with marginal setæ, and there being no vibracula and no avicularia. Alcyonidium is the leading or only genus. Also written Alcyonidiadæ, Alcyonididæ, and Halcyonidiidæ; not to be confounded with Alcyoniidæ.

Alcyonidium (al″si-ō-nid′i-um), n. [NL., as Alcyon-ium + dim. -idium, < Gr. -ίδιον.] A genus of Polyzoa, of the family Alcyonidiidæ. A. glutinosum, one of the species, is called ragged-staff or mermaid's glove, and was formerly regarded as a plant. Also written Halcyonidium.

Alcyoniidæ (al″si-ō-nī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Alcyonium + -idæ.] A family of alcyonarian polyps, of the order Alcyoniaceæ. The leading genus is Alcyonium (which see). Representatives of the family are found in all seas and at various depths; some are called cork-polyps. Also written Alcyonidæ and Halcyoniidæ; not to be confounded with Alcyonidiidæ.

alcyonite (al′si-ō-nīt), n. [< Alcyonium + *-ite*2.] A fossil of or like the genus Alcyonium; one of the sponge-like fossils common in the chalk formation. Also written halcyonite.

Alcyonium (al-si-ō′ni-um), n. [NL., < L. alcyonium, also alcyonēum, < Gr. ἀλκυόνιον, also ἀλκυόνειον, bastard-sponge, a zoöphyte, so called from its resemblance to the nest of the ἀλκυών, halcyon: see alcyon.] The leading genus of polyps of the family Alcyoniidæ (which see). A. digitatum, the so-called dead men's fingers, dead men's toes, and cow's paps, is a common British species. It is a lobed, spongy-looking body, pellucid when distended with water, and covered with stellate apertures for the polyps. (Pascoe.) A. glomeratum is another species. The name of the genus is synonymous with Lobularia. Also written Halcyonium.

alcyonoid (al′si-ō-noid), n. [< Alcyonium + -oid.] A member of the family Alcyoniidæ or of the order Alcyoniaceæ. Also written halcyonoid.

aldayt, adv. [ME., < al, all, + *day*1.] Constantly; continually; always. Chaucer.

Aldebaran (al″de-bā-rān′ or al-deb′a-ran), n. [Ar., the follower (i. e. of the Pleiades).] A ★red star of magnitude 1.0; a Tauri.

aldehyde (al′dē-hīd), n. [< al(cohol) + NL. dehyd(rogenatus), deprived of hydrogen, < L. de, from, expressing deprivation, + hydrogen.] 1. A transparent colorless liquid, CH_3COH, of pungent suffocating odor, produced by the oxidation of ordinary alcohol. When exposed to the air or to oxygen it is converted into acetic acid. Distinctively called acetic aldehyde and ethanal.

2. The general name of a class of compounds intermediate between alcohols and acids, derived from their corresponding primary alcohols by the oxidation and removal of two atoms of hydrogen, and converted into acids by the addition of an atom of oxygen.—Aldehyde resin, a resinous body formed by heating aldehyde with potash in alcoholic solution. It is a bright orange-colored powder, sparingly soluble in water, but readily soluble in alcohol.

aldehydic (al′dē-hī-dik), a. Of, pertaining to, ★or containing aldehyde.

alder1 (âl′dėr), n. [E. dial. aller, also owler; < ME. alder, aldyr, aldir, also aller, ellir, olr, etc., the d being inserted as in alder for aller, gen. pl. of all (see *alder*3); < AS. alr, alor, aler = D. els = LG. eller = OHG. elira, erila, erla, MHG. erle, G. erle, dial. eller, else, = Icel. ölr, elrir, m., elri, neut., = Sw. al, dial. alder, ålder, = Norw. older, also or, elle, = Dan. el, pl. elle, = Goth. aliza*, aluza* (> Sp. aliso, alder) = L. alnus, orig. alsnus* (> F. aune, alder, and perhaps Sp. Lett. elksnis, alksnis, alder.] 1. The popular name of shrubs and trees belonging to the genus Alnus, of the family Betulaceæ. The common alder of Europe is Alnus glutinosa. In the eastern United States the common species are the smooth alder, A. rugosa, and the speckled alder, A. incana. Both are also known as black alder. These are usually tall shrubs, rarely small trees. The alders of the Pacific coast, such as A. rhombifolia, frequently grow to be trees of medium size. The bark of the alder has been used in several parts of the world as one of the materials for dyeing black along with copperas or iron liquor, and also in obtaining other colors, as brownish yellow or orange. See Alnus.

Alder (Alnus glutinosa).

2. A name of species of other widely different genera, from their resemblance to true alders. The black or berry-bearing alder of Europe is the alder-buckthorn, Rhamnus Frangula. In southern Africa the name red alder is given to Cunonia Capensis, and white alder to Trimerisma trifoliatum, cunoniaceous shrubs. In North America the Ilex verticillata is sometimes called black alder, the Rhamnus alnifolia dwarf alder, and the Clethra alnifolia white alder.

alder2†, a. and n. An old form of *elder*2.

alder3†, aller†, a. [ME., also written alther, aldre, aler, alre, < AS. ealra, also alra, gen. pl. of eall, all: see all. The d is inserted as in *alder*1.] The Middle English genitive plural of all. From its common occurrence before adjectives in the superlative it came to be regarded as a prefix of such adjectives: as, alder-first, first of all; alder-best, best of all; alder-liefest or alder-lievest, dearest of all. It is also used, in the form aller, with the genitive plural of personal pronouns: as, youre aller, of all of you; oure aller, of all of us; here aller, of all of them.

A-morwe whan the day bigan to sprynge,
Up ros our hoste, and was oure aller cok.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 823.

You, mine alder-liefest sovereign. Shak., 2 Hen. VI., i. 1.

alder-buckthorn (âl′dėr-buk″thôrn), n. The European plant Rhamnus Frangula. See Rhamnus.

alderman (âl′dėr-man), n.; pl. aldermen (-men). [< ME. alderman, aldermon, < AS. ealdorman (= ONorth. aldormon, -mann, -monn), < ealdor, a prince, chief, elder, + man (mann, mon, monn), man: see *alder*2, *elder*2, n., and man.] 1. In the Anglo-Saxon period of English history, a title meaning at first simply chieftain or lord, but later used specifically to denote the chief magistrate of a county or group of counties. The office was both civil and military, and was tending to become a great hereditary benefice when it was replaced, under Canute, by the earldom. After this the name was applied to any head man, as the head man of a guild.

If the earlier kingdoms were restored, the place of the king in each was taken by an ealdorman, who, however independent and powerful he might be, was still named by the West-Saxon sovereign, and could be deposed by that ruler and the national Witan.
J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 248.

The ealdormen were nobles by birth, and generally the leaders in war. Stillé, Stud. Med. Hist., p. 203.

Hence—2. In modern usage, a magistrate of a city or borough, next in rank to the mayor. In England and Ireland, besides being a member of the common council, which manages the affairs of the municipality, he is vested with the powers of a police judge. The corresponding title in Scotland is bailie. Aldermen are usually chosen for three years, but the twenty-six aldermen of London are chosen for life. In most of the United States there is in each city an elected board of aldermen, representing wards, who constitute the municipal assembly, or the upper branch of it where it consists of two bodies, and usually also possess some judicial powers. In Pennsylvanian cities the title alderman is given to an officer having duties equivalent to those of a justice of the peace elsewhere.

3. In England, a half-crown: a meaning explained by Brewer as containing an allusion to the fact that an alderman is a sort of half-king. [Slang.]—4. A turkey. [Slang.]—Alderman in chains, a turkey hung with sausages. [Slang.]—Alderman's pace, a slow, stately pace: equivalent to the French pas d'abbé.

aldermanate (âl′dėr-man-āt), n. [< alderman + *-ate*3.] The office of alderman; aldermen collectively.

aldermancy (âl′dėr-man-si), n. [< alderman + -cy, as in abbacy and other words of ult. L. origin.] The office of an alderman; aldermanate.

aldermanic (âl-dėr-man′ik), a. [< alderman + -ic.] Relating or belonging to an alderman; characteristic of aldermen.

aldermanity (âl-dėr-man′i-ti), n. [< alderman + -ity.] 1. Aldermen collectively; the body of aldermen. B. Jonson.—2. The dignity or qualities of an alderman. Lamb.

alderman-lizard (âl′dėr-man-liz″ärd), n. A book-name of the Sauromalus ater, a stout black Californian lizard: so called from its obesity, a characteristic popularly attributed to aldermen. It attains a length of about a foot. See Sauromalus.

aldermanly (âl′dėr-man-li), a. [< alderman + *-ly*1.] Pertaining to or like an alderman.

aldermanry (âl′dėr-man-ri), n.; pl. aldermanries (-riz). [< alderman + -ry.] A district of a borough having its own alderman; a ward. N. E. D.

aldermanship (âl′dėr-man-ship), n. [< alderman + -ship.] The office of an alderman.

aldern† (âl′dėrn), a. [< alder + *-en*2, *-n*2; = D. elzen, < els, alder.] Made of alder.

Then aldern boats first plow'd the ocean.
May, tr. of Virgil's Georgics.

Aldine (âl′dīn or al′din), a. [< NL. Aldinus, < Aldus.] An epithet applied to those editions, chiefly of the classics, which proceeded from the press of Aldus Manutius (Latinized form of Italian Aldo Manuzio), of Venice, and his family, from 1494 to 1597. The distinguishing mark is an anchor entwined with a dolphin printed on the title-page. These editions are noted for both the beauty of the typography and the correctness of the text. The term has also been applied to certain English and American editions of various works. See cut in next column.

Aldrian†, n. [Ar.] A star in the neck of the Lion, or (probably) the Sickle. Chaucer.

Aldrovandine (al-drō-van′din), a. Of or pertaining to the naturalist Ulisse Aldrovandi (1522–1607): as, Aldrovandine owl, the Scops aldrovandii.

Device of Aldus, from Statius.

ale (āl), n. [< ME. ale, < AS. ealu, also ealo, improp. eala (so in nom. and acc., but gen. and dat. ealoth, aloth, pointing to an orig. stem alut*), = OS. alo (in comp. alo-fat = AS. ealofæt, an ale-cup, > E. ale-vat) = Icel. Sw. Dan. öl, ale, = OBulg. olŭ, cider, = Sloven. ol, olej, vol = OPruss. alu = Lith. alus = Lett. allus (> Finn. olut), beer. Cf. Gael. and Ir. ol, drink.] 1. A light-colored beer, made from malt which is dried at a low heat. See beer. Pale ale is made from the palest or lightest-colored malt, the fermenting temperature being kept below 72° to prevent the formation of acetic acid.

2†. An ale-drinking; a festival or merrymaking at which ale was the beverage drunk. Compare bridal, church-ale, clerk-ale, etc.

Every inhabitant of the town of Okebrook shall be at the several ales; and every husband and his wife shall pay two-pence, every cottager one penny.
Quoted in N. and Q., 6th ser., X. 391.

3†. A brew of ale; as much ale as is brewed at one time.

Witnesseth, that the inhabitants, as well of the said parish of Elvaston as of the said town of Okebrook, shall brew four ales, and every ale of one quarter of malt, and at their own costs and charges, betwixt this and the feast of St. John Baptist next coming.
Quoted in N. and Q., 6th ser., X. 391.

4†. An ale-house.

Thou hast not so much charity in thee as to go to the ale with a Christian. Shak., T. G. of V., ii. 5.

O, Tom, that we were now at Putney, at the ale there.
Thomas, Lord Cromwell, iii. 1.

Adam's ale. See Adam.—Bitter ale, bitter beer, a clear, strong, highly hopped ale, of a pleasant bitter taste.—Medicated ale, ale which is prepared for medicinal purposes by an infusion of herbs during fermentation.

aleak (a-lēk′), prep. phr. as adv. [< *a*3 + leak, q. v.] In or into a leaking state.

aleatico (al-ē-at′i-kō), n. [It.] A sweet and strong red wine made in Tuscany. It is of dark-red color, has a delicate flavor and perfume, and is one of the best of very sweet wines.

aleatory (ā′lē-a-tō-ri), a. [< L. aleatorius, pertaining to a gamester or to gaming, < aleator, a gamester, a player with dice, < alea, a game with dice.] Literally, depending upon the throw of a die; hence, depending on a contingent event.—Aleatory contract, in law, an agreement the conditions of which depend on an uncertain event.—Aleatory sale, a sale the completion of which depends on the happening of some uncertain event.

aleavement†, n. See allevement.

ale-bench (āl′bench), n. [ME. not found; < AS. ealu-benc: see ale and bench.] A bench in or before an ale-house.

Sit on their ale-bench with their cups and cans.
Munday and Others, Sir John Oldcastle, i. 1.

ale-berry (āl′ber″i), n. [Early mod. E. alebery, ale-brue, < ME. alebery, alberey, alebrey, albry, alebre, < ale, ale, + bre, also spelled brewe, broth, soup (> bree, broo, q. v.), < AS. brīw, broth. The word is thus prop. ale-bree, or ale-brew, ale-broo, the second element being perverted in simulation of *berry*1.] A beverage formerly made by boiling ale with spice, sugar, and sops of bread.

ale-brewer (āl′brö″ėr), n. One whose occupation is the brewing of ale.

alec (ā′lek), n. [L., better allec, also alex, and with aspirate hallec, halex, the sediment of a costly fish-sauce, garum, and in general fish-sauce, fish-pickle.] 1. A pickle or sauce of small herrings or anchovies.—2†. A herring. N. E. D.

alecampane† (al″ē-kam-pān′), n. Same as elecampane.

alecize (al′e-sīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. alecized, ppr. alecizing. [< alec + -ize.] To dress with alec sauce. N. E. D.

ale-conner (āl′kon″ėr), n. [< ale + *conner*1.] Originally, a local officer appointed to assay ale and beer, and to take care that they were good and wholesome, and sold at a proper price. The duty of the ale-conners of London now is to inspect the measures used by beer- and liquor-sellers, in order to prevent fraud. Four of these officers are chosen annually by the liverymen, in common hall, on Midsummer's Day (June 24). Also called ale-taster.

'Tis well known to the parish I have been twice ale-conner. Middleton, Mayor of Queenborough, iii. 3.

ale-cost (āl'kôst), n. [< ale + cost[3]: see costmary.] Costmary, Chrysanthemum Balsamita, a plant put into ale to give it an aromatic flavor. See costmary.

Alector (ạ-lek'tôr), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀλέκτωρ, poet. for ἀλεκτρυών (cf. Alectryon), a cock; of disputed origin.] 1†. Klein's name (1756) for a genus of birds of which the common hen is the type: a synonym of Gallus (Linnæus).—2†. Merrem's name (1786) for birds of the family Cracidæ, or curassows: a synonym of Crax (Linnæus).—3. [l. c.] The Linnean specific name for a species of curassow, Crax alector.

alectoria[1] (al-ek-tō'ri-ạ), n.; pl. alectoriæ (-ē). [L. (sc. gemma), fem. of alectorius, pertaining to a cock, < Gr. ἀλέκτωρ, a cock.] Cockstone; a peculiar stone, erroneously supposed to be sometimes found in the stomach or liver of an aged cock or capon. Many imaginary virtues were attributed to it.

Alectoria[2] (al-ek-tō'ri-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀλέκτωρ, equiv. to ἀλεκτρος, unmarried, < ἀ- priv. + λέκτρον, bed, marriage-bed (see lectica); from the uncertainty respecting its male organs.] A genus of lichens. A. jubata, or rockhair, grows on trees and rocks, and affords food for the reindeer while the snow is deep.

Alectorides (al-ek-tor'i-dēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀλεκτορίς, pl. -ίδες, fem. of ἀλέκτωρ, a cock.] 1. In Nitzsch's classification (1829), a group of birds represented by the genera Dicholophus and Otis.—2. In Temminck's classification, a group of birds of uncertain extent. [Not now in use.]—3. A suborder or order of birds which includes the cranes, rails, and their allies. Coues.

alectoridine (al-ek-tor'i-din), a. [< Alectorides + -ine[1].] Having the character of or pertaining to the Alectorides.

It [the genus Parra] would appear to be limicoline, not alectoridine. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 669.

alectoromachy† (a-lek-tō-rom'ạ-ki), n. [< Gr. ἀλέκτωρ, a cock, + μάχη, a fight, < μάχεσθαι, fight.] Same as alectryomachy.

alectoromancy† (a-lek'tō-rō-man″si), n. [< Gr. ἀλέκτωρ, a cock, + μαντεία, divination. Cf. alectryomancy.] Same as alectryomancy.

alectoromorph (a-lek'tō-rō-môrf), n. A member of the Alectoromorphæ.

Alectoromorphæ (a-lek″tō-rō-môr'fē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀλέκτωρ, a cock, + μορφή, form.] In Huxley's classification of birds, the fifth superfamily of the suborder Schizognathæ, of the order Carinatæ. It includes the families Turnicidæ, Phasianidæ, Pteroclidæ, Megapodidæ, and Cracidæ, or the fowls and fowl-like birds, and therefore corresponds to the old order Gallinæ or Rasores, exclusive of the pigeons and tinamous. Since 1867, when the term was proposed, a stricter signification has been attached to it by exclusion of the Turnicidæ and Pteroclidæ. In the restricted sense, it is divided into the two groups of Alectoropodes and Peristeropodes, the former containing the fowls proper (old family Phasianidæ, etc.), the latter the mound-birds (Megapodidæ) and curassows (Cracidæ).

alectoromorphous (a-lek″tō-rō-môr'fus), a. Having the character of or pertaining to the Alectoromorphæ; gallinaceous or rasorial, in a strict sense.

Alectoropodes (a-lek-tō-rop'ō-dēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἀλέκτωρ, a cock, + πούς, pl. πόδες, = E. foot.] A subdivision of Huxley's superfamily Alectoromorphæ, containing the true fowl and related to the domestic hen, as pheasants, turkeys, guinea-fowl, grouse, partridges, quail, etc.: distinguished from those gallinaceous birds, as the Megapodidæ and Cracidæ, which have the feet more as in pigeons, and are therefore called Peristeropodes. See cuts under Cupidonia, grouse, partridge, and quail.

alectoropodous (a-lek-tō-rop'ō-dus), a. Having the character of or pertaining to the Alectoropodes.

The suborders [of Alectoromorphæ] are called respectively the Alectoropodous . . . and the Peristeropodous Gallinæ. Stand. Nat. Hist., IV. 197.

Alectrurinæ (a-lek-trō-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Alectrurus + -inæ.] A subfamily of clamatorial passerine birds, of the family Tyrannidæ: an inexact synonym of Fluvicolinæ and of Tæniopterinæ. See these words, and Alectrurus.

alectrurous (al-ek-trō'rus), a. [< NL. alectrurus, adj.: see Alectrurus.] Having a tail like that of the cock: applied to certain birds. See Alectrurus.

Alectrurus (al-ek-trō'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀλέκτωρ, a cock, + οὐρά, a tail.] A genus of clamatorial passerine birds, of the family Tyrannidæ, or tyrant flycatchers, of which the type is A. tricolor: so named from the long, compressed, erectile tail. It is sometimes made the type of a subfamily, Alectrurinæ. The whole group belongs to South America. Sometimes written, more correctly, Alectorurus, and also Alectrura, Alecturus, Alectura.

alectryomachy (a-lek-tri-om'ạ-ki), n. [< Gr. ἀλεκτρυών, a cock, + μάχη, a fight.] Cock-fighting. Sometimes written alectoromachy.

alectryomancy (a-lek'tri-ō-man″si), n. [< F. alectryomantie (Cotgrave), < Gr. ἀλεκτρυών, a cock, + μαντεία, divination.] An ancient practice of foretelling events by means of a cock. The letters of the alphabet were traced on the ground in squares within a circle, and a grain of corn was placed on each; a cock was then permitted to pick up the grains, and the letters under them, being formed into words in the order of their selection by the cock, were supposed to foretell the event. Sometimes written alectoromancy.

Alectryon (a-lek'tri-ọn), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀλεκτρυών, a cock: see Alector.] 1. In ornith., a genus of birds, proposed by Cabanis in 1846 for a section of the Macartney pheasants, genus Euplocamus of Temminck. The type is A. erythrophthalmus of Malacca.—2. A poetical name of the domestic cock.

Loud the cock Alectryon crowed. Longfellow.

ale-draper† (āl'drā″pėr), n. [< ale + draper, as in linen-draper: a humorous name, perhaps in allusion to the old ale-yard: see ale-yard.] An ale-house keeper.

I get mee a wife; with her a little money; when we are married, seeke a house we must; no other occupation have I but to be an ale-draper.
Henry Chettle, Kind-Hart's Dreame (1592).

So that nowe hee hath lefte brokery, and is become a draper. A draper, quoth Freeman, what draper, of woollin or linnen? No, qd [quod, quoth] he, an ale-draper, wherein he hath more skil then [than] in the other.
Discoverie of Knights of the Poste, 1597. (Halliwell.) alee (ạ-lē'), prep. phr. as adv. or a. [ME. a lee, after Icel. á hlé, alee; < a[3], on, + lee[1], q. v.] Naut., on or toward the lee side of a ship or boat, that is, the sheltered side, on which the wind does not strike; away from the wind: opposed to aweather (which see). The helm of a ship is said to be alee when the tiller is pushed close to the lee side, causing the rudder to move in the opposite direction, and thus bringing the ship's head into the wind. In cases where a steering-wheel is used, the same effect is produced by turning the wheel toward the wind.

The reek of battle drifting slow alee
Not sullener than we. Lowell, On Board the '76.

Helm's alee! hard alee! orders given in tacking a sailing vessel, after the helm has been put down, to direct that the head-sheets and fore-sheets should be let fly.

ale-fed (āl'fed), a. Nourished with ale.

The growth of his ale-fed corps. Stafford, Niobe, ii. 62.

alegar (al'e- or ā'le-gär), n. [< ME. alegar (Halliwell), < ale + egar, eger, sour: see eager[1]. The mode of formation is not English, but imitates vinegar, < F. vin aigre, sour wine.] Ale or beer which has been passed through the acetous fermentation; sour ale, used in the north of England as a cheap substitute for vinegar.

For not, after consideration, can you ascertain what liquor it is you are imbibing; whether . . . Hawkins' entire, or, perhaps, some other great brewer's penny-swipes, or even alegar. Carlyle, Boswell's Johnson.

ale-garland (āl'gär″land), n. A wreath hung to an ale-stake as a part of the sign of a tavern. This custom is as old as the time of Chaucer, who alludes to it.

alegeance†, n. See allegeance[2].

aleger†, a. [< OF. alegre, alaigre, F. allègre = Sp. alegre = Pg. It. allegro (see allegro), < L. alacer, alacris, brisk, lively: see alacrious, alacrity.] Lively; brisk; sprightly; cheerful; gay.

Coffee, the root and leaf betle, [and] . . . tobacco . . . do all condense the spirits and make them strong and aleger. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 738.

alegge†, v. t. See allay and allege.

ale-gill (āl'jil), n. [< ale + gill[5], ground-ivy, and the liquor made therefrom: see gill[5], and cf. alehoof.] A kind of medicated liquor prepared by the infusion of ground-ivy in malt liquor.

alehoof (āl'höf), n. [Early mod. E. also alehoove, alehove, < ME. alehoofe, halehove, appar. a corruption, simulating ale, of earlier haihove, heyhove, etc., prob. < hey, hay[2], a hedge, + hoofe, hove, ground-ivy, < AS. hōfe, ivy (see hove). The D. eiloof, ivy, is appar. borrowed from English.] Ground-ivy, Glecoma hederacea, the leaves of which were used in ale-making before the introduction of hops.

ale-house (āl'hous), n. [< ME. alehous, aillehous, < AS. ealo-hūs.] A house where ale is retailed.

The redcoats filled all the ale-houses of Westminster and the Strand. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., iii.

Aleiodes (al-ī-ō'dēz), n. [NL., prop. aliodes*, appar. < Gr. ἀ- priv. + λειώδης, smooth, < λεῖος, smooth, + εἶδος, appearance.] A genus of parasitic Hymenoptera, of the family Braconidæ. The species are parasitic upon caterpillars undergoing transformation in the dried and rigid skin of their host. A. rileyi (Cresson) is uniformly reddish-yellow, and is parasitic on larvæ of the lepidopterous genus Acronycta.

aleist†, n. [ME. alcis, < OF. alies, alis, usually alie, alye, later alise (mod. F. alise and alize), < Teut. aliza*, OHG. eliza*, var. of elira, erila, erla, G. erle, dial. else, the alder, in comp. elsebaum, the white beam-tree, elsebeere, the berry of the white beam-tree; = AS. alr, > E. alder[1], q. v.] The fruit or berry of the white beam-tree, Sorbus Aria. Rom. of the Rose, l. 1377.

ale-knight† (āl'nīt), n. A pot-companion.

Come, all you brave wights,
That are dubbed ale-knights, . . .
Know malt is of mickle might.
Wits' Recreations (1654).

To have his picture stamp'd on a stone jug
To keep ale-knights in memory of sobriety.
Chapman, Gentleman Usher, iii. 1.

alem (al'em), n. [Turk. 'alem, a flag, banner, standard, ensign, the crescent, < Ar. 'alam, a flag, ensign, < 'alama, know. Cf. alim, almah.] The imperial standard of the Turkish empire.

Alemannian (al-ē-man'i-ạn), a. Alemannic.

Two Alemannian dukes of the 10th century.
Encyc. Brit., XX. 4.

Alemannic (al-ē-man'ik), a. and n. [< L. Alemannicus, Alamannicus, pertaining to the Alemanni, Alamanni, the Latinized form of the German name of a confederation of German tribes, lit. all men, after Goth. alamans, all men, all mankind, < alls = OHG. al = E. all, + manna = OHG. man = E. man. Hence L. Alemannia, the country of the Alemanni, extended by the Gauls to all Germany, > F. Allemagne, Germany, Allemand, German: see Alman, Almain.] I. a. Belonging to the Alemanni, confederated German tribes who began to appear between the Main and the Danube about the beginning of the third century, and occupied that region completely.

II. n. The language of the Alemanni, or ancient people of southwestern Germany.

Also spelled Allemannic.

alembdar (a-lem'där), n. [Turk. 'alemdār, < 'alem, flag, standard (see alem), + -dār, < Pers. -dār, holder, bearer.] In Turkey, an officer who bears the green standard of Mohammed when the sultan appears in public.

alembic (ạ-lem'bik), n. [Early mod. E. alembick, alimbeck, and abbr. lembick, limbeck, q. v.; < ME. alembike, alembyk, alembek, earlier alambik, alambic, < OF. alambic, also written alambique, F. alambic = Pr. elambic = Sp. alambique = Pg. alambique, lambique = It. lambicco, limbicco, < ML. alambicus, < Ar. al-anbīq, < al, the (see al-[2]), + anbīq (> Pers. ambīq), a still, < Gr. ἄμβιξ, a cup, later the cup of a still; cf. Ionic Gr. ἀμβη = Gr. ἄμβων, foot of a goblet.] 1. A vessel formerly used in chemistry for distillation, and usually made of glass or copper. The bottom part, containing the liquor to be distilled, was called the matrass or cucurbit; the upper part, which received and condensed the volatile products, was called the head or capital, the beak of which was fitted to the neck of a receiver. The head alone was more properly the alembic. It is now superseded by the retort and worm-still.

Alembic.

Hence—2. Anything which works a change or transformation: as, the alembic of sorrow.

Thus is Art, a nature passed through the alembic of man. Emerson, Misc., p. 27.

alembic (ạ-lem'bik), v. t.; pret. and pp. alembicked, ppr. alembicking. [< alembic, n.] To distil as by an alembic; obtain as by means of an alembic. [Rare.]

I have occasioned great speculation, and diverted myself with the important mysteries that have been alembicked out of a trifle. Walpole, Letters, I. 208.

alembroth (a-lem'brôth), n. [Formerly also alembor, late ME. alembroke; poss. < Ar. el, the, + Gr. ἀμβροτος, immortal.] The salt called by the alchemists the salt of art, science, or wisdom; a double chlorid of mercury and ammonium. Formerly used as a stimulant.

Alençon lace. See lace.

alength† (ạ-length'), prep. phr. as adv. and prep. [ME. alenght (for alength*); < a[3], on, at, + length.] I. adv. At full length; along; stretched at full length.

II. prep. In the direction of the length of.

Alepas (al'e-pas), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- copulative + λεπάς, a limpet: see Lepas.] A genus of barnacles or acorn-shells, of the family Lepadidæ. They are ordinary cirripeds with thoracic limbs. A. cornuta is an example.

aleph (ā'lef), n. [Heb. 'āleph = Ar. 'alif: see alpha.] The first letter of the Hebrew alphabet (א), representing the older Phenician letter which gave name and form to the Greek A, ἄλφα. See a[1]. This letter, in the Semitic languages, is not properly a vowel, but is a quasi-consonantal sign, to which the pronunciation of any initial vowel may be attached. In transliteration into Roman letters, this sign is represented by a Greek "smooth breathing" (᾽) or is left unmarked.

alepidosaurid (a-lep″i-dō-sâ'rid), n. A fish of the family Alepidosauridæ. Also called alepidosauroid.

Alepidosauridæ (a-lep″i-dō-sâ'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Alepidosaurus + -idæ.] A family of large, fierce, and voracious abdominal deep-sea fishes. Also called Plagyodontidæ and Alepisauridæ.

The Alepidosauridæ are deep-sea fishes of large size, remarkable for the great size of their teeth. The body is elongate, and without scales; the mouth is extremely large, with rows of compressed teeth of unequal size, some of those on the lower jaw and palatines being fang-like. The dorsal fin is very long, covering almost the whole of the back, and there is no adipose fin. Stand. Nat. Hist., III. 138.

Alepidosaurina (a-lep″i-dō-sâ-rī'nä), n. pl. [NL., < Alepidosaurus + -ina.] In Günther's classification of fishes, a division of Scopelidæ, containing those with the dorsal fin occupying nearly the entire length of the back; a group corresponding to the family Alepidosauridæ (which see). Preferably written Alepidosaurinæ, as a subfamily.

alepidosauroid (a-lep″i-dō-sâ'roid), a. and n. [< Alepidosaurus + -oid.] I. a. Having the characters of the Alepidosauridæ.

II. n. An alepidosaurid.

Alepidosaurus (a-lep″i-dō-sâ'rus), n. [NL., as Aleposaurus, but with Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-) instead of equiv. λέπος (λεπο-), a scale.] A genus of fishes, typical of the family Alepidosauridæ. It was at one time supposed to be related to Saurus, but is distinguished by the scaleless skin, whence the name. Also called Alepisaurus, Aleposaurus. A. ferox is a species known as handsaw-fish and lancet-fish.

alepidote (a-lep'i-dōt), a. and n. [< Gr. ἀλεπίδωτος, without scales, < ἀ- priv. + λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale: see Lepidium.] I. a. Not having scales: as, an alepidote fish.

II. n. Any fish whose skin is not covered with scales.

alepine† (al'e-pēn), n. [Also written alapeen, prob. for Aleppine, belonging to Aleppo: see Aleppine.] A mixed stuff, either of wool and silk or of mohair and cotton. Dyer.

Alepisauridæ (a-lep-i-sâ'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Alepisaurus + -idæ.] Same as Alepidosauridæ.

Alepisaurus (a-lep-i-sâ'rus), n. [NL., improp. for Alepidosaurus.] Same as Alepidosaurus.

Alepocephali (a-lep-ō-sef'a-lī), n. pl. [Pl. of Alepocephalus.] Same as Alepocephalidæ.

alepocephalid (a-lep-ō-sef'a-lid), n. One of the Alepocephalidæ (which see).

Alepocephalidæ (a-lep″ō-se-fal'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Alepocephalus + -idæ.] A family of clupeoid abdominal fishes. The technical characters are: supramaxillary bones of three pieces, as in the Clupeidæ, the dorsal fin posterior and opposite the anal fin, few pyloric cæca, and no air-bladder. About a dozen species referable to four genera have been discovered in the deeper portions of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, as well as of the Mediterranean sea. Also called Alepocephali.

Alepocephalus bairdi.
(From Report of U. S. Fish Commission, 1884.)

alepocephaloid (a-lep-ō-sef'a-loid), a. and n. I. a. Having the character of the Alepocephalidæ.

II. n. Same as alepocephalid.

Alepocephalus (a-lep-ō-sef'a-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀ- priv. + λέπος, scale, + κεφαλή, head.] A genus of fishes, typical of the family Alepocephalidæ: so called from the scaleless head.

ale-pole† (āl'pōl), n. Same as ale-stake.

Aleposauridæ (a-lep-ō-sâ'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Aleposaurus + -idæ.] Same as Alepidosauridæ.

Aleposaurus (a-lep-ō-sâ'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀλεπος, faulty form of ἀλεπίδωτος, without scales (< ἀ- priv. + λέπος, also λεπίς, a scale: see Lepidium), + σαῦρος, a lizard, also a sea-fish: see Saurus.] Same as Alepidosaurus.

ale-post† (āl'pōst), n. Same as ale-stake.

ale-pot (āl'pot), n. A pot or mug for holding ale. In England a pot of beer or ale means a quart of it; hence, ale-pot means especially a quart-pot.

A clean cloth was spread before him, with knife, fork, and spoon, salt-cellar, pepper-box, glass, and pewter ale-pot. Dickens, Little Dorrit.

Aleppine (a-lep'in), a. and n. [< Aleppo, European (It.) form of Turk. and Ar. Halab, said to be named from Ar. halab, milk.] I. a. Pertaining to Aleppo, a city of Asiatic Turkey, or to its inhabitants.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Aleppo.

Aleppo gall, ulcer. See ulcer.

alerce (a-lèrs'; Sp. pron. ä-lär'thä), n. [Sp., the larch, prob., < a-, repr. Ar. al, the, + lerce*, larce* = It. larice, < L. larix (acc. laricem), the larch (see larch), perhaps mixed with Ar. al-'arzah, al-'erz, < al, the, + 'arzah, 'erz, Pers. arz, cedar.] 1. A name given in Spain to wood used by the Moors in their edifices, obtained from the sandarac-tree of Morocco, Callitris quadrivalvis. See Callitris.—2. Same as alerce-tree.

With here and there a red cedar or an alerce pine. Darwin, Voyage of Beagle, xiii.

alerce-tree (a-lèrs'trē), n. A large coniferous timber-tree of Chili, Libocedrus Chilensis, extensively used on the southern Pacific coast.

alerion, n. See allerion.

alert (ạ-lèrt'), a. and n., orig. prep. phr. [< F. alerte, interj. phr., adj., and n., formerly allerte, sometimes written à l'erte, = Sp. alerta (alerto, adj.) = Pg. alerta, < It. all' erta, on the watch, on the lookout; stare all' erta, be on one's guard, lit. stand on the lookout: all' for alla for a la, < L. ad illam, on the; erta, a lookout, also a declivity, a slope, a steep, fem. of erto, raised aloft, steep, pp. of ergere, raise, erect, < L. erigere, raise, pp. erectus, > E. erect, q. v.] I. a. 1. Active in vigilance; watchful; vigilantly attentive.

Yet ceaseless still she throve, alert, alive,
The working bee, in full or empty hive.
Crabbe, Parish Register.

Nothing is worth reading that does not require an alert mind. C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 15.

alese, n. See aleze.

ale-silver (āl'sil″vėr), n. A duty anciently paid to the lord mayor of London by the sellers of ale within the city.

ale-stake† (āl'stāk), n. A stake having a garland or bush of twigs at the top of it, set up as a sign before an ale-house.

A garland hadde he set upon his heed
As gret as it were for an ale-stake.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 667.

Also called ale-pole, ale-post.

ale-taster (āl'tās″tėr), n. Same as ale-conner.

alethiology (a-lē-thi-ol'ọ-ji), n. [< Gr. ἀλήθεια, truth (< ἀληθής, true, < ἀ- priv. + λανθάνειν, λαθεῖν, escape notice, be concealed: see Lethe), + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] A term used by Sir William Hamilton to denote that part of logic which treats of the nature of truth and error, and of the rules for their discrimination.

alethoscope (a-lē'thọ-skōp), n. [< Gr. ἀληθής, true (see alethiology), + σκοπεῖν, view.] An optical instrument by means of which pictures are made to present a more natural and life-like appearance.

Aletornis (al-e-tôr'nis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀλήτης, a wanderer, vagrant (< ἀλᾶσθαι, wander, stray), + ὄρνις, bird.] A genus of extinct Tertiary birds from the Eocene of Wyoming Territory. Several species are described by Marsh, who places them among the cranes and rails. They range in size from that of a woodcock to that of a small crane.

Aletris (al'e-tris), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀλετρίς, a (female) grinder of corn, < ἀλετρεύειν, extended from ἀλεῖν, grind.] A genus of plants, of the family Liliaceæ, natives of the eastern United States, chiefly from New Jersey southward. The two species, A. farinosa and A. aurea, are low, smooth, stemless, bitter herbs, with fibrous roots, a cluster of spreading, flat, lance-shaped leaves, and a spiked raceme of small white or yellow flowers. They are called colic-root from their medicinal reputation, and also ague-grass, star-grass, blazing-star, etc.

alette (a-let'), n. [F., = Sp. aleta = It. aletta, a small wing; dim. of L. ala, wing: see aisle.] In arch.: (a) A small wing of a building. (b) A pilaster or buttress. (c) The lateral face of the pier of an arch, extending from the edge of the opening; especially, that portion of the lateral face between the edge of the opening and a semi-column, pilaster, or the like, serving to decorate the pier. Also spelled allette.

A, arch; B, B, pilasters; C, C, alettes (c).

Aleurites (al-ū-rī'tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀλευρίτης, pertaining to ἄλευρον, meal, esp. wheaten flour, < ἀλεῖν, grind.] A genus of plants of the family Euphorbiaceæ. An important species, A. Moluccana (the candleberry-tree), 30 to 40 feet high, is a native of the Moluccas and some of the Pacific islands, and is cultivated in tropical countries for its nuts, which abound in oil, and when dried are used by the Polynesian islanders as a substitute for candles, whence they are called candle-nuts or candleberries. The oil expressed from the kernels dries rapidly, and is known as country walnut or artists' oil, or kekune-oil. A. cordata is the Chinese varnish-tree, and the oil from its seeds is used in China in painting.

Aleurodes (al-ū-rō'dēz), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀλευρώδης, like flour, < ἄλευρον, flour, + εἶδος, form.] The typical and only genus of the family Aleurodidæ. Also written Aleyrodes.

Aleurodidæ (al-ū-rod'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Aleurodes + -idæ.] A family of hemipterous insects, of the suborder Homoptera and series Dimera, related to the aphids and scale-insects. These insects are very small and exceedingly prolific; they have large oval elytra and wings, held nearly horizontal when in repose; the head is small, with divided eyes; the antennæ are short, 6-jointed, with the rostrum 2-jointed; and the legs are short, simple, with 2-jointed tarsi provided with 2 claws. There are about 25 nominal species of the single genus Aleurodes. A. proletella resembles a small white moth with a dark spot on each wing-cover, and is found on celandine, cabbage, oak, etc. The larva is small, flat, and oval like a minute scale; the pupa is fixed and inclosed in an envelop.

aleuromancy (a-lū'rọ-man-si), n. [< F. aleuromancie, < Gr. ἀλευρομαντεῖον, divination from meal, < ἄλευρον, meal, + μαντεία, divination.] A method of divination by meal or flour, practised by the ancients.

aleurometer (al-ū-rom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. ἄλευρον, flour, esp. wheaten flour, + μέτρον, measure.] An instrument invented by M. Boland, about 1849, for ascertaining the bread-making qualities of wheaten flour. The indications depend upon the expansion of the gluten contained in a given quantity of flour when freed of its starch by pulverization and repeated washings with water.

aleurone (a-lū'rōn), n. [< Gr. ἄλευρον, fine flour, + -one.] The minute albuminoid granules (protein) which are found, in connection with starch and oily matter, in the endosperm of ripe seeds and the cotyledons of the embryo. It is considered an inactive resting form of protoplasm. Also called protein-granules.

aleuronic (al-ū-ron'ik), a. [< aleurone + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of aleurone.

Aleutian, Aleutic (al-e-ö'shi-an, -tik), a. [Named from the inhabitants, the Aleuts, Russ. Aleutui.] Appellative of or pertaining to a group of islands (the Aleutian islands) separating Bering sea from the northern Pacific, nearly or quite coextensive with the Catherine archipelago, extending from near the southern point of Kamtchatka to the peninsula of Alaska.

ale-vat (āl'vat), n. [< AS. ealo-fæt = OS. alo-fat: see ale and vat.] A vat in which ale is fermented.

alevin (al'e-vin), n. [< F. alevin, prob. for alevain*, < OF. alever, rear, < L. adlevare, raise, < ad, to, + levare, raise. Cf. alleve, alleviate.] The young of any fish; especially, a young salmonid or clupeid.

alew† (a-lū'), n. [Var. of halloo.] Outcry; howling; lamentation.

> Yet did she not lament with loude alew,
> As women wont. Spenser, F. Q., V. vi. 13.

ale-washed (āl'wosht), a. Steeped or soaked in ale.

> And what a beard of the general's cut . . . will do among foaming bottles and ale-washed wits, is wonderful to be thought on. Shak., Hen. V., iii. 6.

alewife[1] (āl'wīf), n.; pl. alewives (-wīvz). A woman who keeps an ale-house.

> Perhaps he will swagger and hector, and threaten to beat and butcher an ale-wife. Swift, Drapier's Letters.

alewife[2] (āl'wīf), n.; pl. alewives (-wīvz). [A particular use of alewife[1], poss. in allusion to their corpulent appearance (see quot.). The form aloofe, recorded in 1678, said to be the Indian name of the fish, is prob. an error for alose[1], shad.] 1. A North American fish, Pomolobus pseudoharengus, from 8 to 10 in. long, resembling a small shad, but much inferior to it as food. It is taken in large numbers with that fish.

Alewife (Pomolobus pseudoharengus).
(From Report of U. S. Fish Commission, 1884.)

> Consorting Herrings and the bony Shad,
> Big-bellied Alewives, Macrils richly clad
> With Rain-bow colours, the Frost-fish and the Smelt,
> As good as ever Lady Gustus felt.
> S. Clarke, Four Chief Plantations in America (1670).

2. A name given at Bermuda to the round pompano, Trachynotus falcatus. See pompano. ★—3. A local English name of the allice-shad.

alexanders (al-eg-zan'dèrz), n. [Also written alisander, allisander, alisaunder, < ME. alisaundre, < OF. alisaundre, alisandre; but in AS. alexandrie, alexandre, from the ML. name Petroselinum Alexandrinum, i. e., Alexandrine parsley, equiv. to P. Macedonicum, i. e., Macedonian parsley.] 1. The English name of an umbelliferous plant, Smyrnium Olusatrum. Of all the umbellifers used as vegetables, this was one of the commonest in gardens for nearly fifteen centuries, but it is now abandoned. The history of its use can be traced from beginning to end. Theophrastus mentions it as a medicinal plant, under the name hipposelinon (horse-parsley), but three centuries later Dioscorides says that either the root or the leaves might be eaten, which implies cultivation. In Latin (Pliny, Columella, etc.) it was called holus atrum, later olusatrum, and corruptly olisatrum. Charlemagne commanded it to be sown in his farms. The Italians made great use of it, under the name macerone. At the end of the eighteenth century the tradition existed in England that it had been formerly cultivated; later English and French horticulturists do not mention it. De Candolle.

2. In North America, a name sometimes given to the plant Thaspium aureum.

Alexandrian (al-eg-zan'dri-an), a. [< L. Alexandria, classical form Alexandrēa, < Gr. Ἀλεξάνδρεια, name of the Egyptian city founded by Alexander the Great, < Ἀλέξανδρος, L. Alexander, a man's name, prop. adj., 'defending men,' < ἀλέξειν, ward off, defend, + ἀνήρ (ἀνδρ-), man.] 1. Pertaining to Alexandria, an important city of Egypt, founded by Alexander the Great in 332 B. C.—2. Pertaining to Alexander the Great. —Alexandrian Codex (Codex Alexandrinus), an important manuscript of the Scriptures, sent to Charles I. of England by the Patriarch of Constantinople, now in the British Museum. It is written in Greek uncials on parchment, and contains the Septuagint version of the Old Testament complete, except parts of the Psalms, and almost all the New Testament. It is assigned to the fifth century. —Alexandrian Library, a celebrated library at Alexandria in Egypt, founded by Ptolemy Soter and Ptolemy Philadelphus (323–247 B. C.), and destroyed about 47 B. C. A second or supplementary library in the Serapeum at Alexandria was entirely destroyed by a mob of fanatics under the Patriarch Theophilus A. D. 391; a popular account, however, assigns its destruction to the Arabs in 641.—Alexandrian school. (a) A school of literature, science, and philosophy flourishing at Alexandria under the Ptolemies during the three centuries preceding the Christian era, and continuing under the Roman empire, especially as a philosophical school in which Neoplatonism was the most important element, down to the final extinction of paganism in the fifth century after Christ. (b) A school of Christian philosophy and theology at Alexandria during the first five centuries; especially, the catechetical school of Alexandria, existing in that city from the earliest times of Christianity down to about A. D. 400, for the purpose of instruction in the Christian faith, and distinguished for the high attainments of its instructors in pagan as well as in Christian philosophy and literature. Among its most famous directors were St. Clement and Origen. This school was remarkable for its attempt to accommodate Greek philosophy to Christianity and to make use of it in Christian teaching, thus antagonizing Judaizing views, according to which there was and could be nothing in common between the two. In some of its forms it tended on the one extreme to a philosophic rationalism, on the other to an idealizing mysticism. Alexandria continued to be the most important center of Christian theology down to the time of the Council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451.

Alexandrianism (al-eg-zan'dri-an-izm), n. The teachings of the Alexandrian school of theology, especially in its distinctive characteristics. See Alexandrian. Also written Alexandrinism.

Alexandrine (al-eg-zan'drin), a. and n. [< L. Alexandrinus, < Alexandria: see Alexandrian.] I. a. Same as Alexandrian, 1.

> For some time a steady advance of science appeared to be insured by the labors of the Alexandrine school. Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 263.

Alexandrine liturgy, the liturgy of St. Mark. See liturgy.—Alexandrine mosaic, or opus Alexandrinum, a kind of rich mosaic in which are used red and green porphyries, precious marbles, enamels, and other costly and brilliant materials. It has its name from the Emperor Alexander Severus (A. D. 222–235), and was used for friezes, panels, etc., under the later Roman empire.

II. n. [< F. alexandrin: so called, it is said, from Alexandre Paris, an old French poet, or from poems written by him and others in this meter on the life of Alexander the Great.] In pros., an iambic hexapody, or series of six iambic feet. French Alexandrines are written in couplets, alternately acatalectic with masculine rimes and hypercatalectic with feminine rimes. French tragedies are generally composed in Alexandrines. The cesura occurs at the end of the third foot. The second line of the following extract is an example:

> A needless Alexandrine ends the song,
> That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along.
> Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 356.

Alexandrinism (al-eg-zan'drin-izm), n. Same as Alexandrianism.

alexandrite (al-eg-zan'drīt), n. [< L. Alexander (Alexander I., Emperor of Russia) + -ite[2].] A variety of chrysoberyl found in the mica slate of the Ural mountains.

★alexia (a-lek'si-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. a- priv. + λέξις, a speaking (or reading), < λέγειν, speak, read.] Inability to read, as the result of a morbid or diseased condition of nervous centers not involving loss of sight; word-blindness; text-blindness.

alexipharmac†, alexipharmacal†, a. See alexipharmic, alexipharmical.

> He calls steel the proper alexipharmacum of this malady. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 417.

alexipharmic (a-lek-si-fär'mik), a. and n. [The final syllable, prop. -ac, has been conformed to the common suffix -ic. NL. alexipharmacum, L. alexipharmacon, n.; < Gr. ἀλεξιφάρμακος, warding off poison, acting as an antidote against it, antidotal; neuter as noun, ἀλεξιφάρμακον (L. alexipharmacon), an antidote, remedy, < ἀλέξειν, ward off, + φάρμακον, a poison, drug, remedy: see pharmacon, pharmacy, etc.] I. a. 1. Acting as a means of warding off disease; acting as a remedy; prophylactic.—2. Having the power of warding off the effects of poison taken inwardly; antidotal.

> Some antidotal quality it [the unicorn's horn] may have, . . . since not only the bone in the hart, but the horn of a deer is alexipharmick. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

II. n. An antidote to poison or infection, especially an internal antidote.

> Finding his strength every day less, he was at last terrified, and called for help upon the sages of physic: they filled his apartments with alexipharmics, restoratives, and essential virtues. Johnson, Rambler, No. 120.

alexipharmical (a-lek-si-fär'mi-kal), a. Same as alexipharmic.

alexipyretic (a-lek"si-pī-ret'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. ἀλέξειν, ward off, + πυρετός, fever: see pyretic.] In med., same as febrifuge.

alexiteric (a-lek-si-ter'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. ἀλεξητήριος, fit or able to keep off or defend; neut. ἀλεξητήριον (sc. φάρμακον, drug), a remedy, medicine; < ἀλεξητήρ, one who keeps off or defends, < ἀλέξειν, keep off, defend. Cf. alexipharmic.] I. a. Resisting external poison; obviating the effects of venom.

II. n. An antidote to poison or infection, especially an external application.

alexiterical (a-lek-si-ter'i-kal), a. Same as alexiteric.

ale-yard (āl'yärd), n. [< ale + yard[1].] 1. A glass vessel used as a measure of capacity as well as a drinking-glass, shaped like a much elongated wine-glass, formerly in use in England.—2. A glass vessel having the shape of an elongated cone, the small end communicating with a hollow ball. On drinking from it, as soon as the air reaches the inside of the ball all the liquid contained in it spurts out suddenly. Sometimes called tricky ale-yard.

1, Ale-yard.
2, Tricky Ale-yard.

Aleyrodes, n. Same as Aleurodes.

aleze, alese (a-lāz'), n. [< F. alèze, formerly alese, alaise, appar. < à l'aise, at ease: à, < L. ad, to, at; le, the; aise, > E. ease, q. v. The spelling alèze may be in simulation of lé, breadth, as if a 'spread.'] A cloth folded several times in order to protect a bed from discharges of blood, etc.

alfa (al'fä), n. [Ar. halfa.] A name in northern Africa for varieties of esparto-grass, Stipa tenacissima and S. arenaria, used in the manufacture of paper.

alfa-grass (al'fä-gràs), n. Same as alfa.

alfalfa (al-fal'fä), n. [Sp., formerly alfalfez, ★said to be from Ar. al-façfaçah, the best sort of fodder.] The Spanish name of lucerne, Medicago sativa, and the common name under which the chief varieties of lucerne are known in the western United States.

alfaqui (al-fa-kē'), n. [Sp., < Ar. al-faqīh, < al, the, + faqīh, a doctor in theology; cf. fiqh, theological learning, < faqiha, be wise.] A doctor learned in Mussulman law; a Mohammedan priest.

> A successful inroad into the country of the unbelievers, said he, will make more converts to my cause than a thousand texts of the Koran, expounded by ten thousand alfaquis. Irving, Granada, p. 154.

> No sooner had the sovereigns left the city, than Ximenes invited some of the leading alfaquies, or Mussulman doctors, to a conference, in which he expounded, with all the eloquence at his command, the true foundations of the Christian faith, and the errors of their own. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 6.

alfenid, alfenide (al'fe-nid, -nid or -nīd), n. [Perhaps < Sp. alfeñique), a sugar-paste (verb alfeñicar, ice with sugar), + -id, -ide: see alphenic.] Nickel-silver, thickly electroplated with pure silver.

alferes† (al-fer'es), n. [Also written alfeeres, alferez, alfarez, alfaras, < Sp. alférez, OSp. Pg. alferes, ensign, < Ar. al-fāris, < al, the, + fāris, horseman, knight, < faras, horse.] A standard-bearer; an ensign; a cornet. This term was in use in England some time before and during the civil wars of Charles I.

> Commended to me from some noble friends
> For my alferes. Fletcher, Rule a Wife, i. 1.

alfet (al'fet), n. [< ML. alfetum (as defined below), < AS. ālfæt, ēlfæt, a pot to boil in, < āl, ēl, fire (see anneal[1]), + fæt, a vessel: see vat.] In early Eng. hist., a vessel of boiling water into which an accused person plunged his arm as a test of his innocence.

alfileria (äl-fi-lā-rē'ä), n. [Amer. Sp., also alfilaria, alfilerilla: so called from the shape of the carpels; < Sp. alfiler, also alfilel, Pg. alfinete, a pin, < Ar. al-khill, a wooden pin used for fastening garments (Freytag), a pin.] A name in California for a European species of Erodium, E. cicutarium, which has become very widely naturalized. It is a low herb, but a valuable forage-plant. Its carpels have a sharp point and a long twisted beak, by the action of which, under the influence of the moisture of the air, the seed is buried in the soil. ★Other names for it are pin-clover and pin-grass.

alfilerilla, n. Same as alfileria.

alfin† (al'fin), n. [< late ME. alfyn, alphyn, aufyn, etc., < OF. alfin, like ML. alphinus, It. alfino, alfido, alfiere, alfiero, < Sp. alfil, arfil = Pg. alfil, alfir, < Ar. al-fīl, the elephant, < al, the, + fīl, < Pers. Hind. fīl, Skt. pīlu, elephant, this piece having had orig. the form of an elephant.] In chess, a name of the bishop.

alfiona (al-fi-ō′nä), n. [Mexican Spanish.] An embiotocoid fish, Rhacochilus toxotes, with small scales, uniserial and jaw teeth, and Alfiona (Rhacochilus toxotes).

(From Report of U. S. Fish Commission, 1884.)

lip free and deeply cut along its margin. It is the largest as well as the most valuable food-fish of the surf-fish family, Embiotocidæ, and is common along the Californian coast, where it is also called sprat and perch.

al fresco (äl fres′kō). [It., lit. in the cool air: al for a il (< L. ad illum), in the; fresco, cool or fresh air, < fresco, cool, fresh, < OHG. frisc = E. fresh: see fresh, fresco.] In the open air; out of doors: as, to dine al fresco.

Much of the gayety and brightness of al-fresco life.
The Century, XXVII. 190.

Such al fresco suppers the country-gentlemen of Italy ate in the first century of our era! D. G. Mitchell, Wet Days.

Alfur (al-för′), n. [< D. Alfoer, Pg. Alfuros, pl., said to be < Ar. al, the, + Pg. fora (= It. fora, fuora, fuori), outside (see foris-); the other forms, Arafuras, Haraforas, are, then, variations.] Same as Alfurese, n. sing.

Alfurese (al-fö-rēs′ or -rēz′), n. and a. [See Alfur.] I. n. 1. sing. or pl. A member, or the members collectively, of the race of Alfuros or Alfurs (also called Arafuras, Haraforas, etc.), a group of wild and savage tribes inhabiting Celebes and other islands of the Indian archipelago, ethnologically intermediate between the Malays and Papuans or Negritos.

The Alfurese are totally distinct from the brown Malay and black Negrito; they are wild, savage, Pagan head-hunters. R. N. Cust, Mod. Langs. E. Ind., p. 147.

2. The language spoken by the Alfuros or Alfurs.

II. a. Pertaining to the Alfuros or Alfurs, or to their language.

Alfuro (al-fö′rō), n. Same as Alfurese, n. sing.

alg. An abbreviation of algebra.

alga (al′gä), n.; pl. algæ (-jē). [L., seaweed.] ★A cryptogam of the class of Algæ.

Algæ (al′jē), n. pl. [L., pl. of alga: see alga.] A division of thallogenous chlorophyllous cryptogams found for the most part in the sea (seaweeds) or in fresh water. They are wholly cellular, though varying exceedingly in form and size, from a single microscopic or sometimes large and branching cell, a shapeless, jelly-like mass, or mere string of articulations, to forms with trunk-like stems and membranous laminæ many feet in length. Nourishment is absorbed by the surface of the plant, never through roots. The mode of propagation varies greatly in the different orders. In many no well-defined sexual differences have been discovered, and reproduction is carried on by means of cell-division or by non-sexual spores (tetraspores, zoospores). In the highest order there are distinct male and female organs (antheridia and oögonia). The term Algæ as used by Linnæus and early botanists included not only seaweeds, but also the Hepaticæ, Lichenes, and Characeæ. By Harvey the Algæ were divided into three groups, distinguished chiefly by their color, viz.: the olive-brown, Melanospermeæ; the red or purple, Rhodospermeæ; and the green, Chlorospermeæ. This arrangement has now become nearly obsolete. Recent authorities have proposed several different schemes of classification for the thallophytes in general, in which structure and development, as well as supposed relationship, are taken into account, and in which the Algæ are variously distributed. Substantial agreement is not yet reached, and the nomenclature for many of the groups remains in a very unsettled condition. It may, however, be said that the Algæ are now generally divided into the following classes, which, although appearing to be based on color, are in reality purely morphological, viz.: Chlorophyceæ, generally grass-green in color, though often including the diatoms (the Conjugatæ may form a distinct class or be included in the above); Characeæ, the stoneworts; Phæophyceæ, those which usually show some shade of brown, generally marine; Rhodophyceæ, almost universally red in color, with few exceptions marine; Myxophyceæ (Cyanophyceæ), usually blue-green. Many of the Algæ are edible and nutritious, as carrageen or Irish moss, dulse, laver, etc. Many abound in gelatin, and make a fine glue or substitute for isinglass. Kelp, iodine, and bromine are products of various species.

Algæ.

1, Dictyota dichotoma: a, spore; b, vertical view of a cystocarp; c, vertical section of same. 2, Plocamium coccineum: f, tetraspore; g, stichidium; h, branchlet with a cystocarp.

★algal (al′gal), a. and n. [< L. alga + -al.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Algæ; having the nature of algæ.

II. n. One of the Algæ (which see).

algaroba, n. See algarroba.

algarot, algaroth (al′ga-rot, -roth), n. [< F. algaroth, from the name of the physician Algarotus of Verona, Italy (end of 16th century).] A violently purgative and emetic white powder, which falls when chlorid of antimony is dropped into water. It is a compound of chlorid and oxid of antimony.

algarovilla (al″ga-rō-vil′ä), n. See algarrobilla.

algarroba (al-ga-rō′bä), n. [Sp., < Ar. al-kharrūbah, the carob: see al-[2] and carob.] 1. The Spanish name of the carob-tree, Ceratonia Siliqua. See Ceratonia.—2. In America, a name given to the honey-mesquit, Prosopis juliflora, and to the Hymenæa Courbaril.—3. A substance resembling catechu in appearance and properties, obtained from the La Plata, and containing tannin mixed with a deep-brown coloring matter. Crooks, Handbook of Dyeing and Calico Printing, p. 509.—Algarroba bean. See bean[1].

Also spelled algaroba.

algarrobilla (al″ga-rō-bēl′yä), n. [S. Amer. Sp., dim. of Sp. algarroba: see above.] The astringent resinous husks and seeds of several leguminous trees or shrubs of South America, which are an article of commerce for their value in tanning and dyeing. In Brazil and tropical America they are the produce chiefly of Pithecolobium parvifolium (Inga Marthæ of some authors). In Chili and on the western coast they are obtained from Cæsalpinia (Balsamocarpum) brevifolia and Prosopis juliflora. Also written algarovilla.

algate, algates (âl′gāt, âl′gāts), adv. [< ME. algate, allegate, alle gate (algates occurs in Chaucer), < al, all, + gate, a way: see gate[2] and gait. Cf. alway, always.] 1. In every direction; everywhere; always; under all circumstances. [Obsolete except in the Scotch form a' gate or a' gates.]

Algates he that hath with love to done,
Hath ofter wo than changed ys the mone.
Chaucer, Complaint of Mars, l. 234.

2. In every respect; altogether; entirely. [Obsolete and north. Eng. provincial.]

Una now he algates must foregoe.
Spenser, F. Q., II. i. 2.

3†. In any way; at all.

Fayrer then herselfe, if ought algate
Might fayrer be. Spenser, F. Q., III. viii. 9.

4†. By all means; on any terms; at any rate.

As yow lyst ye maken hertes digne;
Algates hem that ye wole sette a fyre,
Thei dreden shame and vices thei resigne.
Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 24.

And therefore would I should be algates slain;
For while I live his life is in suspense.
Fairfax, tr. of Tasso, iv. 60.

5†. Notwithstanding; nevertheless.

A maner latin corrupt was hir speche,
But algates ther-by was she understonde.
Chaucer, Man of Law's Tale, l. 422.

algazel (al-ga-zel′), n. [An early form of gazel, after Ar. al-ghazāl: see gazel.] A name formerly applied to one, and probably to several, of the ruminant quadrupeds of eastern Africa, etc., now known as gazels and antelopes. It is variously identified, some making it out to be the common gazel of Egypt, etc., Antilope dorcas or Dorcas gazella; others, the sasin or common antelope, Antilope bezoartica, a very different animal. It is more probably the first-named species, or one closely resembling it.

Algebar (al′je-bär), n. [Said to be < Ar. al, the, + gebār (Syr. gaboro), giant.] An Arabic and poetical name of the constellation Orion.

Begirt with many a blazing star
Stood the great giant Algebar, Orion, hunter of the beast!
Longfellow, Occult. of Orion.

★algebra (al′je-brä), n. [Early mod. E. algeber, < F. algebre (now algèbre); the present E. form, like D. G. Sw. Dan. algebra, Russ. algebra, Pol. algiebra, etc., follows It. Pr. Sp. Pg. algebra, < ML. algebra, bone-setting, algebra, < Ar. al-jabr, al-jebr (> Pers. al-jabr), the redintegration or reunion of broken parts, setting bones, reducing fractions to integers, hence 'ilm al-jabr wa'l muqābalah, i. e., 'the science of redintegration and equation (comparison),' algebra (> Pers. al-jabr wa'l muqābalah, Hind. jabr o muqābala, algebra): 'ilm, 'ulm, science, < 'alama, know (cf. alem, alim, almah); al, the; jabr, redintegration, consolidation, < jabara, redintegrate, reunite, consolidate (= Heb. gābar, make strong); wa, and; 'l for al, the; muqābalah, comparison, collation, < qābala, confront, compare, collate: see cabala. The full Ar. name is reflected in ML. "ludus algebræ almucgrabalæque" (13th century), and in early mod. E. "algiebar and almachabel" (Dee, Math. Præf., 6, A. D. 1570), and the second part in ML. almucabala, almacabala, algebra.] 1. Formal mathematics; the analysis of equations; the art of reasoning about relations, more especially quantitative relations, by the aid of a compact and highly systematized notation. In ordinary algebra the relations between quantities are expressed by signs of equality, addition, subtraction, multiplication, etc. (=, +, −, ×), or by the position of the quantities (as xy for $x \times y$, and x^y for x to the y power), and the quantities themselves are denoted by letters. Quantities whose values are unknown or are assumed to be variable are denoted by the last letters of the alphabet, as x, y, z; known or constant quantities by a, b, c, etc.; and problems are solved by expressing all the data in the form of equations, and then transforming these according to certain rules. The conceptions of negative and imaginary quantities (see negative and imaginary) are employed. The term higher algebra usually means the theory of invariants. See invariant. Multiple algebra, or n-way algebra, introduces the conception of units of different denominations, which can, however, be multiplied together. Each such system has a multiplication table characterizing it.

2. Any special system of notation adapted to the study of a special system of relationship: as, "it is an algebra upon an algebra," Sylvester.—3. A treatise on algebra.

Its abbreviation is alg.

Boolian algebra, a logical algebra, invented by the English mathematician George Boole (1815–64), for the solution of problems in ordinary logic. It has also a connection with the theory of probabilities.—Logical algebra, an algebra which considers particularly non-quantitative relations.—Nilpotent algebra, an algebra in which every expression is nilpotent (which see).—Pure algebra, an algebra in which every unit is connected with every other by a definite relation.

★algebraic (al-je-brā′ik), a. [< algebra + -ic; prop. algebric* = F. algébrique, < NL. algebricus.*] 1. Pertaining to algebra.—2. Involving no operations except addition, subtraction, multiplication, division, and the raising of quantities to powers whose exponents are commensurable quantities: as, an algebraic equation or expression.—3. Relating to the system of quantity which extends indefinitely below as well as above zero.—Algebraic curve. See curve.—Algebraic equation, an equation in which the unknown quantities or variables are subjected to no other operations than those enumerated in definition 2, above: as, $x^{\frac{2}{3}} y^{\frac{1}{3}} + ax^7 = 6$.—Algebraic form. See form.—Algebraic function, a function whose connection with its variable is expressed by an algebraic equation. Thus, x and y, as defined by the above equation, are algebraic functions of one another.—Algebraic geometry, a name given to the application of algebra to the solution of geometrical problems.—Algebraic sign, the sign + or − which has to be attached to a real number to fix its value in algebra.—Algebraic space, a space in which the position of a point may be uniquely defined by a set of values of periodic algebraic integrals, without exceptions which form part of the space.—Algebraic sum, the sum of several quantities whose algebraic signs have been taken into account in adding them: as, the algebraic sum of +4 and −2 is +2.

algebraical (al-je-brā′i-kal), a. 1. Same as algebraic.—2. Resembling algebra; relating to algebra.

algebraically (al-je-brā′i-kal-i), adv. By means of algebra, or of algebraic processes; in an algebraic manner; as regards algebra.

algebraist (al′je-brā-ist), n. [< algebra + -ist; prop. algebrist* = F. algébriste = Sp. Pg. It. algebrista, < NL. algebrista.] One who is versed in the science of algebra. Also algebrist.

algebraize (al′je-brạ-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. algebraized, ppr. algebraizing. [< algebra + -ize; prop. algebrize.*] To perform by algebra; reduce to algebraic form.

algebrist (al′je-brist), n. Same as algebraist.

algedo (al-jē′dō), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀλγηδών, a sense of pain, pain, suffering, < ἀλγεῖν, feel bodily pain, suffer.] In pathol., violent pain about the urethra, testes, bladder, perineum, and anus, caused by sudden stoppage of severe gonorrhea.

algefacient (al-jē-fā′shient), a. [< L. algēre, be cold, + facien(t-)s, ppr. of facere, make.] Making cool; cooling.

Algerian (al-jē′ri-an), a. and n. [= F. Algérien, < Algeria (F. Algérie), the province, Algiers (F. Alger = Sp. Argel = It. Algeri), the city, < Ar. Al-jezair, the city of Algiers, lit. the Islands, < al, the, + jezair, pl. of jezira, island.] I. a. Pertaining to the city of Algiers, or to Algeria or its inhabitants.—Algerian tea. See tea.

II. n. An inhabitant of the French colony of Algeria, in the north of Africa. The colony was founded in 1834, extends from the Mediterranean southward to the desert of Sahara, and has Tunis and Morocco on its east and west frontiers respectively.

Algerine (al-je-rēn′), a. and n. [= Sp. Argelino = It. Algerino: see Algerian.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Algiers or Algeria, or to the inhabitants of Algeria.

II. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Algiers or Algeria, in Africa; particularly, one of the indigenous Berber or Arabic inhabitants of Algiers.—2. A pirate: from the fact that the people of Algiers were formerly much addicted to piracy.—3. [l. c.] A grampus: because common off the coast of Algiers.—4. [l. c.] A woolen material woven in stripes of bright colors, and often with gold thread, generally too loose and soft for ordinary wear, and made into scarfs, shawls, and the like.

algerite (al'jėr īt), n. [After F. Alger.] A mineral occurring in yellow to gray tetragonal crystals at Franklin Furnace, New Jersey. It is probably an altered scapolite.

algetic (al-jet'ik), a. [< Gr. as if ἀλγητικός*, < ἀλγεῖν, have pain.] Producing or having relation to pain.

★algid (al'jid), a. [< L. algidus, cold, < algēre, be cold.] Cold.—Algid cholera, in pathol., Asiatic cholera: so called from the fact that diminution of temperature is one of its leading characteristics.

algidity (al-jid'i-ti), n. [< algid + -ity.] The state of being algid; chilliness; coldness.

algidness (al'jid-nes), n. Same as algidity.

algific (al-jif'ik), a. [< L. algificus, < algus, cold (< algēre, be cold), + facere, make.] Producing cold.

algist (al'jist), n. [< L. alga, a seaweed, + -ist.] A student of that department of botany which relates to algæ or seaweeds; one skilled in algology.

algodonite (al-god'ō-nīt), n. [< Algodones (see def.) + -ite[2].] An arsenid of copper occurring in steel-gray masses, allied to domeykite. It is found at the silver-mine of Algodones, near Coquimbo, Chili, and in the Lake Superior copper region.

algoid (al'goid), a. [< L. alga, a seaweed, + -oid.] Resembling algæ.

Algol (al'gol or al-gol'), n. [Ar., the demon.] A pale star varying in magnitude from 2.3 to 4.0 in a period of 2.89 days; β Persei.

algological (al-gō-loj'i-kal), a. [< algology + -ical.] Relating or pertaining to algology.

algologist (al-gol'ō-jist), n. [< algology + -ist.] One who studies algæ or seaweeds; one skilled in algology; an algist.

algology (al-gol'ō-ji), n. [< L. alga, a seaweed, + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] A branch of botany treating of algæ; phycology.

Algonkian, Algonquian (al-gon'ki-an), a. [Also Algonkin, Algonquin: prob. < Micmac algoomeaking, 'at the place of spearing fish.'] Belonging to an important and widely spread family of North American Indian tribes, formerly inhabiting the eastern coast from Labrador down through the Middle States, and extending across the Mississippi valley, into the Rocky mountains.

algor (al'gôr), n. [L., < algēre, be cold.] In pathol., an unusual feeling of coldness; rigor or ★chill in or at the onset of fever.

algorism (al'gō-rizm), n. [< ME. algorisme, algarism, etc., also contr. algrim, augrim, etc., < OF. algorisme, augorisme, augorime = Pr. algorisme = Sp. alguarismo (cf. guarismo, cipher) = Pg. It. algorismo, < ML. algorismus (occasionally alchoarismus, etc.), the Arabic system of numbers, arithmetic, < Ar. al-Khowārazmī, i. e., the native of Khwārazm (Khiva), surname of Abu Ja'far Mohammed ben Musa, an Arabian mathematician, who flourished in the 9th century. His work on algebra was translated or paraphrased into Latin early in the 13th century, and was the source from which Europe derived a knowledge of the Arabic numerals. His surname, given in the Latin paraphrase as Algoritmi, came to be applied to arithmetic in much the same way that "Euclid" was applied to geometry. The spelling algorithm, Sp. It. algoritmo, Pg. algorithmo, ML. algorithmus, etc., simulates Gr. ἀριθμός, number.] 1. In arith., the Arabic system of notation; hence, the art of computation with the Arabic figures, now commonly called arithmetic.

If ever they came to the connected mention of addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division, it ought to have been a sign that they were reading on algorism as distinguished from arithmetic. De Morgan, Arith. Books, xix.

2. Any peculiar method of computing, as the rule for finding the greatest common measure. —3. Any method of notation where the symbols form some system of operative procedure, as, the differential algorism. Also algorithm.

algorismic (al-gō-riz'mik), a. [< algorism + -ic.] Pertaining to algorism; arithmetical. N. E. D. Also algorithmic.

algorist (al'gō-rist), n. [< algorism + -ist.] A computer with the Arabic figures; an arithmetician; a writer on algorism.

The Italian school of algorists, with Pacioli at their head, found followers in Germany, England, France, and Spain. De Morgan, Arith. Books, xxi.

algoristic (al-gō-ris'tik), a. Pertaining to the Arabic figures.

algorithm (al'gō-riŦHm), n. An erroneous form of algorism.

algorithmic (al-gō-riŦH'mik), a. 1. Same as algorismic.—2. Pertaining to or using symbols which form some system of operative procedure.

"Symbolic," as I understand it, being almost exactly the equivalent of algorithmic. J. Venn, Symbolic Logic, p. 98.

Algorithmic geometry, Wronski's name for analytical geometry. Seldom used by writers of authority.

algous (al'gus), a. [< L. algosus, abounding in seaweed, < alga, a seaweed: see alga.] Pertaining to or resembling algæ or seaweeds; abounding with seaweed.

algrim†, n. A Middle English form of algorism.

alguazil (al-gwą̈-zēl'), n. [< Sp. alguacil, formerly alguazil, alvacil, = Pg. alguazil, formerly alvazil, alvacil, also alvazir, alvacir, an officer of justice (cf. guazil, governor of a sea-town), < Ar. al-wazīr, < al, the (see al-[2]), + wazīr, officer, vizir: see vizir.] In Spain, and in regions settled by Spaniards, an inferior officer of justice; a constable.

The corregidor . . . has ordered this alguazil to apprehend you. Smollett, tr. of Gil Blas, v. 1.

There were instances in which men of the most venerable dignity, persecuted without a cause by extortioners, died of rage and shame in the gripe of the vile alguazils of Impey. Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

algum (al'gum), n. [Heb. 'algúm, in another place 'almúg (see almug), a word of unascertained origin.] A tree mentioned, along with the cedar and the fir, as sought for the construction of Solomon's temple. It has been variously supposed to be the pine, the deodar, the red sandalwood, the sappan, etc. See almug.

Send me also cedar trees, fir trees, and algum trees, out of Lebanon. 2 Chron. ii. 8.

alhacena (äl-ä-thā'nä), n. [Sp., < Ar. al-hazna, the cupboard.] A cupboard or recess of stucco, decorated in the Moorish or Spanish style. There is a magnificent specimen in the South Kensington Museum, London, of the style of the fourteenth century.

Alhagi (al-haj'i), n. [NL., < Ar. al-hāj (Avicenna), the camel's-thorn.] A genus of leguminous plants of several reputed species, but all probably forms of one, ranging from Egypt and Greece to India. A. camelorum is a rigid spiny shrub, the leaves and branches of which exude a species of manna. This is collected in considerable quantity in Persia for food and for exportation to India; camels are very fond of it.

Alhambraic (al-ham-brā'ik), a. [< Alhambra (< Ar. al-hamrā, lit. the red (house), with reference to the color of the sun-dried bricks which compose the outer walls, < al, the, + hamrā, fem. of ahmar, red) + -ic.] Pertaining to or built or decorated after the manner of the Alhambra, a Moorish palace and fortress near Granada in Spain, erected during the thirteenth and the first part of the fourteenth century, and the finest existing specimen of Moorish architecture; in the style of the Alhambra. The style of decoration characteristic of the Alhambra is remarkable for the elaborate variety and complexity of its details, which are somewhat small in scale, but fancifully varied and brilliant with color and gilding.
